Turkey has completed a railroad from Damascus to Medina and will run it on into the sacred city of Mecca. It is built primarily for the pilgrimage to the Holy City of the Prophet and dividends are of secondary consideration, it is said. May it not be that the pilgrims will be expected to furnish the dividends? But the pilgrimage was the magic lute that sang the sheckles out of the pockets of multitudes of the faithful and they were made as a free gift with Abdul the Damned as the sacred repository. The great Abdul is business-like enough to have the government guarantee behind the scheme.

The road will be over 1,000 miles long and half its length will be from Maan to Medina, through a rocky desert where there is no hope of future settlements, and it cannot be hoped that any but the section from Damascus to Maan will ever be of rational economic interest. If the other half ever pays for itself it must depend upon the sentiment that sends the pilgrims to Mecca.

Since Jerusalem and Damascus are tapped by railroads we have become accustomed to think of hearing the shriek of the locomotive within the sacred confines of the hallowed and mysterious. Thus does invention make havoc of sentiment. Doubtless there are compensations in the ease with which the journeys can be made and the increasing numbers that will be enabled to make them. The most surprising thing about the interest in the Holy Land is the fewness of the numbers who visit it as compared with the great numbers who go to Egypt and other ancient places. Gradually it is becoming less of a sentimental journey and more one of practical learning and the numbers who will go will multiply by that same sign.

WILL CUBA BE FREE?

Our national government has acted in the utmost good faith in Cuba and for the second time has settled her troubles and launched her as an independent state. She can scarcely be called a free and independent nation. Upon retiring Governor Magoon made it plain to the Cuban officials and people that she was not sovereign, but under the protection of this government. She will not be allowed to make a treaty and her constitutional rights are otherwise restricted. She may not pay more money to her patriots, all too many of whom have become patriots of the Croker and Tim Sullivan type. She must keep all obligations, whether made by her own former, or by our administration there, and we will see to it that modern sanitation is enforced. Moreover she must keep the peace. In this she is warned, for while we have not promised, nor could we legally do so, all the world knows that another failure means that she will have to fly the stars and stripes forever.

Whether or not she will be free depends upon her ability to extend freedom to all the people and keep them from license. If the new administration succeeds it will be a triumph of statecraft. Gomez, the new president, was the leader that overthrew Palma and his Americano government. Palma's was a government of and for the property holders. He sought in every way to make the way of the American syndicate easy and to placate the property aristocracy of the island, who were crying out for the strong, protecting hand of our Uncle Sam. Gomez carried every province and city of the island and received unanimous electoral vote. This is index undeniable to the way the Cuban people felt about an Americano administration. Now Gomez must wrestle with principalities and powers. He must mediate between strongly entrenched property interests and radical anti-foreign demands. A bill has been introduced in the assembly to make it impossible for a foreigner to hold property in Cuba. On the other hand our Uncle Samuel, as evidenced in Venezuela, does not always ask about the merits of the case when Americans claim help for property interests, but acts the part of advocate rather than of judge. Within the Liberal party that elected him there are characteristic Latin-American elements also, and Zayas, his chief rival, is Vice President, a favorite vantage point for an ambitious rival in South American revolutions. Gomez will need to be a Lincoln to thread the seas.

Cuba has made great progress in the eight years of peace. Her population has increased 30% and now numbers 2½ millions. Of this number 70% are white and only 30% colored. The colored population, as in the United States, increases more slowly than the white. The revolutions cost heavily in child life. While the men were fighting the children died of starvation and neglect. Since peace came the depletion, as always, has been rapidly repaired, and the greater proportion of the increase in population is in children under five years of age. Of the whites 58% can read, and of the colored people 45% have that accomplishment. The schools are doing good work, but child labor is yet a thralldom in Cuba. No less than 28% of the boys between 10 and 14 years labor for wages, while of those from 14 up to 18 more than 80% work for their own living.

THE TEMPERANCE TIDE

Every week brings an encouraging quota of temperance accomplishments. Idaho has a new county local option law, the lower house in Utah has passed a state-wide prohibition bill by an overwhelming majority, and the House of Representatives has passed a compromise measure for the protection of prohibition territory. The Iowa Supreme Court has decided that liquor sales cannot be solicited and the Attorney General decides that the ruling includes the mail order business. Chairman Knapp of the Interstate Commerce Commission rules that an express company cannot be compelled to carry packages of liquor when consigned C. O. D. These last three mentioned are gains for the protection of "dry" territory. That fight will not be finished until the government refuses to grant an internal revenue license to any one in prohibition territory and every package consigned by express is plainly marked and called for by the consignee in person.

Option bills are up in Wisconsin, New Jersey, and Nebraska in a very live manner. New Hampshire is trying to repeal the license law and go back to state-wide prohibition. At this writing it looks as if the effort to repeal the county option bill in Indiana will fail. Every county but one or two so far has gone dry under that law and so many more promise to do so before the legislature adjourns, that it will be almost mandatory to keep the law. Already three-fifths of the people of the Hoosier state live in territory without a saloon.

THE SCANDINAVIANS AND WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE

The Scandinavians are leading the world in the progress of woman's political rights. Sweden has just accorded them equal rights with men to the ballot. Norway two years ago passed a law that enfranchised two-thirds of her women. Finland accorded her women full equal rights when she was re-endowed with independent home government and sent sixteen of them to the first parliament. She liked them so well that twenty-five sat in the parliament that the Czar has just prorogued—and did no more talking than the men. Denmark allows its women to vote in municipal elections. The Scandinavians are no mean people.

The Endowment of Bethany College

In another column will be found a communication from Dr. W. T. Moore, who has for some months been active in securing an endowment for our oldest college. His communication presents a most cheering phase of the effort in the offer made by a liberal but unknown friend to give one-fifth of a total endowment up to a half million dollars.

It is upon such propositions as this that most money for educational purposes is raised. Those who are most anxious to see institutions of this kind prosper are at the same time interested to secure the help of others in completing the work. No friend of Bethany College could ask for more from any generous giver than our friend has promised.

Bethany is the oldest of our institutions of learning, and is inseparably connected with the lives and work of Thomas and Alexander Campbell. It has given to us a long list of teachers, ministers, missionaries, and business men. The latter are those upon whom most reliance must be placed for the raising of this endowment. Yet the teachers, ministers, and missionaries are manifesting a deep interest in doing their own part in the work.

Instant response ought to be made to this appeal. Write to Dr. Moore and assure him of your desire to have fellowship in the endowment of Bethany College. It would be a misfortune indeed if our centennial year were to pass without the accomplishment of this great work.

Judge Cleland and His Parole System

Chicago has been given considerable opportunity of late to consider the problem of the parole system in connection with the sentence of minor offenders under the city code. Judge McKenzie Cleland, one of the judges of the Municipal Court, has administered the law at two or three stations, to which he has been assigned, with liberal interpretation of the parole principle. This meant that in cases where offenders were brought before him for offenses which would usually receive sentences to the House of Correction, he has interested himself in the offenders and has suspended sentence, hoping for reformation on their part. Judge Cleland believes that in many instances good has been done and that the offenders have remained at liberty to support their families, whereas by the ordinary method, these families would have been broken up and probably would have become public charges.

Judge Cleland has spoken frequently before church clubs and other organizations in defense of his method of parole and has been active in the attempt to secure a state law which should widen the workings of the parole system. At the same time he has been vigorously opposed by the other judges of the Municipal Court on the ground that he was assuming, without warrant of law, functions which at the present time could only be discharged by the Governor of the state. So bitter has become the controversy that Judge Cleland has at last been removed from the criminal to the civil branch of the Municipal Court, where cases of this kind will no longer come under his jurisdiction.

Where there is so much controversy it is apparent that only careful examination of the facts can bring out the truth. It is probable that Judge Cleland has gone further than the law warrants in responding to the generous promptings of his own heart. It seems hardly reasonable that his brother judges would unite in denunciation of his procedure if it did not lack justification in some important regard. Meantime it is certain that his record and his public advocacy of the parole system will bring the matter to the attention of the legislature where a more adequate measure ought soon to be framed. At present public sympathy seems largely with Judge Cleland; and by many his removal from the criminal court has been interpreted as an act of jealousy on the part of superiors and colleagues.

The New Ministerial Association

It is evidence of a vital condition when a body or institution puts forth new forms of activity. One of the interesting developments of the last National Convention, held at New Orleans, was the organization of the Ministerial Association of the Churches of Christ. This had been suggested some time before by W. R. Warren, the Centennial Secretary, at the Congress held in Bloomington last spring. The matter was presented and discussed at a meeting of the ministers at the close of one of the sessions at New Orleans and a constitution was adopted and officers were elected.

The Disciples have many ministerial associations, state, district, county, and city. But these have never been organized into a unity with power to take concerted action upon matters of moment among us. Such matters, of course, do not concern questions of doctrine nor methods of work, on which we have at present no power of legislation. They refer wholly to the welfare of the churches in relation to ministerial supply, ability, and conduct.

The definite purposes for which this Association is projected are the encouragement of young men to study for the ministry, the effort to introduce unemployed men to suitable fields, and to fill vacancies with the right kind of preachers. One of the purposes of the new body is that of investigating and bringing to public attention those sections of the country where there are promises of development at a moderate outlay of expense, and where young men would find available openings for service. This contemplates a thorough study of the fields and forces among our people in the United States.

A small membership fee of $1 per year it is believed will provide for the employment of a man who can devote himself to this work and organize in this way a bureau of information and supply. Local ministerial associations are requested to consider this plan and take such action in reference to co-operation with it as their judgment may dictate. Certainly a plan of such need and promise hardly requires more than a suggestion to secure its approval by local ministerial associations.

The officers of the General Association are:

A. B. Philputt, president; W. H. Allen, vice president; A. L. Orcutt, secretary; C. H. Winders, treasurer. T. W. Grafton, L. C. Howe, and R. W. Abberley are additional members of the Board of Directors. The office of the Association is 120 E. Market Street, Indianapolis, and communications may be addressed to the secretary at that place.

Presbyterian Men

The Presbyterian Brotherhood held its third annual convention in Pittsburgh two weeks since. Seven hundred local organizations, with a membership of over 36,000 men were reported, while it estimated that as many additional organizations are not enrolled in the national affiliation. The convention is characterized by the Interior as peculiarly practical, compared with the two earlier conventions, which were characterized by enthusiasm and consecration, respectively. Our own P. C. Macfarlane was present and was introduced to the convention as a fraternal delegate from the Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ. He sent the editors of our papers a superb interpretation of the convention in three installments. It hurts us not to have space to print his entire correspondence, despite his assertion that it is meant only for our editorial information, and not for publication under his name. In his concluding letter, however, he sums up his impressions as follows:

"First of all, the absence of old men. There were few faces that indicated the wearers to be over fifty years.

"I was struck with the straightforward manliness of the preachers in the delivery of their messages. Here and there was an academic tone used that amounted to affectation, but this speedily disappeared in the vigor of address and the more stalwart the delivery of the message the more warmly was it received. Again the rugged faith in Christ of the men. There was nowhere a note of doubt. In no address a suspicion of anything but that Christ is the ruling power in the spiritual world. The missionary specialists all based their appeal and plea on the Great Commission.

"Another thing was the presence of the world view in the mind of every speaker. As memory serves me, not once in the matter of any man's address was there anything by which a looker-on would learn that this was a Presbyterian Convention, and their point of view was continually Christ for the world and the world for Christ. Continually there was outcropping the passion of the souls of these men for united effort and for union in Christ.

"Still another notable thing to me was the accuracy of theological statements, Biblically considered. The addresses were stripped of practically everything that savoured of cant or traditional theological notions in the discussion of conversion and such subjects as the Holy Spirit. In fact, so far as the matter of these addresses is concerned beyond the fact that on the subject of Christian Union, our speakers would have been certain to go further, there was not an address that might not have been delivered by one of our own men at one of our own conventions.

"I leave this convention with a new respect for the men who stand in Presbyterian pulpits and with greatly enlarged hopes for a more speedy union of God's people in Jesus Christ and not upon some series of compromises. I do not for a moment suppose that these men are conscious how they are going, but they do know whither they wish to go and that is into a United Church of Christ."

The Observance of Lent

On Wednesday, February 24, began that period of time known in the liturgical churches as Lent, which culminates with the Easter week. It is a noticeable fact that within recent years there has been a larger tendency to observe this period as valuable for Christian work, among the non-liturgical churches as well as among those like the Roman Catholic, the Eastern, and the Anglican. It was natural that the over-emphasis upon the externals of religion, which has often been the feature of these churches, wrought its reaction in the Protestant spirit which carried very far and caused the elimination of many items of Christian interest from the older rubrics of the church.

Nevertheless the observance of Lent is not a Roman Catholic practise. It goes very much farther back, as any student of church history knows. The word itself is derived from the root "long," and refers essentially to the lengthening days of spring. Long before the rise of the Roman Catholic church the practise of observing the week preceding Easter, and even a longer period of time connected with it, had become recognized in the church. Tertullian, Origen, and other early writers allude to the forty days' fast, and the Council of Nicea (325 A. D.) recognized it as an established custom. We know that fasting was one of the practices of the early church, and probably the more zealous even in apostolic times observed lengthy periods of fasting as means of grace in the development of the spiritual life. So that, while there is nothing in the New Testament to enjoin such a practise any more than the observance of Christmas or Easter or Thanksgiving, yet it is apparent that such a custom when it has been used in the spirit of Christian freedom and not as a liturgical day, has been helpful in the development of Christian character.

The period of forty days, of course, refers to the days of Jesus' temptation in the Wilderness, which also reminds one of those periods of fasting and retirement from the world in the lives of Moses and Elijah. Our Saviour's temptation in the Wilderness was the necessary preparation for the tasks of his life. From the announcement of his Messianic character and office at the baptism he went forth into the Wilderness, driven by the urgency of the task that was laid upon him. And as that period of retirement and absorption in the contemplation of his Messianic work inevitably issued in the temptations which came in connection with it, it early took its place in the minds of the New Testament writers as essentially dedicated to the testing of our Lord. Jesus must have told the story of this experience to his disciples in later days. Only two of them have recorded it, and these in somewhat varying terms. But the essential facts are clear that in some very real and searching manner, our Lord was compelled to decide between the greatest alternatives human nature ever has to confront.

There is no more favorable time in which to point out the great lessons of our Saviour's suffering ministry in our behalf than the Lenten days. It requires no slavish observance of a church calendar, nor any subscription to the traditions which have grown up about the different days of this period to make such high and purposeful use of the time. Perhaps it is not too much to say that the minister and church who do not employ this period, so suggestive of the struggle through which our Saviour passed in our behalf, are missing one of the great opportunities of the year. It is for this reason, no doubt, that many of the churches, even those most Protestant in spirit, have felt that the Lenten season was one of great opportunity and impressiveness for the work of instruction, exhortation, and growth in the graces of our holy faith. It should be a time when the public services are given direction toward these ministries of the Christian life. The prayer meetings during this period ought to be especially impressive and full of results. The Lord's day services may be made of remarkable significance by the minister who is sensitive to the meanings of Christian history as well as the values of Jesus' own life.

We should be the first to protest against any liturgical tendency in our churches. But we should like to have them go back beyond the period of Roman Catholic growth and tradition to the early days of the church when, with fresh remembrance of apostolic preaching and example, and with the passion for the exemplification of the life of Christ in all personal conduct, the Christian communities gave themselves with wholehearted surrender to the observance of such times of special work and prayer as the life of Christ had made impressive to them. From such examples the church of our own time may draw helpful lessons and we believe that among these lessons is the appropriate use of the Lenten days and the great week of tragedy and triumph with which they close.

An Earthquake in Central Illinois

By Charles Clayton Morrison

"I tell you people there never was a man who came to your town, who walked your streets whom the devil and his gang are trying to get like they are me. But, hear me! I'll fight the devil, his gang and his cohorts from hell to breakfast, and don't you forget it."—REV. W. A. SUNDAY in beginning his campaign in Springfield.

Springfield, the capital city of Illinois, is experiencing a religious earthquake. Evangelist Billy Sunday and his party of expert assistants are at work in that town shaking up the saints and sinners, churches and saloons, deacons and gamblers, fallen women and society stars—not a soul in that region but feels the shock of the revival.

That is the extraordinary fact in Sunday's revival. Everybody knows it is happening. That is why I call it an earthquake. Everybody feels it. It isn't happening in a vacuum, it isn't happening in a corner of the town, or in a church lecture room. This earthquake is sending its shivering energy straight through the residence district and down the business streets, through court house, state house, and clear through the saloon and brothel territory of the city.

Meetings Need No Further Advertising.

Everybody knows the evangelist is in town. Everybody knows he means big business. Everybody has some sort of feeling about the meeting. It may be a prayer-feeling, that God will bless the town through this upburst; it may be a fear-feeling lest certain iniquitous assets of business may be demolished or hidden sin revealed; it may be a cynical feeling, superior and complacent; it may be a regret feeling, that the church must resort to such methods to make itself effective in society. But everybody feels one way or another about the meeting.

It needs no advertising. There isn't anybody who doesn't already know all about it. For weeks the papers have been full of it. For months the churches have been organizing and praying for it. Over one hundred and fifty cottage prayer meetings a day have been held for several weeks, stirring the souls of women and men to expect and to work for a great outpouring of grace.

Preparations on a Magnificent Scale.

Mr. Sunday says he never saw better preparations. Twice at least he affected a threat to cancel his engagement on grounds of the inertia of churches and preachers. Stimulated by the imminent fear of losing the evangelist altogether the Christian people made wonderful preparations for his coming. A great choir of 700 voices was organized. A tabernacle seating about 8,000 persons was constructed. A great "personal workers'" class met from week to week to study methods and to pray. Church men talked the meeting in their lodges. The newspapers wrote editorials and reported every stage and degree of the evolution of the preparations. All the pulpits of the city were filled one Sunday by pastors from Jacksonville, Decatur and Bloomington, where Mr. Sunday had held remarkable meetings within the year past.

No stone was left unturned to create faith and expectancy in the people. And when Billy Sunday came to town he was greeted with a congregation of over 7,000 people the first night! Yesterday the prelate of the Knights Templar telephoned the evangelist that there would be no more meetings of their lodge while the revival was in progress. Other lodges also will suspend meetings. Today it is announced that all the clubs of the city are suspending their sessions on account of the revival.

Christian Unity Well Along in Springfield.

The spirit of union among the Springfield churches is well developed. The preachers get along well together. They play base ball and go to picnics together. They pray often together. Their ministers' meetings exhibit the most genuine unity we have ever seen amongst ministers. They hold one another in the best esteem. Each counts the others as partners, not competitors. They are all sore tried by the great common problems their churches face. They have tried many things to awaken their city's conscience toward God. Still the situation maintains its moral status quo.

Preachers Humble Before Their Problem.

There is not a man in the group of twenty preachers who takes a cocksure attitude concerning either doctrines or methods. Sectarianism is only a form with them. They are brothers together. They have a custom of exchanging pulpits all around on the first Sunday in May every year. No preacher is in his own pulpit on that day. They call it Fellowship Sunday. Often the pastors of the most influential churches are assigned the humblest pulpits. It begets a feeling of coöperation among the churches.

The pastors feel the bigness of their task and are keenly aware of their present impotence to accomplish it. They study their common problem as a class studies algebra. They are free to experiment. They will try anything that promises to advance God's kingdom. They feel that all their work in conventional lines is hardly doing more than to keep the balance with the forces of evil. Little new territory is being won. The enemy is strongly entrenched and there is not the slightest indication of his weakening.

Springfield Needs God.

Springfield has just about as much sin in it as a city dare have and still be called a Christian town. Its local politics are notoriously corrupt. City affairs are so tangled up with state politics that it is almost impossible to get a local moral issue squarely before the people. Saloons spawn there. Not many towns of fifty thousand can show so large a levee territory. A large colored population with its usual proportion of shiftless members further complicates the social problem. Whether the scandals in high society are above the average in frequency or abominableness I cannot say, but occasional disclosures of conditions at the "top" are sufficient grounds for the conviction that in that Denmark there is much rottenness.

Forces Making for Good.

Over against these conditions stand the library and the public schools and the Y. M. C. A., and the earnest clubs of both women and men and—the churches. The customs of this old town are deep-grooved in business, in politics, in society and in church activities. Can the city be cleansed by using the old channels? Or must new channels be digged? Is the conventional appeal worn out? Can the earnest pastor on the field reach the conscience of the community beyond the borders of his own parish?

Can God save Springfield by sending his grace "like the dew of the morning," or must it come like an earthquake?

This is the question the preachers and church people have been asking for a number of years. Billy Sunday is their latest answer to it. They are trying the earthquake. They have been more than five years getting their consent to have the earthquake. Twice within our knowledge they have voted down resolutions to invite the evangelist. Meantime they tried various things. But Springfield remained about the same. Meantime also Decatur had the earthquake, and Jacksonville and Bloomington. They recommended it to Springfield. It will shock and tear you, they said, but it will do you good.

So Springfield churches got together. The ministers who had voted against Mr. Sunday's coming in previous years, said, "Let him come. We are not doing much by our conventional methods. Maybe our judgment about methods is too narrow. Maybe God uses methods to get His work done that we do not reckon on. Let Billy Sunday come." And they went to work with a will to prepare for his coming. I observed these ministers on the platform on the opening nights of the meeting. They are sensitive men. Their faces were an interesting study to me. I will not say what I read there.

Next week I shall write of Billy Sunday as a preacher. Further articles will follow the meetings through their six weeks duration, examining methods and results. The evangelist's prayer on the first night of the revival, a few minutes after he had been horsewhipped by an insane man was as follows:

Rev Billy Sunday's Prayer.

"O, Lord, let us have all Springfield at Your feet. Let Your blessings rest on all. Miss none, black or white, rich or poor, Christian or sinner, native or foreigner, we beseech of Thee. We pray that a tidal wave of religion will sweep over this town, and that the foundations of hell shall tremble, the demons of the pit turn tail and the devil have pneumonia.

"We pray that God will bare His arm and that the slain will be many. In this crisis we pray that the liar will be made to tell the truth; that the drunkard will become sober; that the woman who sells her virtue for gain will become pure and that coming face to face with the conditions, that peace and joy will abide with us. Bless the ministers, bless the choir, bless the reporters, bless the ushers and every man and woman in this building. Do wonderful things for Springfield. We pray for the enemy that would strike down. We wish him no ill, no hard feelings.

"O, God, save Illinois. Save her from north to south. Save her from Peoria to Danville. Save her from Cairo to —what is the name of that town, Fred, where Grant used to live?—Oh, yes, Galena, to Galena. O, Lord, sweep over her hills. Save the saloonkeepers. I don't hate them. You know that, God. It is their business that I hate. I hate it with every drop of my blood, every wink of my eye, with every step that I take. I don't hate the men. Save them. Save them. Save them. We ask your blessing upon them. Hear us and bless us, as we praise Thy Son, whom having not seen, we love. Amen."

A Prayer by George Matheson

"O Thou eternal one, I need Thee for time. They are always telling me that earth is the robing room in which to prepare for heaven. Rather hast Thou said that neaven is the robing room in which to prepare for earth. It is within Thy sanctuary that I am armed for the battle of life; it is in meeting my God that I learn to meet my brother. I am not fit for this world till I have seen the other world; I must go up to the mount ere I give laws to the people. It is from behind the veil of eternity that I speak to the things of time. I could not bear the fretting of the shore were it not for the sight of the sea. I could not stand the murmur of the crowd were it not for the murmur of the shell. I should sink beneath the burden of the heat of the day unless I were refreshed by the spray from the ocean of Thy love. Roll in, then, thou great sea! Roll in upon the hot sands of time, and lave the thirsty land! Roll in upon the beach, and wash its impurities away! Let us hear the sound of Thy waves, and we shall bear the rumbling of earth's chariot wheels! He who has lain one moment on Thy breast is fit to tread the dusty courts of time."

A Momentous Ruling

The ruling of the United States Supreme Court in the New York City gas case was of popular interest because it involved the return of several millions to past users of gas. Beneath the surface it is found to be a very momentous ruling. It is one of those things of importance that come at the "psychological moment." The country is interested as never before in the encroachments of monopoly and has found that monopoly, by applying well thumbed rules of individualism to its claims, is able to make out a perplexing case.

The court rules that a monopoly has no claim to property rights in its franchise. This is a bomb against one of the chief ramparts. Such corporations have been used to capitalizing their franchise as if it were property acquired by their own creation. Of course it is acquired only by the free grant of the people, acting through their city councils or legislatures.

The second defense of privilege blown to atoms, is the claim of the right to capitalize what they call "good will." The court rules that "good will" is a good property right in the case of competing companies or individuals, but not of a monopoly to which the public must come.

The Gas Company was thus reduced to real property rights as measured by tangible physical values and six per cent was found to be a good and fair return on actual capital invested. Watered stock is therefore fictitious capital and the railroads and other natural monopolies that have cried that property is being confiscated when rate laws were passed ought to be compelled to charge profits on tangible physical values only. Let it be always remembered that monopoly rights and the rights of competitive concerns are very different things.

The Trust and the Inevitable

J. Pierpont Morgan is credited with a sort of "after us the deluge" spirit. In answer to the question "What is to be the end of this era of trusts and concentration of wealth?" he said, "The end will be socialism."

However that may be, there is ample late evidence that the trust is recognizing the inevitable. That inevitable is that either we will return to competition or the trust will be regulated by the state, both as to management and prices. They know that a monopoly cannot long hope to operate under the rules of competition so far as management and public privileges are concerned and make an end of competition so far as its patrons, that same public, is concerned. In other words they cannot destroy competition and yet operate under the laws of competition.

This is evidenced in the cases of both the Harvester Trust in Kansas and the Standard Oil Trust in Missouri. Both were fined and had notice of ouster from the states served upon them. Both propose to the respective states that they be allowed to continue a business under state supervision, with the right accorded the state to revise prices and regulate business. This gives the state governments a new problem and they might as well blaze the way. Co-operation will not yield again to competition once it is established, and the trust is but co-operation among those concerned. The iniquity of it lies in the fact that it is a co-operation of one party to the bargain only and this means exploitation of the other party. The patron must have a part in the co-operation. The socialist would have him own it and the paternalist would leave it in private hands, but subject it to the paternal control of government. It looks as if the paternalist had the first move.

Desire of Service

By Stephen Tracy Livingston.

Could I but know, beyond all questioning,
That what I am, or, rather, what I strive
To be, means help to you, and keeps alive
At times the strength or cheer or other thing
You greatly crave, the thought would straightway bring Large days for me. Old gladness would revive,
And with a scourge of cords arise and drive
Alien distrust forth from my temple, fling
The coinage of life's market-language out,
And sound the note of triumph. Could I know
That something I have done, or some chance word
Of mine has come to you, in hours of doubt,
And lighted up the path where you must go,
I could forget how often I have erred.

Side Lights on Serious Problems

AS SEEN FORM A PASTOR'S STUDY.

By H. O. Pritchard

Rome and Her Heretics

The recent discussion within our "household of faith," is one of no little importance to the "family of God." While it may be granted that the question discussed was, in a large measure, one of expediency, and the views expressed only matters of opinion, yet we must admit that underneath this little disturbance there is a serious problem. It is the old ever-new problem of causing ultra and radical to dwell together under the same roof-tree in peace. It is the problem which ultimately lies at the bottom of all our heated controversy of recent years.

So serious does this problem seem to the pastor—knowing as he does the church history of all similar struggles—that during the recent controversy he spent many hours in the study, thinking over the implications and complications and praying the great Father that somehow he shall cause his children to love each other so much that they will forget that they are "liberal" or "conservative." And we believe that he will. We are rejoicing to know that the calm has again come, and we trust that it shall abide.

Scout and Vanguard in Same Camp.

This fundamental problem of adjustment —the problem of bringing the theological scout and the vanguard into the same camp, a problem that arises out of a difference of temperament and training—is not new. It is as old as the Council at Jerusalem. It is not the first time it has arisen among our own people and we fear it will not be the last time.

And to those who are pained by such unseemly controversies there is a sort of morbid consolation in the fact that this problem of adjustment is not peculiar to our people. Each of the great Protestant bodies is today passing through some crisis arising from this underlying difference of viewpoint. There are theological inquirers, in most of the Protestant bodies, who are met with some conservative infallibility which places before them the painful dilemma, "Give up your ideas, or give up your church life." Men there are too, in each, who are "defending the faith" against those who have ventured beyond the border line of some biblical criticism and whose teachings have become destructive of the basis of Christianity.

Rome's Struggle With Modernism.

Even the church of Rome is no exception to this general struggle, and is now gravely concerned with "Modernism." And paradoxical as it seems there is a certain parallelism between the controversy in the Church of Christ and the contention in the Church of Rome; and by a careful study of "Modernism," there will be seen some illuminating "sidelights on our serious problem." We shall attempt a brief study here. We wish to express our indebtedness to Newman Smyth, for the facts here presented.

First of all a pertinent question to ask is: what is "Modernism?" This apt term is used to designate a movement, a school of thought, a propaganda, within the ranks of the Catholic church. The movement can be defined from two sides—the practical and the theological. From the practical side Modernism aims at the rejuvenation of the Roman church. The Modernists seek a new Catholicism, and are therefore calling themselves Neo-Catholics. They believe that the church is out of touch with modern thought, and that it can be, and ought to be made modern in its thought and adapt its teachings to the demands of the age. In brief, they would "arm the church with the weapons of the age."

Defining Modernism.

Theologically, it is more difficult to define, for the Modernists themselves are not quite clear as to its full implications; and this is to their advantage since it saves them from a break with the doctrines of the mother church at any definite point. However, the Modernists say they cannot breathe the atmosphere of the scholastics—they must have freer air. Or to change the figure, they believe that "the framework of St. Thomas Aquinas's syllogisms has been broken to pieces, on the wind-swept flood of modern thought." They insist, therefore, upon the freedom to search the rubbish heap to find the vital foundation of all the rites and dogmas of the church. They maintain the right of private judgment; but for the church, the directive authority lies in the collective Christian consciousness of the whole body of believers, rather than in the consciousness of any individual—even the Pope.

They affirm that it is not the province of faith to determine the facts of history. It can only interpret them. Science and history must ascertain the facts. Hence they make use of the historical scientific method of Bible study to know what the facts are.

Against this liberal movement stand all the conservative powers of the church. The machinery of the greatest ecclesiasticism the world has ever known, has been put in motion to counteract it and eradicate it. Pius X. has declared that it must be driven out. He affirms "Modernism will not penetrate among you. If it comes, say, 'Get thee behind me Satan.'" The papal ban has been hurled with deadly intent at the heads of all known Modernists. The encyclical has been sent forth and read, and read again, and still again.

What Rome Does With Heretics.

The struggle in the open is now one year old and thus far, what has been the result? A few who had dared to speak, have lapsed into a temporary silence. Some who refused to keep still have been banished. Don Murri, that brilliant young patriot and social reformer, has been sent into exile near Fermo. A few scholarly periodicals have been put out. Some university professors have been removed from their chairs. Tyrrell in England, Loisy in France, Bartoli in Italy, and Engert in Germany, have each had the sword of excommunication suspended over their heads. However, none seem to fear its falling. The old weapon has lost its terror. Moreover, as ever before, "the blood of martyrs" is becoming "the seed of the church;" and the parable of the leaven is being proved anew. Where a year ago there seemed only patches of light, at present the illumination seems well diffused.

Publications have been forbidden only to increase their circulation. The forbidden "Programme of the Modernists" has been printed in a new and enlarged edition. A lecture delivered by a professor at Innsbruck was confiscated, only to cause forty-three editions to be printed. This movement, as with all other "enlightenments," has the university as its center. Luther was a university professor when he began his reformation. Calvin was a brilliant professor in the University of Paris. The "Enlightenment" in England had famous old Oxford as its birthplace, and what is more significant to Disciples, "The Declaration and Address" was written by an Irish school-master. The Roman church has therefore centered its attack against Modernism in the universities. But this attack has caused thousands of liberal German students to strike in behalf of the freedom of academic teaching. The authorities undertook to remove Professor Wahrmund from the chair of canonical law at Innsbruck, but they were powerless to carry out their purpose. Hence it would seem that the war of extermination has only served to scatter and promulgate the very ideas they would repress.

Why Heretics Remain in the Church.

But why, we ask, do not these men leave the church when they find themselves so much out of sympathy with its traditional policies and thirteenth century tenets? Why do they want to appear where they are not wanted, and still persist in speaking when the majority is against them? The Modernist answers, because to do otherwise would mean to fail in our purpose. They feel that they are friends of the church and not enemies, loyalists and not rebels. Their movement is not a dogmatic challenge, but a vitalizing program. They are seeking to charge the old body with new life, and therefore the hope of the church lies in their remaining within its pale. Abbe Loisy declares: "I have always regarded it as my duty to remain in the church." Tyrrell says, "I abhor runaway solutions." The Modernists in Italy proclaim, "We follow at all times the practice of the Catholic worship, together with the people; we celebrate the rites, we live in the midst of the same religious life although we believe differently, our ideality changed."

Can Progress be Made Without Division?

What will be the outcome? Will the church succeed in arresting its spread? We do not believe she will. As well might she undertake to stop the moon in its course as to undertake to beat back this flood-tide of modern life and light. But will the Modernists succeed? Can they accomplish their reform in the church? We cannot tell as yet; the perspective is not sufficient to judge the outcome. But when we remember that nearly every reform, starting within has ended in a division without, we fear the Modernists may be forced to meet the same fate, with respect to the mother church, as did the Protestant reformation of the sixteenth century, and the old Catholic secession of our own time. It may be that another religious body will be added to the already numerous denominations of a divided church. It is this phase of the subject which makes this whole problem so serious. We await time's decision with great anxiety.

OUR CHURCH MEN

By John R. Ewers

Youngstown, Ohio

Brotherhoods Organizing Everywhere

A Typical Presidential Address.

Botherhoods are forming all over our communion. A strong virile note is being struck. Here is one of the reports which has recently come to my hand. The First Church, Springfield, Ill., with F. W. Burnham pastor has begun a club. One hundred men were present at the initial banquet. R. F. Thrapp and Dr. Hugh T. Morrison were the speakers. The new president, Jacob M. Appel gave the following address. It was a stirring speech and shows how our laymen feel. We shall expect great reports from this club:

Members of the Brotherhood, Friends and Brethren: I accept this gavel this evening both with a feeling of pride and with a sense of regret. I am proud of the distinction, the honor, the responsibility which you have thrust upon me in electing me your first president of this young but promising organization. My regrets are that I have not for you an inaugural message fitting for this auspicious occasion, and that in handing me this gavel, Brother Kane, your temporary chaimman, could not have transferred to me at the same time the poise, the dignity, and the parliamentary knowledge with which he is so generously blessed and possessed.

A young clergyman visited Joliet a number of Sundays ago, and while there was invited to address the boarders of the Illinois Hotel. This hostelry, you will remember, has a high rock wall built around it; the sexes are segregated; there are no fire "escapes," and the guests are obliged to work for their board. Arriving a little late, he was ushered into the chapel, and finding himself face to face with about fifteen hundred men (an unusual situation for a minister) he was somewhat flustrated and only half consciously opened his remarks by saying: "My friends, I am highly pleased and feel greatly complimented by seeing so many of you here this morning."

Brethren, believe me, I, too, am highly pleased and feel greatly complimented by seeing so many of you here this evening. But note the contrast; on that occasion the attendance was forced; tonight, on your part it is voluntary. In this clergyman's case he was facing an aggregation of criminals; men who had sinned against both God and man; men who were suffering the just penalty for violation of the law of the land. In my case I am greeted by an assemblage of Springfield's choicest manhood, men of civic patriotism, men who have confessed the Christ, Christian men; you, who by your presence here tonight, evidence a desire and a willingness to join hands and hearts in an organized brotherhood, for the cause of Christ and in the interest of our old sweetheart—The First Christian Church of Springfield.

I shall not dwell upon the purposes of this organization. To attempt to set them forth more clearly and forcibly than did Brother Burnham on your application card would be a waste of time. But it may be well to remind ourselves of and to emphasize the need of a men's organization in this church. In war, in business, in politics, men band themselves together and accomplish great things. Why not in the church? This church points with pride to its various women's organizations; their value to and influence upon the same. Why do we men sit idly by and "let the women do the work, do the work, do the work?" What a forcible reminder Brother Burnham gave us a few Sundays ago, when, in a sermon, he called our attention to the fact that when the Savior was on earth he surrounded himself with men; he selected men to carry on his work; and he placed directly upon the shoulders of twelve men the responsibility of spreading the gospel to the uttermost parts of the earth.

Every day you and I notice an advertisement of more than ordinary interest. Time and again have I been attracted by a large sign board along the streets of Chicago advertising a certain brand of cigars. You have seen it. It bears the picture of the great single-taxer, Henry George, and the words "I am for men." In the capacity of usher I stand in the rear of the auditorium of this church. Before me I behold a sea of ribbons, flowers, feathers and birds—the headgear of loyal, faithful, Christian women—and occasionally on an end seat or sandwiched in the middle, there crops out the bald pate of some good, pious brother. Immediately that sign board looms up before me, and I am amused as in my imagination I nail that sign board over the church door and over the pulpit, "I am for men, I am for men." I tell you, brethren, what this Brotherhood needs to do primarily is to awaken, to revive, to stir to action, the men of this old Christian Church, and by the grace of God, with your determination and your co-operation, I believe we can do it.

Again, brethren, until we extend to woman the right of suffrage what can we expect from the church as a factor in civic reform, in the cleansing and upbuilding of municipal government with a bunch of sleepy, inactive, indifferent men. Only ten days ago I visited the State of Arkansas. On the Tennessee side there lies the city of Memphis, a thriving metropolis of one hundred and fifty thousand souls, the second largest cotton market in the world. But, strange, there, directly on the other side of the river, we find the St. Francis Valley, practically a wilderness, inhabited by the wild turkey, the deer and the bear. Only recently the building of the levee has reclaimed this vast territory of alluvial soil from the annual floods of the Mississippi. Now and then there is a cleared spot in cultivation bearing evidence of a fine crop of cotton. As I gazed over this great wild tract stripped, as it is, largely, of its valuable timber, and thought of its fertility, its productiveness and its possibility for agricultural purposes, I said to myself, what this country needs is men, men, not the easy-going, indolent native negro who toils only when the larder is empty, not the parasitical white man who seeks to thrive on the labor of his black brother, but strong, brave, energetic, progressive men; men with the axe and the plow, transforming this wilderness into fields of corn and cotton.

Visit with me the prosperous, historic city of Springfield, the capital of the great State of Illinois. Over yonder on beautiful Oak Ridge lies the city of the dead, with the tomb of the great Emancipator and the granite shaft erected to his memory. In the very shadow of that monument just across the avenue a number of blocks to the southeast, there lies the moral wilderness of Springfield; the law-defying, youth-destroying Sunday saloon; the open gambling house, the negro crap den, the house of prostitution and ill fame. "And by their fruits ye shall know them." In the very heart of that city is forming a howling, rebellious mob, inciting a race riot, defying the authorities and placing the entire populace at its mercy. Property is destroyed, the torch is applied, homes of panic-stricken women and children are robbed and burned, innocent men are wounded, maimed and murdered. What does Springfield need? Billy Sunday? Yes, God bless him, but more than him. Like the wild St. Francis Valley, Springfield needs men, men; brave, strong, energetic, progressive men; aye, Springfield needs more than that; Springfield needs organized Christian men.

"God give us men, a time like this demands
Pure hearts, strong minds, true faith and willing hands.
Men whom the lust of office does not kill,
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy.
Men who possess opinions and a will,
Men who have honor, men who will not lie,
For while the rabble with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their loud professions and their little deeds,
Wrangle in selfish strife—Lo, Freedom weeps,
Wrong rules the land and waiting Justice weeps."

My friends, the harvest time is here; only a few weeks till the Sunday revivals; only a few months till the spring elections. Let us don our working clothes and be up and doing. Let us pull together to make this Brotherhood the star of its kind in the city; the livest wire in the church and Sunday-school; the corner stone of a new building; the fighting guard of our brilliant General Burnham—an organized, equipped and standing army, defensive and offensive, "for God, for home, for native land." Let our slogan be

For the world, Christianity
For the church, Loyalty
For ourselves, Activity

Let us here and now dedicate to this newborn Brotherhood, the beautiful lines of the poet who said:

"The crest and crowning of all good
Life's final star is Brotherhood;
Our hope is in heroic men,
Star led to build the world again,
To this event the ages ran,
Make way for Brotherhood,
Make way for man."

A tramp passing through the waiting-room of the North Western depot at Milwaukee spied a small enameled pin lying on the floor. He picked it up, looked it over in a careless way, and pinned it on the lapel of his coat. The same tramp, a few moments later, was hit and knocked into unconsciousness by a switch engine in the freight yards, just outside the depot. The trainmen picked him up and telephoned to police headquarters for an ambulance.

"What did you say his name was?" came over the telephone from the desk sergeant.

"Don't know. The man is unconscious," replied the switchman.

"Any papers on him by which you can identify him?" asked the sergeant.

"Not a thing," 'phoned back the switchman.

"Does he belong to any lodge or union?" inquired the sergeant.

"Hold the line till I take a look," replied the switchman, and in a moment the desk sergeant was greatly surprised to receive this information:

"Yes; he is a Lady Maccabee."—Everybody's Magazine.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

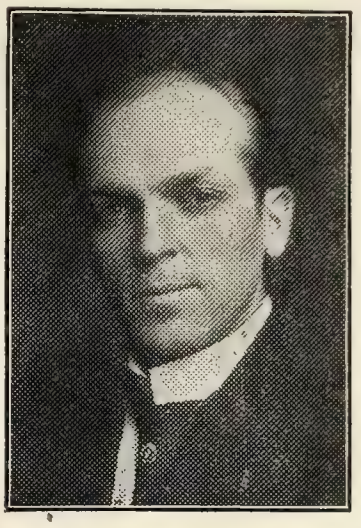
An Interview With Evangelist Scoville

Evangelist Charles Reign Scoville after concluding a meeting, with something over a thousand additions, in the Central Church, Des Moines, is now in the second week of a meeting with the University Place Church. This church, which has the largest membership of any of our churches has just completed an auditorium with seating capacity of 3,000. The old church, which was a large one, is still retained for Sunday-school, prayer-meeting, etc., and is connected by two or three doors with the new auditorium. There is no church in Chicago that will seat 3,000, at least, not to my knowledge.

A Colony of Disciples.

The Disciples have colonized University Place, Des Moines. They have common ownership of property—in part. No! They are not socialists; but Drake University and the University Place Church and Brother Medbury are owned in common by all. Individual deeds are given for the separate homes. The church, the big home, however, is on the socialistic basis of ownership. Hundreds, even thousands, perhaps, of Disciples from towns and farms all over the land have been attracted to this colony of Disciples. To go from the heterogeneity of Chicago to the homogeneity of University Place is to go from a foreign country to the home land. The people there have common interests. They read the same religious papers. They think alike. The colony spirit possesses them. Their conversation is comfortably home-like. I write of the majority. Even in the best of colonies there are some daring experimentalists. In every Utopia there are the few that dream of higher Utopias far beyond. These few give a dash of color to the somberness of the average place. Their mission is to keep the circulation good by contributing the exhileration of their genius. The college professor is apt to roam in wide fields, but he too is often a home-loving body. Nowhere in the world is there such a colony of Disciples as at University Place, Des Moines. Most door posts have the magic mark of the brotherhood upon them. The guardian angel of our cause notes with delight that the homes of the Philistines are continually decreasing. Not only is here our largest church, but also our largest school, and our best; for were not some of us graduated from her halls?

It is here that Evangelist Scoville, with his several assistants, at present, is holding a meeting which bids fair to be the largest ever held in our brotherhood. It was my good fortune to be at the meetings three nights. At each service the large auditorium was well filled, and I was told that on Sundays it is taxed.



The Evangelist Interviewed.

I do not attempt to report the meetings; but as Brother Scoville granted us an interview I am happy to report his answers. As Brother Scoville's success and methods are well known I thought best not to confine the questions to methods, etc., but to ask some questions that would reveal the inner soul of this successful evangelist.

Brother Scoville is quick to answer. He hesitates not a moment. He almost intuitively divines your meaning, and continues to answer till you have another question ready. Questions and answers follow:—

"Does the importance of your work grow upon you? Do you feel increasingly the responsibility of so mide a ministry?"

"Yes indeed. In every meeting there are such marvellous transformations of lives that I am unable to realize the importance and the power of the Gospel. It mightily saves. I tell you when a fellow is right down at the bottom and the Gospel comes and makes a man of him in every respect you come to know its power and come, too, to feel the responsibility of faithfully proclaiming it. I could not endure the strenuous work if it were not for the satisfaction I get out of seeing lives that were blasted and broken made beautiful and whole."

CHARLES REIGN SCOVILLE

"How about your own spiritual culture? Do the meetings give you the devotions you need."

"No. Public work will not take the place of private devotions. Life is a unit. Every day should be begun aright. Mrs. Scoville and I have prayer together every morning and evening. We do our spiritual reading separately. We never go to a service without first having been in private prayer. When we get up against a hard proposition, when there seems to be no open door, we go to the Lord in prayer. You can explain it as you will, but after hard praying the door has never failed to open. Devotion is more than prayer—it is also giving—we never fail to give the Lord a portion of all our receipts. If we could teach the devotion of giving to all church members the Kingdom would soon come in power. We make much of preparatory prayer services in our meetings."

"What is your main object in preaching?"

"To convict rather than convince. The people know already more than they are living. We need life more than doctrine. Doctrine, of course, is important as having a bearing on life; but Christian life is the aim of the preacher. The emphasis today is upon righteousness, and properly so."

"The social reformer today is having much attention. How do you compare the importance of your work with his?"

"Christ's plan is the best. He sought the regeneration of the individual. When all individuals are right with Christ our social questions will be solved."

"Many church members are the social sinners, are they not?"

"Yes, there are counterfeit and genuine church members. The kingdom is much hindered by false church members. They need regeneration."

"In your experience, what have you found as the chief reason why many men do not go to church?"

"A sore spot in their lives. They do not wish to have their conscience irritated by the sermon and the church services. Consequently we must go after them personally, through friendship, and stay with them until they are willing to have their sins cleansed by Christ, the Savior. The treatment of healing the sore must be thorough going."

Men and the Church.

"Are men as easily reached as women? What is your proportion among your converts?"

"In this meeting there have been more men and boys. Generally the numbers are about equal. The church has not reached men as largely as it might, because we have not used men. Send men after men and we will get results."

"What kind of preaching will win today?"

"Unselfish preaching. That which sinks the preacher, and exalts the Christ. The preacher's business is to lead others to see the winsomeness and know the power of Christ. We have spent too much time in getting men to our position rather than to a personal Saviour."

"Do you notice much difference in the various sections of the country or in classes?"

"No; all are sinners. The boulevards need the Gospel as well as the slums. Sin began in a garden, not in an alley. There is as much sin under silks as under home-spun. I preach to convict all."

"Do you do much personal work in a meeting?"

"I have to do considerable if I am to be an effective preacher. Christ kept close to the people. He knew them and preached to their needs. Even more necessary is it for us to know what the people are thinking about. I talk with all sorts and conditions."

A Student Though an Evangelist.

"Do you read much during a meeting; or is your mind so on your work that you cannot get in the mood to read?"

"I carry a whole trunk full of books everywhere I go. I read widely. I believe the more I know about things that interest men, the more effective I can be in reaching them. I seek to be versatile. Often after a meeting I read magazines or books that are entirely foreign to evangelism. In this way I get rest and refreshment."

"Do you still believe in union meetings?"

"Yes, properly conducted."

"Who is the greatest evangelist outside of our church?"

"Gypsy Smith is the best and Chapman second. Gypsy Smith's power is in tenaciously holding to Christ and the Bible, adapting himself to the hearts of the people and in refusing to bind himself by a hard and fast program in his meetings."

"Why do some evangelists fail?"

"They do not know the audience. When I started in evangelistic work I made a close study of the men who had succeeded and of those who were succeeding. They all knew the temper and spirit of the audience."

"Do you find a type of people in every community not appealed to by evangelistic meetings?"

"No, not a type. There are always some indifferent people who are so selfish that they have no concern for another's salvation. Those people substitute a club for a church."

"How many converts have you had in all your meetings?"

"I have no record. In the last three years about 40,000."

"Do you have more calls than you can answer?"

"Yes, I had to refuse 300 calls to come here."

Secret of Modern Success.

"Why do our evangelists hold larger meetings now than in times gone by?"

"Our churches are larger. Cities are larger. Methods are more systematic. Meetings are planned for on a larger scale, and in a more systematic way."

"What assets does a meeting bring to a church?"

"It makes the church preacher known. Wonderfully increases the membership and the income. Puts the grace of God in all hearts. Gives the spirit of conquest to all. After the meeting at the Central, the new converts subscribed $3,500 a year for current expenses."

"Do the converts remain faithful? Do the audiences keep up?"

"That depends upon the preacher and the church. There should be much instruction and work for the new converts. Where the churches are alive there is no letting down. Too many churches look to the glorious past rather than the glorious future."

Some literary man has written of a society, in an American college, called the Laodicean Club. No member is admitted that has a strong conviction on any subject. No enthusiasm is tolerated. The motto of the club is "but," indicating that every statement needs modification.

Evangelist Scoville is not a member of this society. He is positive, definite, single in his purpose. He is on fire to construct and upbuild. There is no kinship between him and the lukewarm. When he is for, he is for; when he is against, he is against. He is a builder. As I sat in the audience and saw him on the platform, I realized that the toil of the years is weighing upon him. He looks more serious, and somewhat more careworn. There is a new pathos and tenderness in his look and voice. How could it be otherwise? Zinzendorf said: "I have but one passion, and it is He, only He." Evangelist Scoville, I think, must like this cry of the great Moravian.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

Does Micah 5:2, "But thou, Bethlehem Ephrathah, who art little to be among the thousands of Judah, out of thee shall come forth to me he that is to be ruler in Israel," refer to Christ? If so, why does Verse 6 say "and he shall deliver thee from the Assyrian"? T. M. H.

This is one of the familiar prophecies referring to the future of Israel and its glory in the times of deliverance. It was considered Messianic, as is shown by the answer of the scribes to Herod's question as to where the King of the Jews was to be born. The prophet had in mind the Messianic king who was to arise, but he also had in mind the present danger of Judah in his own time, which was contemorary with Isaiah and the Assyrian invasion by Sennacherib. From all such dangers he conceives the coming king will be able to deliver the nation. It is not strange that Messianic prophecy often takes the form of reverence to what seemed wholly local and immediate matters. The prophets were concerned primarily with their own times and not with the distant future. But they saw the purposes of God unfolding in such a manner as to give them hope of national deliverance and prosperity, and in such terms they are accustomed to describe the blessings of the Messiah's reign. They did not know the time or the circumstances in which the Messiah would come. They only knew that God's promise of future blessing could be trusted.

Is it wrong for Christians to ride on street cars, trains, and in carriages on Sunday, when this causes other people to work and thus miss the opportunity of attending religious service? W. F. B.

This is a question which the enlightened Christian conscience alone can answer in reference to individual duty. There are conscientious Christians who decline to avail themselves of any of these means of transportation on the ground that they involve Sunday labor. On the other hand, the general welfare and convenience of the public and even the work of the kingdom of God seem to require some labor on the Lord's day. It is evident that this labor could be very much reduced if only that which was essential to the welfare of the public in the matter of food distribution and transportation were the limits beyond which such labors were restricted. It seems reasonable that the limited use of such activities should be approved. But all labor upon the first day of the week should be adjusted to the absolute requirements of the public, rather than placed upon the ordinary basis of an irreligious Sunday. More than this, it is quite possible to provide all Sunday workers with such opportunities for rest on this day as will make worship possible, occasionally at least.

What is the meaning of Jesus' words in Luke 6:30: "Give to every man that asketh of thee; and of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again"? Inquirer.

It was a part of the method of Jesus to state the principles of the kingdom of God in striking, even extreme form. Nothing is more interesting than the study of his ways of arousing attention and even shocking the minds of his hearers by the abruptness and severity of his words. He knew that it required more than the mild statement of truth to arouse attention and create character; therefore his puzzling sayings about the camel and the needle's eye, the necessity for eating his flesh and drinking his blood, the abandonment of father, mother, wife and children, and the curses pronounced upon the rich. These were sayings whose severity was the very means adopted by the Lord to arouse and regenerate the conscience of his time. Similar is the text cited by the questioner. It was apparently never Jesus' intention that such words should be taken literally, in spite of such interpretations as those of Count Tolstoy and others. Jesus was no extremist, and he would be the last to advise that one should give indiscriminately to every beggar, and should give no heed to the ordinary precautions necessary to insure himself against fraud. But what he did mean to teach so emphatically that he could not be misunderstood was that generous treatment begets generosity, that kindness is the seed which bears fruit in love and mercy, and that only by such conduct can the kingdom of God come in the earth. The best proof that such words of Jesus are to be taken not in a literal sense but as a striking method of emphasizing a great truth is found in the fact that all the generations have found in this interpretation of his teachings their sanest and most inspiring guidance, and that the world is gradually accepting his definitions of conduct as the only satisfactory way of life.

"I have recently heard it stated that the nation's request for a king at the close of Samuel's career as a prophet was really a great compliment to the prophet's own ability in organizing the people and preparing them to demand a king. How does this harmonize with I Samuel 8:6, which says that "the thing displeased Samuel"?

Chicago. Bible Student.

Two different accounts are given to us of the attitude of Samuel toward the kingship. One is presented in the passage which the questioner cites from Chap. 8; the other is given in Mhap. 9 where Samuel takes the initiative in the selection of a king at the command of God. Both stories apparently were told in ancient Israel and both have been included by the compilers of our book of I Samuel. Which of the two approaches nearer the facts we have no means of knowing. From the standpoint of the later emphasis upon the greatness of the prophet's work and criticism on the monarchy, Samuel's surprise and regret would be the natural interpretation of the facts. There are many instances in the Old Testament in which two narratives, presenting widely different points of view and still dealing with the same set of facts, are put side by side by the compilers of the documents.

"How could the Pharisees continue to deny that Christ was the Son of God when they saw and heard of the miracles he performed?" B.

We cannot suppose that the mere performance of a work of wonder, such as those which had taken place in Jesus' life, was in itself a convincing proof of a divine nature or message. If we are to trust Jewish sources, the age of Jesus was one in which many men arose with just such credentials to secure popular approval. Magic was one of the common arts of all antiquity. The distinction between the signs wrought by imposters and those of our Lord was not always made by the people who looked on. Even Old Testament narratives point out such distinctions, as in the case of the signs wrought by Moses in the court of Pharaoh and those performed with equal facility by the Egyptian magicians. The wonder of Jesus' actions does not lie merely in their astonishing nature but in their motive and purpose. They were a part of the revelation of his character. He deliberately chose not to work mere wonders but to make his miracles the expression of his loving and gracious spirit. There were much stronger reasons why the Pharisees ought to have believed in him than merely because of his miracles. His teachings, his character, and his purposes for the nation were all proofs of far greater urgency and decisiveness than any works of healing which he wrought. Yet the rejection of all these appeals shows to what hardness the human mind may come when prepossessed by selfish interests and especially by jealousy.

A Proposition to Give $100,000 to Bethany College

I have just received a letter, over the signature of a gentleman who is in every way financially responsible for the promise he makes, in which, referring to Bethany College, West Virginia, he says:

"For every $100,000.00 raised for the endowment fund for said College, between now and October 1, I will give $25,000.00 provided, however, the amount raised is not over $400,000.00. This I think you will understand means:

Should there be raised $100,00.00 I will give $25,000.00

Should there be raised $200,000.00 I will give $50,000.00.

Should there be raised $300,000.00 I will give $75,000.00.

Should there be raised $400,000.00 I will give $100,000.00.

Now this ought to set all the friends of Bethany College on fire. If the money is not raised now, surely we are unworthy of the great heritage which our fathers have left us. This generous proposition is accompanied with the request that I shall not publish the name of the donor, but I can assure the brotherhood, that this is a bona fide offer from one who is abundantly competent to redeem every pledge he makes. I wish I could announce his name. His very name would add enthusiasm to the people who hear of his splendid offer.

Now, brethren, will you respond to this great proposition and do so immediately? Send your pledges, or your money or your negotiable note, to the St. Louis Union Trust Company, St. Louis, Mo., or the Mercantile Trust Company, Pittsburg, Pa., or if you prefer to do so, send to me, at Columbia, Mo., or to President Cramblett of Bethany College. So you heed this call, and heed it liberally, it makes no very great difference to which place the money is sent, as you will promptly receive a receipt for the same, wherever sent. Remember, brethren, that all these gifts are recorded in the book which will be on exhibition at our Centennial celebration at Pittsburg, and in the Bethany College library afterward, as a memorial of this great Centennial fund for Bethany College.

Religion and Education

Apropos of a recent editorial upon the above theme it is interesting to note the appearance from the MacMillan press of "A History of Education before the Middle Ages" by Prof. Frank Pierrepont Graves, Ohio State University. This volume is the first of what is to be a series of text books dealing comprehensively with the whole subject. It will be specially interesting to ministers to note the large consideration Prof. Graves has given to Religion in the influence it has had upon the development of Education. For one whose special interest is education the author exhibits an unusual interest in and acquaintance with the history of religious development.

The thesis of the book is that since education is the gradual realization of a world purpose, the history of education will be best treated from the standpoint of progress. Accordingly the volume is divided into two parts—I. Non-progressive Education. II. The Beginnings of Individualism in Education. It is sought to indicate how those social and educational ideals that determine progress are developed among various peoples. When the educational aim is perceived it then remains to trace the attempts that were made to realize them and to estimate the results.

Those ancient peoples among which the social habits and traditions completely dominated the individual are treated under the head of Non-progressive education, e. g., Nature peoples, Barbaric, Egypt, Babylonia and Assyria, China, India and Persia. With the Jews, Greeks and Romans Prof. Graves finds the beginnings of Individualism and so of Progressive education. A few extracts from the chapters upon Jewish and Early Christian education must serve to indicate the importance of these religions from the educational standpoint.

"The education of the Jews was the typical religious and moral training of antiquity, and through it they became the religious people par excellence. As soon as he was old enough to understand, even before his formal training in the school room, every Jew had ingrained in him the idea of Jehovah as a God of moral attributes, who is in touch with man and requires of him righteous conduct as the ground of approval. Human personality he learned to regard as a reflection of the divine. Such conceptions of God, man, righteousness and duty are easily seen to be far nobler than any that had previously been formulated among the other peoples of the Orient. Through them a new factor, the development of moral personality, was introduced into education" (italics mine) p. 133.

"Had their (the Jews') ethical ideals been kept clear of excessive ceremonial, formalism and narrowness of view, and developed as in the days of the prophets, they might indeed have become 'the light of the world.' As it is, they gave birth to the great religion which was needed to emancipate them from the bondage of form and restricted vision, and which has made its resistless way to all nations," p. 135.

"The world had need of a wider view and a larger bond of unity. Judaea, Greece and Rome had to pause after establishing the beginnings of individualism and progress. But new ideals were destined to be found in the principles of Christ . . . . These teachings had their roots in Jewish soil . . . ; but they tended to strip away the ceremonialism and peculiar observances as unessential, and inculcated a broader interpretation of humanity," p. 274. "While it (essential Christianity) was not altogether understood by the primitive Christians and since their day has often been overlaid with trappings and subject to misconception, through it the road to universal individualism was opened, and full recognition given to personality and the right and need of every one to work out his own salvation," p. 275.

The book will be of high value as a text, and will be useful as a ready reference by all who are interested in the subject for whatever reason. Excellent bibliographies are appended to each of the separate chapters and an adequate index is supplied. Price $1.10 net.

The Sunday-School Man of Southern California

At the Magnolia Avenue Sunday School, Los Angeles, California.

E. W. Thornton inaugurated his work as Bible School specialist for Southern California with the Magnolia Avenue Bible School, the first Sunday in January. The meeting continued for two weeks; and a fine work was accomplished.

Bro. Thornton is proposing to do a kind of work among the churches which never before has been attempted. And while he himself considers the work to be in a somewhat experimental stage, yet its value and power in this one meeting have been so fully demonstrated as to leave no room for the question of its practical worth.

The addresses of Bro. Thornton lay great emphasis upon the educational phase of the Bible School as the church's only opportunity for systematic religious instruction. And from this point of view he approaches his work. His lectures upon child nature, and human nature in general, constitute a most delightful psychological study; yet made so interesting and popular as to hold the youngest listener with close attention. Not less interesting and fascinating is his method of presenting the pedagogical task of meeting the conditions and needs of the various types of mind and nature thus studied. These lectures are of great value to teachers and to parents.

Then from the practical point of view, Bro. Thornton is admirably fitted by experience and observation to take up "the Business end of the Sunday-school." He has thoroughly studied the questions of organization and management. He has visited the best schools throughout the country, and he speaks with authority in these matters. A visit from Bro. Thornton will lighten the labors of officer and teacher in the suggestions of new and better methods of work which he is able to suggest. He has studied these problems that confront the Bible School worker, and has something to suggest—and they are suggestions that work.

And then a visit from Bro. Thornton will arouse the entire membership of the church to a deeper and truer interest in the place and power of the Bible School. He believes in the Bible School, is enthusiastic about it, and has the faculty of leading others to think about the subject as he thinks. If his coming into our churches did no more than to awaken the membership to a proper appreciation of the tremendous opportunity it has in its Bible School, his coming would be a blessing. But he will do more than this. Make a place for him in your program at the earliest possible moment. He is a man with a message. Sincerely,

Jesse M. McKnight.

Gaining Ground

We are starting into the March offering for Foreign Missions with encouraging prospects. A host of friends are doing all in their power for success. Their genuine interest and loyal efforts are fully recognized and cordially appreciated. It is hoped every missionary church will be in line this Centennial year. There is too much at stake to stand aloof or to be indifferent. Our people have a great enterprise on heathen soil which is sure to suffer if not liberally supported. He expects his people to stand by it. It is in harmony with his eternal purposes. The friends of the work should keep it constantly in mind. It deserves their most prayerful consideration. We owe an imperative duty to the unevangelized nations of the earth.

The first five months of the missionary year show a gain in the total receipts of $13,089. The gain from the churches as churches amounts to more than $4,000. And there has been an all-around gain in the number of offerings, and also in the amount from each source with slight exceptions. This fact will, of course, cheer all Christian hearts and encourage our people to put forth a special effort during the month of March to make an even better record.

There is unusual interest in the Living-link campaign. Even before the time of the March offering, six new Living-link churches have reported definitely that the salary of a missionary has been provided. Never before have we been so encouraged in this special phase of the offering

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER VI

Anticipations.

It was late at night, and outside the prairie lay white and utterly silent under the arctic cold, when Maud Barrington, who glanced at it through the double windows, flung back the curtains with a little shiver, and turning toward the fire sat down on a little velvet footstool beside her aunt's knee. She had shaken out the coils of lustrous brown hair which flowed about her shoulders glinting in the light of the shaded lamp, and it was with a little gesture of physical content she stretched forth her hands toward the hearth. A crumbling birch log still gleamed redly amidst the feathery ashes, but its effect was chiefly artistic, for no open fire could have dissipated the cold of the prairie, and a big tiled stove, brought from Teutonic Minnesota, furnished the needful warmth.

The girl's face was partly in shadow, and her figure foreshortened by her pose, which accentuated its rounded outline and concealed its willowy slenderness; but the broad white forehead and straight nose became visible when she moved her head a trifle, and a faintly humorous sparkle crept into the clear brown eyes. Possibly Maud Barrington looked her best just then, for the lower part of the pale-tinted face was a trifle too firm in its modeling.

"No, I am not tired, aunt, and I could not sleep just now," she said. "You see, after leaving all that behind one, one feels, as it were, adrift, and it is necessary to realize one's self again."

The little silver-haired lady who sat in the big basket chair smiled down upon her, and laid a thin white hand that was still beautiful upon the gleaming hair.

"I can understand, my dear, and am glad you enjoyed your stay in the city, because sometimes when I count your birthdays I can't help a fancy that you are not young enough," she said. "You have lived out here with two old people who belong to the past too much."

The girl moved a little, and swept her glance slowly around the room. It was small and scantily furnished, though great curtains shrouded door and window, and here and there a picture relieved the bareness of the walls, which were paneled with roughly-dressed British-Columbia cedar. Colonel Barrington was a widower who had been esteemed a man of wealth, but the founding of Silverdale had made a serious inroad on his finances. Even yet, though he occasionally practiced it, he did not take kindly to economy.

"Yes," said the girl, "I enjoyed it all—and it was so different from the prairie."

There was comprehension, and a trace of sympathy, in Miss Barrrington's nod. "Tell me a little, my dear," she said. "There was not a great deal about it in your letters."

Her niece glanced dreamily into the sinking fire as though she would call up the pictures there. "But you know it all—the life I have only had glimpses of. Well, for the first few months I almost lost my head, and was swung right off my feet by the whirl of it. It was then I was, perhaps, just a trifle thoughtless."

The white-haired lady laughed softly. "It is difficult to believe it, Maud."

(Copyright, 1907, by F. A. Stokes Co.)

The girl shook her head reproachfully. "I know what you mean, and perhaps you are right, for that was what Toinette insinuated," she said. "She actually told me that I should be thankful I had a brain, since I had no heart. Still, at first I let myself go, and it was delightful—the opera, the dances, and the covered skating-rink with the music and the black ice flashing beneath the lights. The whir of the toboggans down the great slide was finer still, and the torchlight meets of the snowshoe clubs on the mountain. Yes, I think I was really young while it lasted."

"For a month," said the elder. "And after?"

"Then," said the girl slowly, "it all seemed to grow a trifle purposeless, and there was something that spoiled it. Toinette was quite angy and I know her mother wrote you—but it was not my fault, aunt. How was I, a guileless girl from the prairie, to guess that such a man would fing the handkerchief to me?"

The evenness of tone and entire absence of embarrassment was significant. It also pointed to the fact that there was a closer confidence between Maud Barrington and her aunt than often exists between mother and daughter, and the elder lady stroked the lustrous head that rested against her knee with a little affectionate pride.

"My dear, you know you are beautiful, and you have the cachet that all the Courthornes wear. Still, you could not like him? Tell me about him."

Maud Barrington curled herself up further. "I think I could have liked him, but that was all," she said. "He was nice to look at and did all the little things gracefully; but he never had done anything else, never would, and, I fancy, had never wanted to. Now a man of that kind would very soon pall on me, and I should have lost my temper trying to awaken him to his responsibilities."

"And what kind of man would please you?"

Maud Barrington's eyes twinkled, but the fact that she answered at all was a proof of the sympathy between herself and the questioner. "I do not know that I am anxious any of them should," she said. "But since you ask, he would have to be a man first: a toiling, striving animal who could hold his own amidst his fellows wherever he was placed. Secondly, one would naturally prefer a gentleman, though I do not like the word, and one would fancy the combination a trifle rare, because brains and birth do not necessarily tally, and the man educated by the struggle for existence is apt to be taught more than he ever would be at Oxford or in the army. Still, men of that stamp forget a good deal, and learn so much that is undesirable, you see. In fact, I only know one man who would have suited me, and he is debarred by age and affinity—but, because we are so much alike, I can't help fancying that you once knew another."

The smile on Miss Barrington's face, which was still almost beautiful as well as patient, became a trifle wistful.

"There are few better men than my brother, though he is not clever," she said, and dropped her voice a little. "As to the other, he died in India—beside his mountain gun—long ago."

"And you have never forgotten? He must have been worth it—I wonder if loyalty and chivalric faith belong only to the past," said the girl, reaching up a rounded arm and patting her aunt's thin hand. "And now we will be practical. I fancied the head of the settlement looked worried when he met me, and he is not very proficient at hiding his feelings."

Miss Barrington sighed. "I am afraid that it is nothing new, and with wheat steadily falling and our granary full, he has cause for anxiety. Then the fact that Lance Courthorne has divided your inheritance and is going to settle here has been troubling him."

"The first is the lesser evil," said the girl, with a little laugh. "I wore very short frocks when I last saw Lance in England, and so far as I can remember he had the face of an angel and the temper of a devil. But did not my uncle endeavor to buy him off, and—for all I know you have been finding out things—I want you to tell me all about him."

"He would not take the money," said Miss Barrington, and sat in thoughtful silence a space. Then, and perhaps she had a reason, she quietly recounted Courthorne's Canadian history so far as her brother's agents had been able to trace it, not omitting, dainty in thought and speech, as she was, one or two incidents which a mother might have kept back from her daughter's ears. Still, it was very seldom that Miss Barrington made a blunder. There was a faint pinkness in her cheeks when she concluded, but she was not surprised when, with a slow, sinuous movement, the girl rose to her feet. Her cheeks were very slightly flushed, but there was a significant sparkle in her eyes.

"Oh," she said, with utter contempt. "How sickening! Are there men like that?"

There was a little silence, emphasized by the snapping in the stove, and if Miss Barrington had spoken with an object she should have been contented. The girl was imperious in her anger, which was caused by something deeper than startled prudery.

"It is," said the little white-haired lady, "all quite true. Still, I must confess that my brother and myself were a trifle astonished at the report of the lawyer he sent to confer with Lance in Montana. One would almost have imagined that he had of late been trying to make amends."

The girl's face was very scornful. "Could a man with a past like that ever live it down?"

"We have a warrant for believing it," said Miss Barrington quietly, as she laid her hand on her companion's arm. "My dear, I have told you what Lance was, because I felt it was right you should know; but none of us can tell what he may be, and if the man is honestly trying to lead a different life, all I ask is that you should not wound him by any manifest suspicion. Those who have never been tempted can afford to be merciful."

Maud Barrington laughed somewhat curiously. "You are a very wise woman, aunt, but you are a little transparent now and then," she said. "At least he shall have a fair trial without prejudice or favor—and if he fails, as fail he will, we shall find the means of punishing him."

"We?" said the elder lady, a trifle maliciously.

The girl nodded as she moved towards the doorway, and then turned a moment with the folds of the big red curtain flung behind her. It forced up the sweeping lines of a figure so delicately molded that its slenderness was scarcely apparent, for Maud Barrington still wore a long somber dress that had assisted in her triumphs in the city. It emphasized the clear pallor of her skin and the brightness of her eyes, as she held herself very erect in a pose which, while assumed in mockery, had yet in it something that was almost imperial.

"Yes," she said. "We. You know who is the power behind the throne at Silverdale, and what the boys call me. And now, good-night. Sleep well, dear."

She went out, and Miss Barrington sat very still gazing with eyes that were curiously thoughtful into the fire. "Princess of the Prairie—and it fits her well," she said and then sighed a little. "And if there is a trace of hardness in the girl it may be fortunate. We all have our troubles—and wheat is going down."

In the meanwhile, late as it was, Colonel Barrington and his chief lieutenant, Gordon Dane, sat in his log-walled smoking-room talking with a man he sold his wheat through in Winnipeg. The room was big and bare. There were a few fine heads of antelope upon the walls, and beneath them an armory of English-made shotguns and rifles, while a row of silver-mounted riding crops, and some handled with ivory, stood in a corner. All these represented amusement, while two or three treatises on veterinary surgery and agriculture, lying amidst English stud-books and racing records, presumably stood for industry. The comparison was significant, and Graham, the Winnipeg wheat-broker, noticed it as he listened patiently to the views of Colonel Barrington, who nevertheless worked hard enough in his own fashion. Unfortunately it was rather the fashion of the English gentleman than that common on the prairie.

"And now" he said, with a trace of the anxiety he had concealed in his eyes, "I am open to hear what you can do for me."

Graham smiled a little. "It isn't very much, Colonel. I'll take all your wheat off you at three cents down."

Now Barrington did not like the broker's smiled. It savored too much of equality, and, though he had already unbent as far as he was capable of doing, he had no great esteem for men of business. Nor did it please him to be addressed as "Colonel."

"That," he said coldly, "is out of the question. I would not sell at the last market price. Besides, you have hitherto acted as my broker."

Graham nodded. "The market price will be less than what I offered you in a week, and I could scarcely sell your wheat at it today. I was going to hold it myself, because I can occasionally get a little more from one or two millers who like that special trade. Usual sorts I'm selling for a fall. Quite sure the deal wouldn't suit you?"

"I fancy I told you so," he said.

The broker glanced at Dane, who was a big, bronzed man, and, since Barrington could not see him, shook his head deprecatingly.

"You can consider that decided, Graham," he said. "Still, can you as a friendly deed give us any notion of what to do? As you know, farming, especially at Silverdale, costs money, and the banks are demanding an iniquitous interest just now, while we are carrying over a good deal of wheat."

Graham nodded. He understood why farming was unusually expensive at Silverdale, and was, in recollection of past favors, inclined to be disinterestedly friendly.

"If I were you, I would sell right along for forward delivery at a few cents under the market."

"It is a trifle difficult to see how that would help us," said Barrington, with a little gesture of irritation, for it almost seemed to him that the broker was deriding him.

"No!" said the man from Winnipeg, "on the contrary, it's quite easy. Now I can predict that wheat will touch lower prices still before you have to make delivery, and it isn't very difficult to figure out the profit on selling a thing for a dollar and then buying it, when you have to produce it, at ninety cents. Of course, there is a risk of the market going against you, but you could buy at the first rise, and you've your stock to dole out in case anybody cornered you."

"That," said Dane thoughtfully, "appears quite sensible. Of course, it's a speculation, but presumably we couldn't be much worse on than we are. Have you any objections to the scheme, sir?"

Barring glanced with astonished severity at the speaker. "Unfortunately, I have. We are wheat growers and not wheat stock jugglers. Our purpose is to farm, and not swindle and lie in the wheat pits for decimal differences. I have a distinct antipathy to anything of the kind."

"But, sir," said Dane, and Barrington stopped him with a gesture.

"I would," he said, "as soon turn gambler. Still, while it has always been a tradition at Silverdale that the head of the settlement's lead is to be followed, that need not prevent you putting on the gloves with the wheat-ring blacklegs in Winnipeg."

Dane blushed a little through his tan, and then smiled as he remembered the one speculative venture his leader had indulged in, for Colonel Barrington was a somewhat hot-tempered and vindictive man. He made a little gesture of deprecation as he glanced at Graham, who straightened himself suddenly in his chair.

"I should not think of doing so in the face of your opinion, sir," he said. "There is an end to the thing, Graham!"

The broker's face was a trifle grim. "I gave you good advice out of friendship, Colonel, and there are men with money to spare who would value a hint from me." he said. "Still, as it doesn't seem to strike you the right way, I've no use for arguing. Keep your wheat—and pay bank interest if you want any help to carry over."

"Thanks," said Dane quietly. "They charge tolerably high, but I've seen what happens to the man who meddles with the mortgage-broker."

Graham nodded. "Well, as I'm starting out at six o'clock, it's time I was asleep," he said. "Good-night to you, Colonel."

Barrington shook hands with Graham, and then sighed a little as he went out. "I believe the man is honest, and he is a guest of mine, or I should have dressed him down." he said. "I don't like the way things are going, Dane, and the fact is we must find accommodation somewhere, because now I have to pay out so much on my ward's account to that confounded Courthorne it is necessary to raise more money than the banks will give me. Now, there was a broker fellow wrote me a very civil letter."

Dane, who was a thoughtful man, ventured to lay his hand upon his leader's arm. "Keep yourself and Miss Barrington out of those fellow's clutches at any cost," he said.

Barrington shook off his hand, and looked at him sternly. "Are you not a trifle young to adopt that tone?" he said.

Dane nodded. "No doubt I am, but I've seen a little of mortgage jobbing. You must try to overlook it. I did not mean to offend."

He went out, and, while Colonel Barrington sat down before a sheaf of accounts, sprang into a waiting sleigh. "It's no use, we've got to go through," he said to the lad who shook the reins. "Graham made a very sensible suggestion, but our respected leader came down on him, as he did on me. You see, one simply can't talk to the Colonel, and it's unfortunate Miss Barrington didn't marry that man in Montreal."

"I don't know," said the lad. "Of course, there are not many girls like Maud Barrington, but is it necessary she should go outside Silverdale?"

Dane laughed. "None of us would be old enough for Miss Barrington when we were fifty. The trouble is, that we spend half our time in play, and I've a notion it's a man, and not a gentleman dilettante, she's looking for."

"Isn't that a curious way of putting it?" asked his companion.

Dane nodded. "It may be the right one. Woman is as she was made, and I've had more than a suspicion lately that a little less refinement would not come amiss at Silverdale. Anyway, I hope she'll find him, for it's a man with grit and energy, who could put a little desirable pressure on the Colonel occasionally, we're all wanting. Of course, I'm backing my leader, though it's going to cost me a good deal, but it's time he had somebody to help him."

"He would never accept assistance," said the lad thoughtfully. "That is, unless the man who offered it was, or became by marriage, one of the dynasty."

"Of course," said Dane. "That's why I'm inclined to take a fatherly interest in Miss Barrington's affair. It's a misfortune we've heard nothing very reassuring about Courthorne."

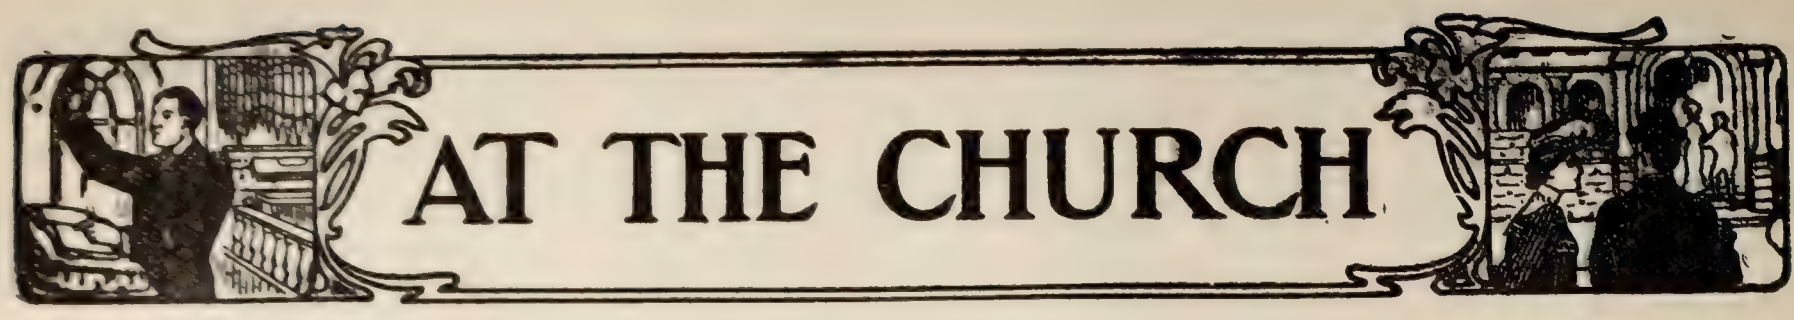
BOOK REVIEWS.

"David Swing: Poet-Preacher." By Joseph F. Newton, Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Published by The Unity Publishing Company, Abraham Lincoln Centre, Chicago.



This is more than a biography; it is a character study. The annals of the life are given, it is true, but the reader has the vision of a great soul. It is a sweet, tender, sacred tribute of a friend to one who has more than blessed our humanity. Mr. Newton presents David Swing as a poet-preacher. This is true. He was a poet. He sang his song amidst the rumble of the commercialism of our great Chicago. It was a symphony and its echoes are still heard. He was a preacher, a true preacher. He was a prophet to his age and to a constituency which the church did not reach. He was never a dogmatic liberalist. He did not repudiate orthodoxy; he simply passed by on the other side. He was regarded as a litte irregular, however, by the Presbyterians of his day and by a few others; but David Swing had his place and he filled it. The story of his life is told in the charming style of his biographer. Read it, by all means.

The Life and Letters of Austin Craig. New York: Fleming H. Revell Co., pp. 387. $2.00 net.

The subject of this book was one of the prominent figures in the Christian connection and was prominently identified with Horace Mann and Antioch College at Yellow Springs. Those who are interested in the origin and history of the Christian connection will find in this book an interesting source of information.

The picture presented is that of a strong, enthusiastic man, accepting the hardships of life with courage and optimism and growing to a wide and deep influence over those who were his students and colleagues.

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

Quarterly Review

The lessons of the past quarter relate to the earliest period of Christian history and cover most of the events of church life in Jerusalem from the end of Jesus' ministry to the conversion of the apostle Paul. It is true that this last event is not included in the lesson scheme of the first quarter, but it is merely omitted for the sake of bringing it into connection with the spread of Christianity into Gentile territory, which is the theme of study for the second quarter.

Gift of the Spirit.

The first three lessons form a group by themselves, dealing with the beginnings of Christianity. The departure of Jesus (Chapter 1) is included in the Book of Acts evidently for the purpose of giving fresh statement to his final words of commission and encouragement. He had previously told the disciples that they would receive the Holy Spirit, and indeed had bestowed it upon them in the symbolic act of breathing upon them. But he knew that only in the activities of evangelistic work would they come to feel the full power of the new life which he described as the coming of the Spirit. This promise was renewed in his last interview with them, and was more fully realized still on the day of Pentecost when in the midst of their prayers there suddenly came to them that overwhelming sense of exultation and power accompanied by unmistakable signs such as convinced them that the promise of the Master was now realized.

Pentecost.

The astonishing feature of the day of Pentecost led to the first apostolic sermon which was preached by the apostle Peter even as Jesus had intimated to him. In that first declaration which falls in part into each of lessons two and three, the great Messianic facts were set forth. Jesus had fulfilled the prophecies of the Old Testament; he had wrought miracles in the city of Jerusalem, and he had risen from the dead, of which fact the apostles were the living witnesses. He could be no other, therefore, than the hoped-for Jewish Messiah, and in his name alone was there salvation. This led to the first conversions under the apostolic ministry, and some three thousand were added to the number of the followers of Jesus.

Conflicts with Officials.

The second group of lessons, from Chapter 4 to 7, deals with the early Christian church. In Chapter 3, we are told of the visit of Peter and John to the temple soon after the day of Pentecost. They went up as good Jews to observe the hour of prayer. Finding a lame beggar at the gate of the temple, they gave him more than he requested by healing him of his malady. This instantly aroused the interest of the crowd who gathered about the two men, with eager attention, to know what was their message. To them Peter preached the new life and accused their rulers of the death of the Messiah whom God had sent them. This led to the arrest and trial of the apostles (Chapter 4) by the authorities of Jerusalem who were perplexed at the rapid spread of the new teaching and troubled that it should so strongly influence the people. But this hostile attitude only gave the apostles fresh courage so that the authorities could but threaten and let them go.

Ananias and Sapphira.

In the meantime the community of disciples was growing rapidly. The spirit of good will was present everywhere and the church was more like a vast family than merely a religious body. With generosity those who were well-to-do gave their possessions for the support of the poor. There was thus created a fund to which all gave as they were minded. But some sought the credit of generous giving, while they were willing only to bestow a part, and this led to the untimely experience of Ananias and Sapphira (Chapter 5) who were publicly rebuked by the apostle Peter and died, both of them, within a brief space in the presence of the assembled disciples. Such an event filled the entire community with a sense of awe and fear. They saw that, whether the deaths of this man and woman were due to the anger of God, to the miraculous power of the apostle, or to the overwhelming sense of shame incident to a public and apostolic denunciation, their sin had in any case found them out; and the standard of conduct was raised by these events.

Imprisonment and Release.

Not yet, however, were the apostles in a position to proceed undisturbed with their task. Once more the priests and Sadducees attempted to stop their work by putting them into prison. But the apostles were released and proceeded at once to their former scene of preaching in the temple courts. The puzzled priests could only wonder at these things and question how they were to deal with the rapidly growing faith. They finally, however, adopted the sage suggestion of one of their number, Gamaliel, the eminent teacher, who counselled them to desist from further persecution of the apostles and leave the Christian doctrine to justify itself or not, as its inherent values should determine.

Arrest of Stephen.

The final group of lessons, from Chapter 8 to 11, may be classed together under the general title of Early Evangelism. Christianity was becoming more aggressive. The first period of quiet growth in the city of Jerusalem came to an end when Stephen began his active and impetuous preaching. Not content with the quiet methods which had prevailed hitherto, he boldly entered the Jewish synagogues and challenged their most cherished beliefs upon the superiority of Jesus to Moses and of the church to the temple. Aroused to action by such attacks, the authorities took instant pains to bring Stephen to examination. Apparently the leader in this movement was none other than the young Pharisee from Tarsus, Saul by name.

Death of Stephen.

Stephen's answer to the accusations of the council was a ringing protest against the whole current of Jewish history which he insisted had been in bold defiance of the will of God and in insolent rejection of most of the prophets and leaders whom God had raised up. This course had been brought to its appropriate conclusion by the inexcusable treatment of Jesus, who had been put out of the way, not by Roman opposition, but by Jewish mob violence. This defiance of Stephen's brought him to his death, but it was the note needed by the church at this moment in the progress of early evangelism and it stirred the whole community to instant action. The death of Stephen turned loose a flood of persecution upon the early church which was probably the very best means to arouse it to a new sense of responsibility. The Christians were scattered everywhere. Many of them were imprisoned and otherwise persecuted, and Saul carried on his campaign even to foreign cities, as will be seen later on.

Philip's Evangelism.

Soon after this the wider evangelism began through the activity of Philip, another member of the group of seven to which Stephen had belonged. Philip, in the process of his missionary travels in Jewish and semi-Jewish territory, visited Samaria and planted the gospel there, where there were probably remembrances of Jesus' visit in the district where he preached. Later still he went to the southwest and met, in the course of his journeys, a nobleman of Ethiopia whose conversion to the Christian faith must have marked the beginning of a new epoch in the religious life of his country, for he certainly would carry back to Ethiopia the message which he had himself learned.

Peter in Sharon.

And now, at last, the apostles themselves took up the task of visiting the churches that began to be founded as a result of pilgrimages to Jerusalem and the activities of such evangelists as Stephen and Philip, Peter and John had already gone to Samaria to inspect the young church there. Peter continued his journeys in the direction of the sea coast, going down to the plain of Sharon and tarrying for some time in the towns of Lydda and Joppa. At the first-named place he healed Aeneas of paralysis which had been afflicting him for years; and at Joppa, he restored Dorcas, who was being mourned as dead by her circle of sisters in the faith. It was evident that Christianity had taken upon itself life with the work of Stephen, and now the apostle Peter tarried in Joppa with his new friend, Simon the tanner, ready for fresh opportunities of service and fresh occasions for testimony.

PRAYER MEETING

Silas Jones

WHOLESOME LIVING.

Topic, March 17. 1 Pet. 3:8-22; Matt. 6:25-34.

Wholesome living is that which makes for individual and social health. Conduct that tends to undermine physical or moral health is unwholesome. Indulgences that weaken the body are under the ban of sound sentiment in Christian lands. A race physically vigorous is needed for the tasks of civilization. Poetry, music, and religion have a physical basis. Diseased bodies account for much that is unwholesome in all three. To purify and enrich them we must look well to the bodily life. Much of our preaching is foolishness, because we ignore the fact that we live on the solid earth and not in the regions of imagination. Moral energy is developed in fighting disease and poverty. Ignorance of what the body is and of what it requires is the soil in which sin grows rank. But we must do more than train man as an animal. The complete man lives in the society of the good of all ages. His admiration is bestowed in the fullest measure on the men of the greatest moral achievements.

Blessing for Reviling.

The savage in us would answer evil with evil. Of course there is no surer way of perpetuating brutish feelings and customs than that of the man who tries to be as mean and cruel as the one from whom he receives an injury. Any man of sense understands this. But many of us are not men of sense when we think injury has been done to us. We then act like lunatics. We try to vindicate ourselves by doing personal violence to another or by damaging his reputation. When God wished to overcome man's enmity he sent the Son of his love into the world. Almighty power can never bring us into harmony with the will of God, but the love of Christ constrains us to be reconciled to God. For the cure of the ills that afflict society we need less of vindictiveness and exclusiveness and more of love and appreciation of moral worth. If we are really about our Master's business, we have no time for "getting even" with anybody. Churches are weakened and the purpose of Christ is defeated by members who think they have to "vindicate" themselves by humiliating someone and interfering with his work and happiness. These people do not understand the vindicating power of a generous self-sacrificing spirit.

A Good Conscience.

Before the defeated and discredited sinner the majority of men are bold and defiant; many bow down to the successful rascal. A good conscience does not worship prosperous wickedness. Its possessor can suffer for well-doing but he cannot call evil good. It is his claim to recognition before God and man that he discerns moral values and that he acts in accordance with what he discerns. He will perform his duties as a citizen in the face of opposition from popular sinners. He will stand with the few against the many when the many speak the thing that is not right in the sight of God. It is a serious danger to any religious movement that it is in favor with the multitudes. Certainly the multitudes are to be won to Christ, but there is always a question whether they have been won to the message of the church or the church has lowered its requirements and set aside its commission for the sake of gaining support. If the church does become untrue to its Lord, the man of conscience is not deceived by pious phrases and sanctimonious looks, nor is he afraid of the mob spirit that is sure to be aroused by the exposure of popular follies.

The Trustful Soul.

Anxious, worried people cannot be said to be living wholesome lives. Anxiety is a destroyer. It is an enemy to health and happiness. It consumes energy faster than good, honest work ever does. It stirs up discord. There is not one good word to be spoken for it. The only reason it is ever mentioned with respect is that it is often mistaken for interest in others. The absence of it is sometimes thought to be indifference. The anxiety which Jesus condemned springs from lack of faith in God and of generous interest in others. It is concern for the lower sort of success. The trustful soul does not lay up treasures upon earth for selfish uses. It does not attempt the impossible feat of serving God and mammon. It seeks first the kingdom and the righteousness of God. The worry condemned by the Lord disappears when the life is directed to the objects he sets before men as worthy of their ambition.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

By Richard W. Gentry

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS SERIES. III. The Wicket Gate. Matt. 7:7-14.

I. Willingness.

"May I now enter here? Will he within Open to sorry me though I have been
An undeserving rebel? Then shall I
Not fail to sing his lasting praise on high."

Christian got in at the wicket gate because he was "willing." Some of us probably do not realize just what the full meaning of willing is. So and so says to us, "I am willing to go with you," and perhaps he is sitting quietly in his chair at the time. But the full meaning of the term is that when you give the signal he will be walking down the street with you.

The willingness of the true Christian is the willingness of one when he is walking down the street with you, an active willingness, one that is alive and moves. It is the willingness of Christian "who went on with haste" and "got up to the gate"; the willingness of one who "wills" to walk with Jesus and then does so. It is the deep impulse coming from the heart and moving one to act, to which Jesus appeals in his words, "Ask and it shall be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you." The one who so wills to seek Jesus and then does sekk him, always finds him, and finds in him the peace that passeth understanding. To him the answer of Jesus is the answer of Good Will to Christian, "I am willing with all my heart, said he; and with that he opened the gate."

II. God's Active Love.

The love of the Christian, which causes him to seek and to knock is met by the active, giving, love of God. The love of God is greater than the love of the father and mother, whose love is often such that they are willing to die for the child. We find a love higher than this hard to grasp, but we gain some idea of it in the life and persona and sacrifice of Jesus Christ. How many of us would be willing to give up what he renounced? The ministry certainly partly owes its dearth of applicants to the dearth of the heroic spirit of sacrifice. The man who sincerely gives his life to the service, or meets death for another, is the highest symbol of God's giving love which we can know.

The richest gifts are those which come from God. Even men will not give each other stones for bread. God is a gift giving God, but his gifts are spiritual blessings and the pure joy of peace with him through Christ Jesus. This Christian realized when he said, "Now I begin to reap the benefits of my hazards."

III. The Straight and Narrow Way.

Christian had much trouble before he reached the wicket gate because he wandered. Evangelist sternly rebukes him, "Thou hast forsaken the way that is good, to tread in forbidden paths." "Narrow is the way which leadeth unto life," says Jesus, "and few there be that find it." Yea, few there be that find it because human nature is so sadly lacking in that quality defined by the homely word, "stick-to-it-iveness." To the volition which starts the feet toward God, to the active gift bearing love of God which meets one at the very beginning of the journey, to these must be added the power to stick to the path of one's choice.

The Gwangwei Revival

The revival in Gwangwei began about three weeks before Mr. Chen and I arrived there. It began in the heart of Mr. Shi, the pastor of the church. He had heard about the revival in Manchuria, and of course knew about the blessing that had recently come to the church in Chu Cheo. His own heart was richly prepared for the meetings and for three weeks he had been preparing the hearts of his congregation.

The local church had made ample provision for the material needs of the members who would come from a distance. Many came seven miles and some came fifteen. These brought their bedding along and stayed throughout the meeting. Three times a day Mrs. Shi and her assistants spread before us rice and vegetables in abundance.

The meeting opened on Sunday morning, January 3. From the beginning there was a very marked interest. At the first service several members made acknowledgment of sins which they had committed. Before the meeting closed about twenty had made grave confessions. Some gave up only after a hard struggle; others broke down after rising to their feet. A young man in whom we have great hopes, was not present at the first meeting. He cried during the second, but did not give up until the very last service, when he confessed to being implicated in using the name of the church in official business only a few days before the meeting opened. One much respected member confessed to adultery and opium smoking. A young woman in a broken voice told how she had starved her infant to death. Several did not make complete confessions at first and so were finally influenced to do so. At the first service a young man begged the pardon of his former employer for lying to him. At the last meeting which was an evangelistic service, with much agitation and before a large audience, he told how he had caused his mother to break her leg and that he had accused her of condemning his infant to death.

But not only were the Christians stirred and helped. The little village which had never witnessed such scenes before, was profoundly impressed. The first evening Mr. Chen preached on the power of sin, and Mr. Shi followed him with a comparison between battling against the pleadings of the Spirit. At the next evangelistic service she arose and said that she wanted to become a Christian. In all, eighteen indicated their desire to quit sin and follow Christ.

At the last service, the Christians and enquirers brought forward on slips of paper the names of those relatives or friends whom they would try to lead to Christ during the coming year. At this same service they also made their subscriptions for the support of the work. Some are giving a twelfth of their income; some a tenth, while Mr. and Mrs. Shi are giving an eighth. Several are giving in the old way—in lump sums. One old member who lives seven miles away and who had not been to church for two years, gave $1.30. At a previous service, the Christians had given over $5.00 to purchase a coffin for the recently deceased wife of a poor member.

OUR READERS' FORUM

IN A FOG.

By W. T. Moore.

I mean that I am in a fog. I do not judge other people. Perhaps Brother Gates sees baptism as clearly as sunlight; but he has mixed it up wonderfully for me. I am clean out, and do not know "where I am at."

I thought we had some things settled, at least until the Centennial year is past. But it seems that our young men are making progress so fast that we old fellows cannot keep up with the procession. I have usually been classed among those in the front, but I fear I shall have to join the rear column. Things are moving rapidly certainly, and it may be before the Centennial is over some other people will lose their chart and compass as well as your humble servant. But what is the matter with me? Really I scarcely know myself. I am "flabergasted;" I am completely dumbfounded. I thought if there was anything I understood it was the relation of baptism to the remission of sins, and I thought, furthermore, that if there was any fundamental truth understood among the Disciples it was that relation. But alas! this unsettling age makes sad havoc of our household gods.

In the "Century" of the 13th inst., Dr. Errett Gates has an article on "The Place and Value of Baptism," which, if I understand him at all, is as far away from the Disciple position as the Baptists have always been, with respect to this matter. Indeed, it is the Baptist position somewhat clumsily stated. It is an effort to run with the hare and hold with the hounds, and that has always been a somewhat difficult thing to do. I do not mean that Dr. Gates tried to do this difficult thing. I have no doubt he is thoroughly conscientious in what he has written, nor am I sure any one can contradict his position, because I doubt if any one can understand it. I never set myself to overthrow the position of any one when I do not understand him. I certainly do not understand Dr. Gates. To use the tale-end of a story which I told once, he seems to "smell something, but can't 'xactly locate it."

But now comes along Brother Spencer also, and I am in a fog as regards his position. Even Brother McGarvey practically endorses Brother Spencer, and consequently I am taking a heavy task on myself to meet this triumvirate, namely Gates, Spencer, and McGarvey. However, at the risk of being regarded an old fogy, I will say that I do not believe in Brother Spencer's interpretation of the matter any more than I do in what Brother Gates seems to say. However, I can understand what Brother Spencer means, for he uses language in harmony with the dialect I have used from the beginning.

But let us see what Brother Spencer says, as quoted in the Standard of the 20th inst., by Brother McGarvey. He says: "We do not preach 'repent and be baptized for remission of sins,' but 'repent and be baptized into the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of sins.' It is not baptism that saves, but the name of Christ only, for there is no other name whereby we may be saved."

Now my first objection to this is the rendering of epi in the quotation from Acts 2:38. Brother Spencer renders it "into," whereas it literally means "upon." Then we are told that "it is not baptism that saves, but the name of Christ only." But this plainly contradicts Peter, for he says "baptism doth also now save us." If Brother Spencer had said that simply water does not save us, I would gladly agree with him, but when he says that baptism does not save us, I very respectfully beg leave to differ with him. There are a great many things connected with baptism besides water, and among these is undoubtedly the name of Jesus Christ, and it takes all these things to make a baptism valid and to give it the efficiency which the Apostle ascribes to it when he says "baptism doth also now save us." Nor is it true, as Brother Spencer says, that "we are saved by the name of Christ only." There are no "onlies" in this matter. The trouble has always been with these "onlies." The name of Christ has much to do with the validity of baptism, and certainly much to do with salvation, and there is no other name that can be substituted for that name. But it does not follow from this that we are saved by the name of Christ "only." Our opponents have always made much of water only, when they are objecting to our position on the question of baptism. We have sharply retorted by declaring that they misrepresent us, and so they do.

But this article is long enough. I am beginning to feel anxious about the old paths. Perhaps I am unusually nervous today, for I have not been well for some time. However, I have now said what I wanted to say, and what I have said may suggest the importance of a clearer vision with respect to this important matter. In my judgment, the most effective element of the plea we have made, wherein we differ from other religious people, is our contention with respect to the design of baptism. When we surrender this we will find that our evangelistic success will greatly diminish, for our teaching on this subject has been so explicit that the people have understood when and where they could have the assurance of the remission of their sins; and this has been a great practical lever in raising our plea into success. The day we abandon the old view of this subject will be a sad one for our religious movement.

THE SUPREME NEED OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

By Evangelist Harold E. Monser.

The most serious obstacle in the way of acomplishing the Centennial aims of the Christian Church today, is the fact that we have not the men to fill our pulpits.

Solve this problem and all other problems can be solved. The greatest opportunity of the whole century lies at our door of God, who know what the Bible teaches, today. We need men grounded in the word and who have a wider vision; which usually comes only through contact with great minds. We have many men who know the Book, but who, in many other directions, are seriously deficient. We also have many men who are men of culture, who are in touch with the best scholarship of the age, and yet they do not know the Book.

These men are doing a great work, and are worthy of all praise, but, rightly equipped they could do a much better work.

How to strike a happy medium between these two classes is the problem of the Christian Church in 1909.

To accomplish this we must have better equipped schools. We ought to have at least four great schools. Each with over $1,000,000 endowment and a good Bible Seminary in connection with every state university.

If we had the money to provide these schools we have not the men to man them, It will take ns years to provide them.

No class of men in our church have made greater sacrifice for the cause, than the men who have devoted themselves to the education of the ministry.

No one recognizes better than they the facts of our serious deficiency.

When we think of what other churches, with an equal membership are doing, and when we boast that our plea will reach the thinking man, when nothing else will, we should face bravely the one supreme problem of the church—the education of its ministry. But some one says, "we have not the young men who are willing to take this education even if provided," and that the problem is, "where shall we find the young men?" I think this is a mistake. There has hardly been a time within the past ten years that I have not known a dozen young men who by the investment of $100 each would have been assured a good education, and could have been made self-sustaining.

This seems to me to be the needed watchword: "A clear knowledge of God's purposes as revealed in both the Old and New Testament, an answering faith in the Book, and a belief that God's revelation of Himself in the physical and psychical world, will always be found to harmonize with the revela tion of his mind in the Old Book."

NEW DEPARTMENT SUGGESTED.

My Dear Bro. Morrison: You have added many features to the Century in the past few months which have increased the excellence of an already most valuable paper. May I suggest another which I feel would greatly add to its interest? Give us a department of Social Service. Now I have an organized adult Bible class of some fifty men using Sunday-school literature "The Gospel of the Kingdom," that "Course of Study for Men and Women on Living Social Problems in the Light of the Gospel of Jesus Christ," edited by Dr. Strong. This class is continually looking out for material which will prove suggestive in carrying on their work, and add to the interest. There are other classes of this kind in the brotherhood, and there should be many more. As far as that is concerned, there will be many more for you know we are coming nearer to the Gospel of the Kingdom every day, and the time is at hand when every man must stand or fall, not on his doctrines, but on the service rendered.

In a recent editorial you spoke of the necessity of a great purpose for our Men's organizations or else they would not prove permanent. My organization, known as the Greyfriars, "The Laymen's Dining Club of the First Christian Church, Paris, Mo.," has for its purpose the study, propagation and practice of Social Service.

With best wishes for you and your work and the Christian Century, I am

Yours very truly,
Frank W. Allen.

[This valuable suggestion for a department of Social Service would be adopted if our space would afford it. Judging from the fashion in which Mr. Ewers is handling the Men's Department, that page is virtually an exposition of social methods and aims. It is our earnest desire to make the Christian Century nourish and enlarge the social motive in the heart of every reader. We congratulate Mr. Allen upon the wise and practicable manner in which he is developing the Christian ideals of his men and agree with him that under Christ's test every man will stand or fall, not on his doctrines, but on the service rendered.—Editors.]

CHICAGO

The Christian Science Testimony Meeting reported in detail from short-hand notes of speeches. No miraculous cures discovered, though some marvelous events are vouched for.

BY O. F. JORDAN.

We are still at the Christian Science prayer meeting which we were attending last week. Through the introductory services we had been promising ourselves that we were to hear of a modern miracle that would either challenge faith or scientific inquiry. We had heard much of the wonderful cures reported in these meetings and were prepared to hear great things. We resolved, however, that we would try to get the facts in shape that they might be investigated.

Time Limit Enforced.

In this particular church there is a five minute limit to the speeches, which is rigidly enforced,—a good suggestion to our prayer-meetings. There was no more enthusiasm than in the prayermeetings we have attended but perhaps that is because the religion here represented does not encourage emotion. The presence of the crowd indicated interest if not enthusiasm. The speeches continued with brief intervals for forty minutes and in that time eight people testified to the benefits of their religion. We will examine these testimonies from our short-hand notes and find some lessons lying on the very face of these facts.

The first sepaker was a lady who told what her religion had done for her. In her youth she had had a great sense of fear. This fear of things had been altogether overcome. She had also been troubled some with catarrh and had been cured. "I am grateful to Mrs. Eddy and to God" was her tribute. That she was relieved of her sense of fear by her religion is doubtless true. Religion that teaches trust in God will always do that. With reference to the catarrh, however, we reflected that most Chicagoans have catarrh and many of them lose it when the tides of life rise higher, or when they travel.

Given Up by Doctor: Healed.

The next testimony was given by a lady who told first of a friend who was given up by the doctor to die but who had been healed. We began to fear that the people who had had the greatest help were not at the meeting to tell it. The lady relating the story had been cured of the grippe. As the cure of grippe is within the reach of all of us, we still waited for the first-hand testimony of a great cure. The lady had never found much interest in reading the Bible, but said she was grateful to Mrs. Eddy for making it a new book to her.

The next two cases reported simple ailments cured, one a nervous hysteria and the other a chronic cold. The latter showed that Christian Science has at least one strong, ethical note. It teaches against hate and the devotees of science are supposed to make peace with all of their enemies. We ought to generously accord that this is done to an unusual degree. Christian Scientists are peaceful neighbors. While they are the most backward of all in social service and have never developed any adequate means for taking care of even their own poor, and while they build no institutions for the care of the unfortunates of the earth, they do master the evil of hatred and revenge. It might be possible for the orthodox churches to receive a lot of good preaching here. Christian Science has made headway in ethics as in religion in doing the neglected thing.

In the weeks gone by, members of this church had related to one of our ministers some wonderful happenings. A lady had thrown out a kettle of hot water and accidentally scalded the hair off of her dog. She testified that this was miraculously restored. A man, once a Disciple, told of a friend who had taken a truck farm outside of Chicago and, through "Science," a farm that had been terribly weedy did not produce a single weed during the year. It is true that this "Science" friend had refused to give the location of this farm but the wonder remained nevertheless. We were prepared, then, for the testimony which followed.

Canary Bird Re-Feathered Through Science.

The young lady was in an orthodox family which had not the "truth." When the canary bird lost all of its feathers and was shivering in the cage, they were so much of the mortal mind that they sent to the drug store for a new kind of food. Still the feathers did not come and the young woman asked permission to try "Science" on the bird. She reported that in an incredibly short time, the feathers appeared and the bird was perfectly well. When she had finished this story of wonder with fulsome elaboration, the reader reminded her that her time was up. She sat down with a sigh, for she had begun another story which had even more possibilities of interest than the first.

The next speaker told how his eyesight spoke so low that no one save those that were in the seat with him could have heard. We saw him after the service. However confident he may be that the perfect work has been wrought upon him, he ought to seek of Mrs. Eddy vigor enough to speak to be heard farther. Doubtless, however, an invalid who is still an invalid has found courage to face life and by denying the facts of life will be able to endure the world.

The next speaker told how his eyesight had been improved through the "truth." In common with the rest he closed with the sentence, "I am grateful to Mrs. Eddy and to God." After this there was a speaker who reported having just come from the mother church in Boston. She reported an interesting case in Walton, Mass. Here a lady had twelve years of invalidism. An operation brought relief but not a cure. The lady read Science and Health and the first time thought it foolishness. A second reading cured her, however, and she has been well ever since. Surgeons have long since learned to dread the melancholia and invalidism which follows surgical operations in some instances. A habitual invalidism is not always broken up by removing the physical cause. A mental stimulus must come and when no other kind comes, that resulting from "Science" may, and often does do the work.

A Sprained Ankle Healed.

It is a part of the "truth" to deny pain even when it is present. A young lady who testified told of riding in Garfield Park. In alighting from the carriage, she turned her ankle. "It was very painful," she said, "but it would not have been right to voice it for my friend was not in 'Science.' I said there was nothing the matter. Before we had left the park, however, all the pain had left. I am sure that had I not known the truth, I should have been laid up for a long time."

The evening was finished. In looking over the record, I found that there had been no testimony of any great healing unless it was a long time ago or a long way off. There were simple cures that were contemporaneous, but nothing of the really miraculous that could be subject to scientific investigation.

Christian Science Both Good and Bad.

We came to some conclusions like these. Christian Science is good for the incurables, as it will help them to bear their ills and even to believe them non-existent. It is good for many simple illnesses, for even the doctors do not give medicines except as "placebos" for some of them. It is bad, however, for the serious illnesses that are curable. In our personal experience, a woman nearly died at the birth of her first child because she trusted the healer. In other cases, our good Christian Science friends take the medicine first and only renounce them when they are sufficiently on the road to recovery to trust again "in Mrs. Eddy and God." Christian Science has conceded that it is powerless against great epidemics like smallpox and that broken bones must be set. These concessions are fatal to the theory.

Christian Science emphasises a great religious truth, peace through trust. It denies, however, another religious truth that "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." It identifies happiness with the favor of God. It has a great ethical truth, that of abstaining from hate. This is negative, however, and in the testimonies did not extend to the Saviour's teaching, "Bless those that persecute you."

We shall continue to read the literature at intervals and to talk with our friends who are "in the truth." We believe, however, that there is nothing new in Christian Science. Its God is that of the Buddhist. Its Christ is that of the ancient Docetists. Its philosophy is an extravagant and discredited idealism, in its denial of material reality. Its cures are not different, save in being smaller, from the cures at the medieval shrines. Its remnant of truth and its real dynamic is the crusade against fear and hate and these are stated so simply in the Sermon on the Mount as to need no "Key to the Scriptures" to be understood.

WITH THE WORKERS

A TRULY GREAT MEETING.

The month of January was truly a time of refreshing from on high for the church at Dixon, Illinois. For several months the attention of the community and the interest of the church centered in the coming to us of Lockhart and Lintt, who were to lead us in a great evangelistic campaign. The meeting is part of our past history, but our future history will be largely moulded by its results. One hundred seventy-one responded to the invitation. The men who have labored in Northern Illinois, both as pastors and evangelists, will appreciate this victory and especially those who know the conditions in this particular field. When you remember that such men as T. A. Boyer, J. H. O. Smith, J. V. Updike, W. E. Harlow and others as evangelists, with such pastoral leadership as Stephen Zendt, Finis Idleman, J. F. Stone and H. H. Peters have conducted evangelistic campaigns in this difficult but strategic field, the unprecedented victory will be appreciated. Without the splendid former labors these latter victories could not have been won. No religious body has been able to make an impression on the community in an evangelistic way since the Billy Sunday campaign about four weeks ago; yet the city as a city and the ardent friends of Billy Sunday were frank to say that Lockhart and Lintt were superior as a team of evangelistic workers to Sunday and Fisher, and with the same organization behind them would have far surpassed the great record of Mr. Sunday. The character and spirit of these workers was of the best. Every church and almost every citizen felt the good effects of their ministry. Wm. J. Lockhart is one of the best balanced men I have ever met in the work. He is a true preacher of Christ and His gospel. He has no hobbies and is not above a suggestion from the humblest source. He manifests a magnanimous spirit in relation to all interests of the church. Not an iota of selfishness or mercenary spirit did I detect in all his stay. His plan of financing a meeting is sure to succeed, if it is worked. The civic affairs of our city were stirred by our great men's meetings; yet he never allowed himself to be drawn into any sensational grand stand controversies. Of the younger men of the ministry in the Church of Christ few equal and none surpass in evangelistic force, fire and fervor as well as pulpit power and organizing strength, Wm. J. Lockhart of Des Moines, Iowa. He is descended from generations of preachers. His own former pastor, H. O. Breeden, said of him: "His success has been little short of marvelous. A close analysis will reveal the following elements of strength:

First—An engaging personality with those willing qualities of geniality, frankness, approachableness, kindliness and sympathy, which go with it.

Second—A rugged mentality, supported by a wide knowledge of human nature and books—especially the One Book.

Third—A strong spirituality, a vital hold on the great eternal realities. He knows things fundamental and things which belong to Christ.

Fourth—He is a consummate organizer. He believes in method and is a master in its application to the Gospel.

Brother Lockhart never fails in evangelical effort. He is clear in presentation of truths, tender and sympathetic in his appeals, intense in his enthusiasm and persuasive in a marked degree. His career is only begun. His triumphs in the gospel will yet be won. With him the best is yet to be.

As to his co-worker, Wm. F. Lintt, he was the idol of the city as a musical director. No man ever sang or directed a chorus in Dixon who gave such universal satisfaction. It was conceded by all that Fisher, Mr. Sunday's great leader, was not in the same class with W. F. Lintt. He is one of the finest Christian gentlemen and one of the best personal workers I ever knew. This church would like to locate him with a life call.

YEUELL AT RUSHVILLE.

We have just closed a short meeting with Herbert Yeuell, evangelist, and Ellsworth Rogers, singer. In seventeen days of invitation one hundred and twenty-five were added to the congregation. The meeting was necessarily short as it had been delayed several weeks in the beginning by smallpox quarantine, and Brother Yeuell's other engagements prevented his staying longer. The campaign was accordingly pressed vigorously from start to finish and the interest and enthusiasm were such that ordinarily the meeting should have continued several weeks longer. But it was our misfortune that the quarantines crowded us at one end and the Local Option campaign, which is now in full headway, at the other end. We are delighted however to have had Brother Yeuell though but for so limited a time, and his name will be a household word in Rushville for years to come. His magnetic personality and brilliant gifts as a preacher give him a power in the pulpit possessed by few men, and it is a constant delight to hear him preach. The one element in his preaching which to me accounts for his phenomenal success as an evangelist is he never loses sight of the one great success of preaching, namely, to reach the conscience. A man of Yeuell's dramatic and elecutionary powers might be tempted merely to entertain but Yeuell drives his message home for the conscience like an arrow to its mark. He understands, too, the psychology of meetings perfectly. There is no clap-trap, but the moment he steps on the platform things take fire, and he keeps up a rapid fire of oratory and holds his audience enrapt to the last appeal. There is no doubt about having a "Revival" when you secure Yeuell.

Mrs. Yeuell organized a "Smile Chorus" which was very helpful, and also proved herself an efficient personal worker. Elsworth Rogers of Atlanta, Ga., who led the singing is a new man among us. He has a tenor voice of fine quality and is a good soloist and excellent leader of congregational singing.

We are now pushing the Temperance campaign with nightly meetings and hope to see old Rush county in the "dry" column next Saturday. R. W. Abberley.

Rushville, Ind.—Sixteen days' invitation, 125 confessions. Small pox quarantine delayed three weeks. Temperance campaign beginning earnestly. Start Valparaiso, Ind., Sunday, with Bruce Brown as pastor. Abberly a royal host at Rushville. Being an evangelist himself, gleans his field, yet valiantly coöperates with his evangelist in strong campaign. Meeting not half done, but engagements crowded by quarantine. Rogers will sing at Valparaiso. Herbert Yeuell.

The church at Brashear, Mo., desires to locate a good man. This is one of the best fields in northeastern Missouri. The man who takes the work must live there. This charge will support him for one-half time, and have arranged with other points contiguous for the other half, and can pay a salary of $800 or $900. The man who takes the work can in one year make the salary $1,000 or $1,200. It is an opening for some consecrated young man with a devoted wife. Write Dr. Jas. Hanks. Joel Brown.

Elyria, Ohio.—We had the pleasure of ordaining to the Christian ministry, February 21, Urlin Hootman, who graduates from Bethany College in June, and who is now pastor of the church at New Cumberland, W. Va. Brother Hootman went to Bethany from this church six years ago and we were delighted with the privilege of setting him apart to the ministry of the Word. From this church went Miss Ella Maddock to India. We have also become a Living-Link Church in the Foreign Society. We believe we are growing in more ways than in numbers. John P. Sala.

WITH THE WORKERS

L. V. Barbre reports frequent additions in his work at Carlisle, Ind.

E. T. Murphy occupied the pulpit of the Jackson Boul. Church the third Sunday in March.

The Martin family are in a meeting at Blackwell, Okla., which is attracting great audiences.

Lewis R. Hotaling, Hoopeston, Ill., is pushing the work with vigor and there are frequent additions to the church.

George W. Watson has accepted a call to the church at Lima, Ohio, and will close his work at Van Wert in the near future.

Claire L. Waite, past of the First Church, Milwaukee, Wis., preached upon, "A Plea for Young Men to enter the Ministry as a Life Work."

Rev. Mitchell, state evangelist of Nebraska, will hold a meeting at Franklin, Nebr., in the early part of March. W. R. Burbridge is pastor.

The church at Blackwell, Okla., has called George W. Weimer as pastor, to succeed G. W. McQuiddy, who has accepted the work at Alva, Okla.

J. A. Walters, the veteran preacher of Iowa, has removed to McGregor, Texas, where he will make his home with his daughter, Mrs. Vernon Harrington.

A three weeks' meeting has just been held by the Kensington Church, Philadelphia, by home forces, in which there were fifteen accession to the church. L. L. Higgins is the pastor.

C. H. Earenfight, pastor, and the church at Auburn, Ind., have closed a four weeks' meeting in which there were fifteen additions to the church. This is felt to be a successful meeting.

M. E. Chatley, who is now in the sixth year of his service with the church at Ravena, Ohio, says that the Ravena and Hiram churches will continue in the support of H. E. Eicher.

B. L. Wray, pastor of the Budd Park Church, Kansas City, Mo., is pushing things for the erection of their new house of worship. According to the prospective cut it will be a thing of beauty.

The fifth anniversary service of the church at Salem, Ohio, was held March 8-14. Addresses were made by M. J. Grable, of Bethany; T. E. Cramlet, Bethany; J. G. Slayter, Pittsburg, and the pastor, J. W. Reynolds.

J. E. Chase will leave Nebraska for Benjamin, Texas, about March 1. He will divide time with Crowell. We are truly sorry to lose Bro. Chase, and wish him a most pleasant and profitable work in the sunny southland.

David H. Shields, Salina, Kans., is delivering a series of Sunday evening sermons on the following topics: "Marriage as a Career for a Woman"; "Home the Fundamental Unity of Civilization"; "The Business of Home Building"; "Will the Home Survive."

The new house of worship at Burlington, Ind., was dedicated February 21, by J. O. Rose, state secretary. There was needed $700 to clear up all indebtedness, but when the offering was taken it amounted to $835. Charles O. Lee, the pastor, feels very hopeful for the work of the coming year.

Evangelist Richard Martin will dedicate the new house of worship at Peidmont, Kans., in April.

C. G. Kindred has again undertaken full pulpit duty and will preach both Sunday mornings and evenings. Though Mr. Kindred has been unable to do full work for seven months, the church has gone on with the work, and was never more flourishing. They are planning to erect a new Sunday-school building. One of the officers says, "We MUST have more room."

The annual report of the church at Fredonia, Kan., where H. M. Johnstone is minister, shows seventy-eight persons have been added to the membership of the church during the past year, and $4,877 to have been raised, $2,500 of which was for the building fund. The Ladies' Circle raised $672; the Bible-school $120; the Christian Endeavor Society $135. All departments of the church are in good condition at the present time.

D. F. Snider, pastor of the church at Newton, Kans., will, on account of his wife's health, close his work with the church the first Sunday in April. The church solicits applications for the work. There is a membership of 300 in a town of 800, and a good Sunday-school. Last year the church raised for all purposes $1900. All bills met promptly. Those who are interested should write Perry Hupp, 1024 North Main street.

Urlin A. Hootman, who was ordained to the Christian ministry by the church at Elyria, Ohio, February 21, six years ago came from a rural district to Elyria to study in a business college. He became a member of the Bible class at the Christian church and through this came back to the fellowship of th church he had once loved and then neglected. In this atmosphere he soon came to feel a desire to enter the ministry and went from here to Bethany College, where he remained for five years, preparing for preaching. Mr. Hootman is now pastor of the church at New Cumberland, W. Va. The Century bids him Godspeed in the calling to which he has dedicated himself.

Important Books

We are the publishers of some of the best known works pertaining to the Disciples' Plea for a united church. These important books — important in more ways than one—should be read and owned by every member of the household of faith.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo, cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes.

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union, collated and edited by Charles A. Young. 12mo, cloth, 364 pages, illustrated, postpaid $1.00, is an important contribution to contemporary religious literature. It presents the living principles of the church in convenient form.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Indiana, a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us: that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real may come to fruition that these ch as are given their present form."

Early Views and Separation of Baptist and Disciples, by Errett Gates. 8vo, cloth, gold side and back stamp, $. A limited number in paper binding will be mailed postpaid for 25 cents until stock is sold out.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, Pa.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, Mass.

The Christian Century Company

WITH THE WORKERS

The Oklahoma Christian Ministerial Association will meet at El Reno in April.

Miss Emma Lyon, Nankin, China, reports eight who have asked to be baptized. There is quite a revival in our churches in China.

W. C. Hull of North Tonawanda, N. Y., addressed a recent meeting of the teachers of the Sunday-school of the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo.

Rev. E. L. Prunty has begun work with the congregation at Chicago Heights, and has become a member of the Chicago Ministerial Association.

That was a novel plan of the C. W. B. M. Auxiliary of the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, which on a recent meeting allowed the honorary members to furnish the program. But the meeting was a success. There were representatives of other churches in the city on the program.

James Egbert, pastor of the church at Anaconda, Mont., has just completed writing a book entitled, "Alexander Campbell and Christian Liberty." On a recent Sunday morning he gave a review of the book, to the delight of his audience. The papers of the following day gave a generous space to a notice of the address.

A movement is on foot among the Texas brethren to establish a Home for the Aged in the city of Dallas as a Centennial thank-offering. A good beginning has been made. Through the will of Mrs. Juliette Fowler a fine tract of fifteen acres has been provided. The building will cost from $15,000 to $20,000. Already $3,000 has been subscribed. G. A. Faris, editor of the Christian Courier, and James H. Mohorter spent a few days in the field. They will undertake to raise the balance of the funds necessary in the early spring. There is a great need for such a home. There is not a sheltering door for the aged, indigent in all the south sustained by the churches of Christ.

Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Perisho of Charleston, Ill., recently gave $300 to the National Benevolent Association for the purpose of furnishing a ward for little girls in the new home, St. Louis. This gift was made for the purpose of creating a memorial to their daughter, who recently slipped away to the "Summer Land." This room presents a beautiful picture with its walls delicately tinted in pink and its rows of pretty white beds. It bears the name of Edith Perisho.

The Benevolent Association and the C. W. B. M., desiring to further exemplify the spirit of unity, will again unite in observing Easter. Charles Fillmore has prepared a beautiful cantata for the occasion. The association will be glad to furnish it free to as many Bible schools as will use it. The plan is to have all the young people unite in the Easter entertainment, and then divide the offering, each church making its own division. The demand for a great offering this year is imperative. The association has about 450 orphan and other unfortunate children and aged, indigent brethren under its care. Many of its homes are in debt for buildings, equipment, and in some cases, for the necessities of life. These institutions should all be freed of debt and presented as a Centennial thank-offering. The Benevolent Association, with her sweet ministry of love, must come to Pittsburg with her hands untied. This great brotherhood could give no clearer evidence of its fidelity and its gratitude to God than by a generous offering for the "Gospel of the Helping Hand."

The National Benevolent Association is asking its friends to undertake some definite task for its holy ministry in this Centennial year. It desires to present all of its institutions free of debt as a Centennial thank-offering. This can easily be done. To aid in accomplishing this worthy task it has set a number of goals before its friends. A gift of $25 in one or five annual payments will constitute the giver a Centennial life member. An offering of $100 per year makes the individual, Bible-school, Endeavor society, or church a life-line. A memorial room will be permanently established for a gift of $100. Any person, church or Bible-school giving $300 will be enrolled in the N. B. A. Centennial Legion; for a gift of $500 they will be enrolled on the N. B. A. Centennial Roll of Honor.

Bellaire, Ohio.—Our church has just completed a three weeks' meeting with Brother I. J. Spencer as evangelist. About one hundred people were added. It was in many ways an ideal meeting. We have been trying to teach the people to ignore "numbers," and to think only of saving men. From the first night to the last, with perhaps one exception, the house was filled with earnest worshipers. Brother Spencer has been known and loved in this community for thirty-seven years. He began his ministry here in 1872. He left this church for Baltimore after a pastorate of five years. Since that time he has been recalled for three meetings, two of them in the present pastorate. The musical part of our meeting was in charge of the Hopkins brothers, faithful members of the church here, assisted by Mrs. Allie Dean Waldo, formerly of Hiram. Nearly all our additions came from the Bible-school and from the regular congregation, hence we are hoping to see them remain faithful. We have religiously shunned all boom methods in Bellaire. The church is united and aggressive. We are fortunate in having a large number of faithful workers in every department whose lives are wholly given over to the work of the kingdom. God has used us all, and we give him the praise. W. D. Van Voorhis, Pastor.

Shenandoah, Iowa.—On February 7 T. J. Golightly closed his first year of service with the congregation at Shenandoah. During the year he preacher in his own pulpit seventy-eight sermons with a total of ninety-one additions. There was no outside help and no meeting, except a nine days' meeting which immediately followed a union meeting. Sermons preached elsewhere, twenty-nine; additions, two; convention addresses delivered, four; weddings, eight; funerals, about fifteen; calls made, numerous, and kindnesses received, innumerable. More than $1,100 was paid on debts and the year was closed with congregation free from all indebtedness except a small curbing debt which could not be paid till it was due. During the year the Bible-school was doubled; a men's class organized which is now pursuing a course in the "Life of Christ"; a young ladies' missionary circle and pastor's aid were organized and are doing efficient work. A new church is a growing necessity and is one of the hopes of the not distant future. Building funds are already in process of making in three of the different organizations of the church. All departments flourish. The church expects to have a stirring meeting conducted by one of our leading evangelists some time during the present year. It is believed this church is entering into an area of unprecedented prosperity.

The second Sunday in March the church at Hartford, Ohio, will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its organization, having been organized by William Hayes on the second Sunday in Harch, 1859, with ten charter members. Guy I. Hoover, minister of the West Pullman, Ill., church, and Sylvia M. Siegfried, missionary in the Philippine Islands, were brought up in this church and went to their larger work with its blessing resting upon them. We are inspired by their work to hope and trust that we may do better things for the master here at home. Not many small churches like this can say that it has sent out a minister in our own country and a missionary to the foreign field as well. We hope to have many of our former members and pastors present during the celebration of our semi-centennial. We will give them one and all a hearty welcome. Stanton, E. Hoover, Clerk.

Didn't you get your paper before Sunday last week, Mr. Californian and Mr. Texan? If you didn't, let us know for we have moved our press day two days earlier just for your sake. News should reach us by Wednesday except telegrams for which, together with very important Sunday happenings, we save a place in the forms on Monday.

A four weeks' campaign at Lowell, Ind., closed Sunday night with forty-five additions. Monday, reception to new members, four more added, making a total of forty-nine. J. E. Dunkelberger, the pastor, was assisted by Edward O. Berger of Chicago. As a result of the meeting the church is on a more solid footing, both spiritually and financially.

WOULDN'T GO BACK

To Old Days of Coffee Troubles.

Studious, sedentary habits are apt to cause indigestion, dyspepsia, nervous headaches, etc., but often it's the daily use of coffee that is at the bottom of the whole trouble, and it is surprising how quickly these troubles disappear when coffee is dropped and well-made Postum is the daily beverage.

A No. Dak. minister writes of the relief obtained when he changed from coffee to Postum. He says:

"I began using Postum about a year ago while stopping at the home of friends during the absence of my wife.

"It seemed almost providential, for during that time I got rid of coffee and its attendant ills. I used to have bilious attacks about every two weeks that completely used me up for a day or two at a time.

"I did not suspect coffee and was unable to account for these attacks. Since I began Postum I have had but one slight attack and the change to restored health is most acceptable.

"My wife declared on her return that nothing would induce her to give up coffee, but after a few careful preparations of Postum, according to directions on pkg., she thought it was superior to coffee in flavour, and now we would not change back to coffee.

"We feel we owe a debt of gratitude to Postum which has done so much for all of us—children and older ones."

WITH THE WORKERS

Nebraska

W. A. BALDWIN, SECRETARY,
Bethany.

J. H. Darner began a meeting in the Evangelical Church at Oconto on February 21. Brother Darner is a business man, but has preached for years and the western part of Nebraska abounds with the fruits of his work. We hope to see a church result from this latest effort.

The church at Elwood under the leadership of H. H. Shick has purchased a new location and will erect a new house of worship. The old property will be sold and proceeds applied on the new house. They are planning a meeting with some great evangelist in September.

F. E. Day reports fourteen added at Falls City the first month of his ministry, six by primary obedience. Some new officers have been chosen and the work is very promising. Lockhart and Lintt will be with them in a meeting in June and the city auditorium has been leased for the purpose. They are making a systematic canvass of the city.

Ford Ellis is in a meeting at Arnold in Custer county. The storm interfered for several days but the audiences had returned and the outlook was good. Sixteen added, to the 18th, some of them men. Bro. N. S. Carpenter is the regular minister and is well liked by the people.

H. M. Mitchell will begin a meeting this current week at State Line Church south of Franklin. Bro. Mitchell has been in a meeting at Wilsonville.

Stine and Miller will begin at Louisville, February 25. The state secretary spent Lord's day 21st, with them. There is a good band of brethren and sisters there, with enough power within them to carry forward a good work. They have a good live Bible school under the superintendency of A. W. Cline. A home department of forty-two and cradle roll of over thirty. A fair audience greeted the secretary in the morning, though the notice was brief and not generally known, and in the evening almost all the seats were taken. There were a large number of young people, mostly young men. We have a neat church, all paid for, a good location and we hope to do a good work there.

The secretary had a conference with the Omaha pastors, Kersey, Kirschstein and Ray, on the way home. South Omaha building is nearing completion and they hope to dedicate in April. These men have hard problems to meet that hardly are heard of by the preacher in the small town or village. They deserve the loyal sympathy of all Nebraska disciples in their struggle against the vices of that city. The Omaha First Church will again make South Omaha their special mission work under the state board this year. They pay $200 on the salary of the preacher. Bro. Kersey is keeping up his record in Bible school work, having organized a training class of 225 and hopes to double that.

Whiston and Longman are now at McMinnville, Ore. Will be there two weeks or more after this.

Austin J. Hollingsworth is expected to arrive in Nebraska in time to preach his first sermon at Ulysses on the 28th. We shall welcome him and his wife to the state again. His purpose is to take up studies fitting him for medical missions, beginning in Cotner Medical next fall.

Allan Murray has been called to the work at Greenwood. Adams and Dobson closed a most successful meeting with thirty-eight added, thirty-six of them baptisms. The church has been revived and is at work. The new preacher is on the ground. Welcome to Bro. Murray. He hails from Indiana. Adams and Dobson are now at Irving, Kans., and go from there to Clyde, Kans.

Hebron is rejoicing in a men's class of eighty and a women's class of fifty in the Bible school. These are organized under the new movement.

A. D. Harmon, minister at St. Paul, Minn., for many years, spent a few days in Nebraska, preaching one Lord's day at Auburn, where he was brought up. The church promptly gave him a unanimous call to become their pastor, and we are credibly informed that he is considering it. Doubtless it will have been decided before this is read. It would be splendid to have him in Nebraska.

Telegrams

Brooklyn, N. Y., Mar. 7.—Sterling Place Church of Christ becomes Living Link.
Herbert Martin, Pastor,
J. R. Jolly, Asst. Pastor.

Beatrice, Neb., Mar. 5.—Beatrice Church becomes another Living Link today. C. G. Elsam of Bina, Indiana, our new representative. This our third foreign missionary. Our first centennial aim realized. Great rejoicing.
J. E. Davis.

Waldron, Mich., Mar. 1.—Raised full apportionment for foreign missions yesterday in ten minutes. Rejoice with us. W. R. Cady.

Gulfport, Miss., Mar. 3.—Five persons have united with the Central Christian Church in this city. Louis H. Stine.

Dodge City, Kan., Mar. 1.—Passed our apportionment for foreign missions yesterday. Cash offering next Sunday. M. Lee Sorey.

Ft. Worth, Tex., Mar. 1.—The Christian Tabernacle joined Living Link family in Foreign Society today. Great rejoicing.
Edward M. Waits.

Cleveland, O.—Closed a short meeting at the Aetna Street Church, Feb. 28. John Ray Ewers of the First Church, Youngstown, O., was with us ten days. His forceful addresses and rugged personality are a great power in a series of meetings. There were thirty-seven additions. F. D. Butchart, Pastor.

Hannibal, Mo.—Hannibal Church becomes a living link in the Foreign Society.
Levi Marshall, Minister.

Bloomfield, Ia., Feb. 23.—Special meetings closed with 104 added. Eighty by confession and baptism; twenty-four by letter. Large number of men. Large number of adults. Bruce Brown of Valparaiso, Ind., was the evangelist. J. P. Garmong of Des Moines, Ia., singing evangelist. Brother Brown endeared himself to all here by his straightforward gospel preaching, minus sensationalism. At the close of the meeting the evangelist had the new members pledge for the support of the church—a fine piece of work this. Brother Garmong had everybody singing. He is the one to stir a church in singing the songs of the King. At close, he gave a lecture on "A Tour Around the World," coming out of his own experience.

Great Missionary Rally, February 11. President McLean, Dr. Butchart, W. H. Hinmath preset. We move on to greater heights.
F. D. Ferrall, Minister.

Des Moines, Ia., Mar. 8.—60 converts yesterday. Strong people. The first man at the morning service was a city lawyer and the last man last night was another. Five hundred and nine in the first thirteen days. Vast number of visitors from near and far paying rooming and board attending the meetings. There were 1369 attending Sunday-school yesterday and 1693 one week ago. It is a rare privilege to work with such people as Brother Medbury and the men of Drake University. Let no one think that this work is spontaneous. All of our helpers and pastor and his people are working hard and praying without ceasing. One thousand three hundred and seventy-six added since coming to Des Moines. Chas. R. Scoville.

Valparaiso, Ind., Mar. 8.—Herbert Yeuell here in greatest meeting for the time in the history of Valparaiso Church. One hundred and one in six days of invitation, forty-one yesterday. No mean feat to capture this University city. The great difficulties of the situation here cannot be appreciated from supposed strength of this church. We have passed through deep waters. Yeuell in every way more than equal to the situation. While the meeting is distinctively our meeting, yet all churches in town acknowledge great spiritual uplift. Students crazy over Yeuell's Saturday night lectures. Silver offering Saturday night $108. Owing to local conditions Yeuell perhaps never tackled a less prepared field. But once in possession of all the facts Yeuell went to work with tremendous enthusiasm. Bruce Brown.

CONGENIAL WORK
And Strength to Perform it.

A person in good health is likely to have a genial disposition, ambition, and enjoy work.

On the other hand, if the digestive organs have been upset by wrong food, work becomes drudgery.

"Until recently," writes a Washington girl, "I was a railroad stenographer, which means full work every day.

"Like many other girls alone in a large city, I lived at a boarding house. For breakfast it was mush, greasy meat, soggy cakes, black coffee, etc.

"After a few months of this diet I used to feel sleepy and heavy in the mornings. My work seemed a terrible effort, and I thought the work was to blame—too arduous.

"At home I had heard my father speak of a young fellow who went long distances in the cold on Grape-Nuts and cream and nothing more for breakfast.

"I concluded if it would tide him over a morning's heavy work, it might help me, so on my way home one night I bought a package and next morning I had Grape-Nuts and milk for breakfast.

"I stuck to Grape-Nuts, and in less than two weeks I noticed improvement. I can't just tell how well I felt, but I remember I used to walk the twelve blocks to business and knew how good it was simply to live.

"As to my work—well, did you ever feel the delight of having congenial work and the strength to perform it? That's how I felt. I truly believe there's life and vigor in every grain of Grape-Nuts."

Centennial Bulletin

Two Million Dollars in 1909

For the general advancement of the Kingdom of God (missions, benevolences, education, etc.), outside this congregation I hereby pledge at least half of one day's income or living once a month during 1909.

Name.....

Address.....

The above is a copy of the pledge card which the Centennial Committee has prepared to furnish free in whatever quantities desired.

It has been tried more than once and found splendidly successful. If one is tithing he need not regard this for it falls well within the present scale of giving, unless his distribution of the tithe is fearfully one-sided.

There is no thought, of course, of laying down a hard and fast rule to be followed by all Christians. One disciple in a thousand and one church in a hundred may be in such a peculiar situation that this suggestion will seem inapplicable.

Easy Steps in Giving.

This Centennial suggestion is meant for those who have not yet got well started in the grace of giving. It proposes a minimum offering that not one in a thousand would dare to call excessive. But the monthly repetition of this offering amounts to a respectable sum in a year. The beginner in giving is also encouraged by having all the others in the church start at the same time and on the same basis. There is not only encouragement but enthusiasm in numbers. "Let the whole line advance!"

Every Member Every Month.

Most churches that pretend to conduct their affairs in an orderly manner seek by weekly envelopes to get constant offerings from every member. This distributes the support of the church throughout the congregation and throughout the year. If one views it as a burden, this lightens it; if he considers it a privilege, this multiplies it. But most churches are still depending upon the occasional appeal, the high pressure pledge, the hypnotic sermon, and the strenuous canvass to secure creditable missionary offerings, or contenting themselves with mere collections, or no participation at all in the general affairs of the Kingdom of God.

The Centennial year is a good time for all of us to acknowledge that the salvation of the whole world outside of our little parish, and the advancement of God's Kingdom as a whole, deserve some measure of the same care and attention that we bestow upon the local church. While the ideal plan is to have an offering every week for each of these two phases of Christian service, it will be wise for most churches to attempt only the monthly offering for general purposes until the membership is more deeply interested in larger interests.

The Inspiration of Success.

The sixtieth of the income which the half day monthly pledge consecrates to missions, benevolence, education, etc., seems like a trifle when considered by itself, but when a whole congregation unites on the plan for a whole year, it will be found that such a magnificent work has been accomplished that everybody is filled with enthusiasm for every good work. A little church of two hundred members enlists one hundred of them on this basis and immediately is able to support its own missionaries in both the foreign and home field. Another congregation, the combined income of whose members is only $40,000 per year, enlists enough of its members on this plan to raise its general offerings in the year from less than a hundred to more than five hundred dollars.

Local Liberty.

There is no purpose to dictate to any congregation how it should distribute its Half Day Fund. It may give two months to foreign missions, two months to home missions, two months to state missions, two months to education, two months to benevolence, two months to church extension. It may make no suggestion whatever to its members as to how they should distribute their offering, but simply allow them the opportunity on the regular offering days formally observed, and let them keep the account and distribute the proceeds as they choose. It may appoint a special treasurer for general work as it has for congregational work, and have him remit from time to time according to the scale of distribution agreed upon and well understood in the church. The main thing is to give systematically and regularly.

Minimum and not Maximum.

In most churches there are a few members who are already giving beyond the scale proposed. These of course will be so delighted to find their brethren enlisted in the same great causes with them that they will be moved to increase their own offerings as the other members increase theirs.

Half a Million for Old Bethany.

The announcement by our beloved brother and father W. T. Moore, that a friend of Bethany College has offered to give $25,000 for every $100,000 contributed to the college endowment up to $400,000, will fill the hearts of the whole brotherhood with joyous hope. Thousands of earnest souls will dare to pray that two or three other men of means will rise up and claim the privilege of duplicating the proposition of the unknown brother, and that those with smaller portions will consecrate lesser gifts according to their ability until a full half million crowns the century for the mother of us all. The purpose is too splendid to fail of realization! Let no one wait to be asked to give, but voluntarily, spontaneously and gladly send in his subscription at once. The time is short!

Centennial Secretary.

Transylvania University

Something entirely unique in the field of education is being undertaken by Transylvania University in an effort to promote the interest of the graded schools, high schools, private schools, colleges and universities of the state. During the months of March, April and May a course of University Extension lectures will be given in about twenty of the more important towns and cities of Central Kentucky, by the President and Faculty of Transylvania, under the auspices of the public schools. These lectures are entirely free. The move, though just starting, is meeting with splendid success.

Transylvania is exceptionally fortunate in securing as the successor of Dr. H. G. Shearin in the Morrison Chair of English Language and Literature, Prof. Clarence C. Freeman. Prof. Freeman filled this chair in Transylvania for thirteen years, prior to going to Georgetown College. He is an alumnus of Transylvania, with his Doctor's degree from Johns Hopkins. His coming back after an absense of four years will be a distinct gain to the University.

The Delta Christian Endeavor Society of the Central Christian Church of Lexington has decided to refurnish one of the rooms in Transylvania University. The amount required to do this is $100.

A class of about thirty in Sociology in the University is preparing to gather statistics showing the economic, educational and social influences of the liquor traffic in several adjoining states, and an effort will be made to induce the authorities of Kentucky to publish these facts in their annual reports.

Dean T. B. McCartney, Jr., of the Department of Ancient Languages, recently attended the annual meeting of the Classical Association of the Middle West and South, held in New Orleans, and delivered an address on "Tragic Irony in Terrence." This is the largest of all the classical associations of America, and this meeting was one of the most important that the Association has held. While in New Orleans, Dr. McCartney visited Tulane University. A. L. Henry, Secretary.

In The Morning

Try A Charcoal Lozenger and A Glass of Water if Your Breath is Foul and Your Mouth Tastes Bad.

Immediately upon arising in the morning, should you have a bad breath and a disagreeable taste in your mouth, try a charcoal lozenger. Simply chew the lozenger up as you would so much candy and drink a glass of water, washing it down into the stomach in this manner. The effect is almost magical. The mouth becomes sweet and the breath pure and fragrant in a very short time.

After a few days you will notice that your stomach is digesting food much better. All traces of gases and sour stomach will dissappear, and the perfect assimilation promoted by a healthy stomach will build up strength and muscle, and your bad breath and coated tongue will be a thing of the past.

Give Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges a trial, results are assured, and positively no bad effects can arise from the use of charcoal. Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are made of young willow wood charcoal and pure, fresh honey, taken direct from the bee hive. You may eat all you want, give them to every member of the family. They will cleanse and purify the stomach and keep it clean and sweet.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are good for everybody at any time. Try them. For sale everywhere, 25 cents per box. Sample box will be sent free by mail upon request. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 200 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

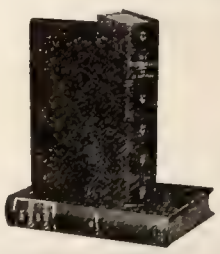
Two Pathetic Appeals



Two of the most pathetic appeals have come to our Benevolent Association recently. One was from a minister of one of our prominent churches, asking that the now aged and infirm daughter of one of our pioneer preachers be received into the Home for the Aged at Jacksonville, Ill. The request had to be denied because there was no room. This aged sister's father traveled far and wide preaching the gospel. He endured hardships. He often received no compensation for his services. It should be the joy of the church to save his aged daughter from the suffering and humility of receiving charity.

Following this appeal another was received from the widow of one of our great preachers. Her husband was widely known in his day. He left his widow, to use her words, "penniless." Though she is advanced in years, her heroic spirit still manifests itself. She says, "I am willing to do such work as I am able. I need a home. I pray God that I may not be disappointed." Her prayer was not answered, for there was no room. May God help us to prepare homes for such as these lest He may be found at last to have no room for us.

State Brotherhood at Decatur, Illinois

At Decatur, Illinois, Friday evening, April 9, the various Men's Brotherhoods of Disciples of Christ throughout Central Illinois will gather for the first State Brotherhood Banquet ever held within the borders of the Prairie state. The speaker of the affair will be announced later, but is assured to be one of the foremost brotherhood workers of the country. Coming as it does between two services of the Central Illinois Ministerial Institute, the affair will be attended by many preachers of the state, as well as visiting ministers from outside the state. The banquet will be served in the Central Christian Church promptly at six o'clock, and will close in time for the evening service of the institute which is to be addressed by T. W. Grafton. The price of the banquet is fifty cents per plate, and reservations may be made by addressing F. F. Howard, 370 West North street, Decatur, Ill. At this banquet plans for state organization of Brotherhoods will be made, which provide for annual banquets of this character, to be held at the time and place of the State convention, the next of which will occur at Eureka early this fall.

The Courage of Prayer

Do you dare to pray?

Whether we pray or not is at bottom a question of courage. What chokes our prayer is not intellectual doubt so much as moral cowardice. No coward can pray the prayer that availeth much.

The courage needed in prayer is not simply the kind we need to face our fellows—the courage the boy needs who ventures to kneel on his first night in the dormitory. That takes courage to be sure. And no doubt there are many homes in which there would be prayer if husband or wife had the courage to acknowledge to the other the need of the open window toward Jerusalem.

But it is not that kind of fear that prevents most people praying.

We are not very much afraid of the face of man; we are afraid of ourselves.

We lack the courage to face the facts of our own inner lives. Our thinking gets muddy when ourselves are the subject. Our vision is blurred when we look at our own lives. We can apply moral principles to the conduct of others but we make exceptions of ourselves. We haven't the courage to examine under all our disguises and make out frankly what our lives are really like. To be honest with our fellows, to tell the truth to our customer, to pay the last farthing of the debt—this is honesty. But it is a yet more highly refined honesty to look calmly and fearlessly into one's own soul and make out the facts one finds there and reckon with them as one would with any other set of facts it happened to be one's business to deal with.

Honesty is easier everywhere than in dealing with ourselves. We take a sly peep now and then at our soul. We really do not want to know what the facts of our inner life are. We are afraid to know.

And this timid and fearful way we have of treating with ourselves is the reason we do not pray. If we really pray we must search ourselves. We must be willing for God to search us. But God cannot search us in any way save through our own consciousness.

Our soul is such a mystery to us. We have a certain superstitious fear of looking into its affairs, much as a child has of going into the dark. But it is this fear that accounts for our not praying. To look into our soul honestly and bravely, resolved to deal with whatever facts we find there, good or ill, in a brave and honest way—this is the very act of prayer.

What would we certainly find if we fairly faced our own soul?

We would find sin there. And what else can we do with sin except pray?

We would find broken purposes for good; resolutions formed in the glow of some illuminating experience. How weak our memory is! How soon our inspirations pass! How almost inevitable is our return to the valley from some mountain of revelation and hope! A parting, a death, a triumph, a defeat—some experience that shocked us into a consciousness of the deeper realities of life. But so soon that consciousness fades. How can we keep it vivid save by prayer?

We would find fertile germs of good lying dormant in our soul. What can we do for these seeds of virtue except pray? Prayer is the atmosphere they need to grow in.

But our not praying is not only due to moral fear of the realities of our inner life; it is also due to fear of God. We are not sure that we can trust Him and our prayer is not genuine unless it practices trust.

It is a great risk to pray. It means that we trust ourselves to powers we cannot see. In prayer we walk by faith, not by sight. And the essence of faith is courage.

It is an incomplete definition of faith to say that it is a belief of testimony. It is a putting to the test of things not seen. Faith is of the will more than of the intellect. It is essentially a yielding of oneself to the unseen forces of the spiritual order in trust that "angels will bear us up intheir hands."

But this is an attitude of courage. To deliver one's soul into the keeping of God whom we have not seen is to take a risk. To let the crash come in business when we could avoid it by a simple trick of injustice is to turn from a path we can see to one we know not. Who can prove to us that it will be better to suffer injustice than to do injustice?

But our praying involves just this faith that the laws of the spiritual world are able to take care of us if we trust them. We are like the aeronaut who, reaching a great height with his balloon, fears to let go lest the atmospheric laws will not operate to inflate his parachute and so he will be dashed to the ground.

Great souls who have made prayer the vital breath of their lives tell us that God and his promises are to be trusted as one trusts the law of gravitation. They assure us that prayer releases energies in the universe which cannot be set going in any other way. They urge us to cast our care and our burden upon God and let Him care for us.

When our hearts take counsel of these great ones who have built their lives by prayer we too may learn the way to the secret place of God. But we shall never enjoy the blessings of prayer so long as we stand outside and discuss it. Only by assuming the risk, by courageously flinging away every human artifice and acting as if God would keep his promises, can we really know the peace and power of the life hid with Christ in God.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

CANAL CRITICISM

We have had several canal commissions and will doubtless have others before the big ditch is finished. President Roosevelt made up all of them and turned all of them down but the last one. He now, with characteristic impatience, denounces all who criticise the plans adopted or dare express a dissenting opinion to the lock type, as an enemy of the canal itself. He himself accepted the report of the minority of the engineering board who first reported on the subject. Plans have been changed after work was begun that involve a cost of some $10,000,000, and doubtless in the interests of economy, for mistakes are inevitable. The criticism will be a good thing. De Lessepps needed the search-light of opposition and the recent revelations of extravagance and misappropriation in New York City's public works, to say nothing of Pennsylvania's new capitol building, leave no room to boast of American superiority in such matters.

UNIFYING CHINA

China is not a nation but a people. The great task is to weld the great conglomerate into a nation. It can never be done without first arousing a patriotism. Perhaps the threat of foreign invasion has helped, for there is no cry so potent to a people as a threat against the territorial integrity of the fatherland. Education will doubtless be China's chief means. Sir Robert Hart says the Chinese are a reasonable people and historically and temperamentally peaceful. A big book trade is building and even western novels are in great demand. Old phrases are undergoing modification, new terms are being coined and enlarged dictionaries will become necessary soon. Scores of provincial dialects will pass with universal education and one tongue for the empire will be one of the greatest national accomplishments. The government is endeavoring to establish a standard of coin, based upon the almost universal tael. The tael is worth about $1.40 in our money. One hundred candareens will make one tael. Likewise, weights and measures will be based upon those most nearly universal over the empire now. A romanization of the alphabet and the metrical system would greatly enhance civilization in China.

PRESIDENT TAFT'S PROMISES

The new president's introduction to his inaugural address was a single sentence defining the purposes of that document as an effort to outline the "policies of the new administration so far as they can be anticipated."

The first is a promise that Roosevelt's policies will be followed. As one who had a part in them the new president will have more reason for keeping this promise than any other man could have. Mr. Roosevelt made the same declaration regarding the McKinley policies when he took the oath of office in Buffalo seven years ago. In fact, no man could more absolutely have done the contrary. Mr. Roosevelt could not carry out any man's policies but his own, and for that the country may well be thankful, as the sequel has proved. The only fear now is that Mr. Taft will return to the McKinley policies more than he will adhere to those of his distinguished predecessor. He will have more of the McKinley temperament, for which we may too be duly grateful, but if he can keep that temperament and still forward the work of the last administration we shall be most grateful. The appointments to the new cabinet give some of the sanguine concern. Four of the men are distinguished corporation attorneys, taken directly from the job into the cabinet. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor served the Standard Oil Co. He is appointed to that very important office in a time when his portfolio needs a man who will without prejudice deal with the trust and labor questions. The new Attorney General is likewise a corporation lawyer of eminence. These two will need to serve the government in its struggle with their old clients as ably and energetically as they did said old clients.

Chief among new things promised is the revision of the tariff immediately, and to that end Congress will be convened on March 15. It will doubtless be a long drawn battle for advantage for every section and industry will want to keep its preference and assess the damages against some other. Of the new president's statesmanship, as distinguished from mere provincial politics, there is no doubt. But he alone will represent the whole country and not some specific section. The proof of statesmanship will fall rigorously among the members of congress by the manner in which they consider the interests of all rather than those of their own districts.

Another new thing promised is the Postal Savings Bank. It was promised by both political platforms last autumn, but filibustered out by the "elder statesmen" in the senate. It might be asked, by the way, why this sort of filibuster excites so much less comment than one LaFollette happens to make. Most surprising in the new President's demands is that for a graduated income tax. It is to be hoped he will succeed in these and all other efforts for the people.

ELECTRICITY IN HORTICULTURE

Sir Oliver Lodge has, for a number of years, been conducting experiments to ascertain the effect of electricity on growing plant life. The experiments have proven so successful that we are likely to add "electroculture" to the arts of the horticulturist. His experiment farm now includes twenty-five acres and the necessary current is provided by a dynamo run with a two horse-power benzine motor. It will thus be seen that the expense of operation is not great and as the current is used only in the day time the same motor that lights the house can do the work. The chief expense is in the installation of the plant. Wires are strung seventeen feet above the soil. The yield of wheat was increased from 29 per cent to 39 per cent over that grown in the same field and under the same circumstances minus the electricity. Strawberries showed an increased product of 35 per cent and like results were obtained with vegetables.

An Italian inventor has improved results on poor soil by electrifying the earth and a Frenchman has used resistance coils to produce artificial hot-house heat. Most unique of all agricultural use is that of the Germans in turning an electric search light over caterpillar-ridden fields and ingeniously attracting the moths by the ton into the light where they were caught up by an exhaust fan and carried into a glowing furnace. In one night and with a single light, three tons were thus caught and destroyed.

A NEW NATION BORN

South African states are adopting articles of union. Their incorporation is dependent upon the sanction of the British parliament but that it will be given is a forgone conclusion. Like the new state constitution of Oklahoma, the document that becomes the basis of the new union is less a constitution than a set of fundamental laws which may be easily changed by a simple act of legislation. After the mother government has approved of it the separate states will do as they please about uniting under it. If two of them agree it becomes operative and the others may come in when they like. There is moral certainty that two or more of the four will do this and it is generally believed all four will do so.

The new Colony will not be so independent as are Canada and Australia. The Governor General will be the real executive head and he will be appointed in London. He will appoint eight of the forty senators and his own cabinet and no financial legislation may be considered except upon recommendation of himself and his council. The states will elect eight senators each and all the members of the house.

In our nation the states retain all powers not expressly granted to the Union. In South Africa the Union retains all powers not expressly granted to the states. The Governor General, who may not even be a resident, but some lord from England perhaps, not only, with his council, initiates legislation, but appoints the governors for the states and they each have, in their respective provinces, the same powers that he has in the Union.

The Boers are allowed full and equal privileges with Englishmen. The poor native gets no political rights at all. He outnumbers the whites from four to one in Cape Colony to twenty to one in Natal. He is not even allowed to vote, with the exception of a few educated colored men in Cape Colony who already have the privilege. The Dutch language is official as well as the English and all records will be kept in both tongues.

The forms of autocracy are further manifested in the salaries paid and the constitution of quorums. The Governor General is to get $50,000 per year and members of parliament $15,000. Senators will hold ten years and Members half that time. Out of 40 senators 12 may form a quorum and 30 out of 121 members of the house. This is popular government with the populace present only to see the work done. It may do as it pleases so long as it please to do what the Governor General desires.

But English Government is a most wholesome study in evolution. Here are the beginnings of what in time, according to good English precedent, will be a very democratic nation. Gradually the parliament will absorb power, the autocracy yielding "benevolently" and "graciously condescending" as the union becomes more compact and the people able to make a unanimous demand. No land is more democratic in fact than is England. Only her forms are aristocratic.

THE JOHN BAPTIST OF THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE

John G. Wooley announces that hereafter he will do battle for the Anti-Saloon League. The Prohibition party has done the work of a John Baptist for the cause and with gracious spirit ought to decrease that a greater may come, and coming, conquer. All honor to the Prohibition party and to the men who, like Wooley, have battled almost alone until the church and the public conscience were aroused. Now all honor to men who, like the splendid Wooley, can keep the courage of a Baptist and while holding the same old fighting principles join in the new and more effective manner of fighting.

The prohibition party never elected a candidate by a party vote. It has always been by the non-partisan vote. Yet they have helped greatly in creating that non-partisan vote. Let us get prohibition. If it be by saying "I must decrease that another may increase," all honor to the courage that will put the cause above either personal or party consideration.

The virtue of the Anti-Saloon League is in its ability to center the greatest number of votes in the most strategic place and gain a victory. That has ever been wise generalship. It wins a town and a county here and there and they in turn help to win others until so many are won that a whole state votes prohibition. When enough states are won, the nation will be the grand battle-field and the Waterloo of the liquor traffic.

The danger in the way of the Anti-Saloon League is that partisan patriots will by some hook or crook twist it to partisan ends. The danger in the Prohibition party is that partisan loyalty may put the means (the party) before the end it has existed to bring about, i. e., the extermination of the saloon.

Paragraphic Editorials

The 24th International Convention of the Christian Endeavor Societies will be held at St. Paul-Minneapolis, July 7-12. The theme of the Convention is "Thy Kingdom Come." The sessions are to be held in the new Auditorium seating more than 10,000 people. In connection with the Convention sessions there will be held simultaneous meetings to consider special lines of Christian Endeavor work. Each day will begin with a quiet hour service, followed by a school of methods held in six divisions, considering such questions as Christian Endeavor methods, mission work, Bible study, Christian citizenship, evangelism, etc. A number of interesting exhibits, illustrative of different features of the work, have been arranged. Speakers of national and international reputation, whose names will be announced soon, have been secured for the Convention program. A great patriotic service will be held on Thursday afternoon at the State Capitol, where the crowd will be massed on the steps and terraces for a song service and address. A special round trip rate of $12.00 from Chicago to St. Paul has been made by all lines, and it is hoped that a general rate of one fare and a half round trip from all parts of the country can be secured.

The latest number of "Charities and the Commons" presents the situation in reference to the white slave traffic in such a manner as to awaken the interest of every lover of righteousness. It is apparent that Chicago is fast rivaling New York as an American clearing house for an international white slave traffic. The investigations conducted by District Attorney Sims and his assistants, among whom is Mr. Clifford Roe, an active member of the Hyde Park Church of the Disciples, discloses the astonishing and alarming fact that not less than 15,000 foreign girls have been imported during the past year for immoral purposes. The formation of the National Vigilance Committee for the suppression of the traffic has led to the organization of branches in many of the states. The purpose of this organization is not only to prevent the importation of girls to America for this vicious object, but as well to stop the traffic of American girls to foreign countries, especially China and Japan. In addition, it is the effort of this organization to prevent such inducements being offered to young girls in small towns and cities as allure them to large places, such as Chicago, with the expectation of finding profitable employment, only to discover that they have fallen into the hands of this awful traffic. Parents, ministers, teachers, and guardians of public morality cannot exercise too great precautions in preventing the removal of girls from country districts and small towns to the cities unless there is absolute assurance that their future employment and welfare are provided for. The Roman Catholic church is beginning to take active measures to prevent the spread of this alarming traffic. The Protestant churches cannot be too vigilant in the same cause.

Professor J. W. McGarvey writes us a note taking exceptions to the article contributed by H. M. Brooks in our issue of March 6. Both fairness and good taste prompt us to say that the article in question had better not have been printed. We do not think Mr. Brooks conceived it quite as it sounded when read from the printed page. In this he shares a misfortune common to himself and the venerable professor he inveighs against. There are radical differences between Professor McGarvey's way of thinking and our own. As occasion requires we mean to discuss these in the utmost candor. And while we are of those who believe that Professor McGarvey's writings have, in their indirect influence, worked injustice to many godly men, we never have classed him with those who in fiendish zeal pursue their victims from pastorate to pastorate. We believe Professor McGarvey loves his "boys" and rejoices to have them go forward to larger truth than that unto which even he has been able to lead them. We refuse to lend a hand to the discrediting of his character which, with others of its kind, is the most significant product of our hundred years of history.

The entrance of Mr. Roosevelt into the field of religiousjournalism is an event of significance both for the country and for journalism. As associate editor of the Outlook he will probably take little part in strictly theological discussions, but the influence of his writings will be like a tonic for the moral life of the nation. At the outset of his editorial career he sounds a characteristic note of purity and courage in journalism. He has regard for the moral responsibility of a newspaper. He condemns the theory that the press is simply a mirror of the times. It is, to his mind, one of the most potent factors in giving character to the times and must be held to account for the way it uses its power. We are glad the ex-President will not let us forget him. His spectacular hunt will be watched with world-wide attention. On his return it may prove that his prophet-like spirit will find in the press a medium for yet more valuable service to his fellowmen than even his exalted station as president afforded him.

Preliminary announcement is made this week of the World's Missionary Conference which is to be held in Edinburgh June 14-24 of next year. Its purpose is the consideration of matters vital to the extension of the kingdom of Christ throughout the world. It will discuss such questions as "Carrying the Gospel to all the World"; "The Native Church and Its Workers"; "Education in Relation to the Christianization of National Life"; "The Missionary Message in Relation to Non-Christian Missions"; "The Preparation of Missionaries"; "The Home Base of Missions"; "Missions and Governments"; and "Co-operation and the Promotion of Unity." These themes are to be presented by committees already chosen. The chairman of the Conference is Lord Balfour of Burleigh, and many of the most distinguished representatives of missionary work in the various churches throughout the world will be present. This is one of the cheering signs of the times in reference to the arousal of Christendom to the seriousness and importance of missionary work.

The offering for Foreign Missions gives every promise of reaching a mark never before attained. The churches are sending up a shout of triumph all over the land. Our page of "Echoes" should be read, every word. Every church that has not yet taken the offering should do so without delay. Finis Idleman and his great Central Church of Des Moines are setting a good example. They had been engaged in an evangelistic meeting at the time others were preparing for the March offering. Not being ready by March 7 they are devoting the entire month to making ready for a great offering later on. Let no church fail to make the offering even though the special day has passed. Now is still the accepted time. The seed sowing of the past months should yield a rich harvest throughout March. The reports we present this week are but the first fruits. Great sheaves are yet to be garnered. The Master of the field is at work with the reapers.

In view of the many attempts which are being made today to bring about some form of church unity, the editorial in the March number of the Biblical World entitled "The Catholicism of the New Testament" is full of suggestion. Attention is called to the fact that the New Testament does not present a single homogeneous view of Christianity—that there are striking differences of thought to be found in this early collection of Christian writings. The attempt to unify Christianity by insisting upon one universal form of belief or one official organization is thus out of harmony with the New Testament itself. "If Christ could conquer such different spirits in the first century and transform them with all their personal individuality into ardent apostles, may we not likewise believe that He may conquer the twentieth century, different though it is from the first, in such a way as to conserve all that is distinctive of our age while inspiring it with His spirit and purpose?"

Leslie W. Morgan, the Pastor at Hornsey in North London, has been granted a leave of absence from his church and will return to the United States for a few weeks' visit with his people during the summer. He has been for many years a prominent figure in the work of the Disciples in England. He was at first the pastor of the church at Southampton and later at Hornsey, London. In connection with his other duties, he has been secretary of the Christian Association, the name of the united work of the Disciples in England. His visit will be a pleasure to his many friends in America. He will be accompanied by Mrs. Morgan, who was the daughter of Mr. Misslebrook, one of the leading members of the Southampton church.

A succession of communications has been received at our office reporting in much detail a deplorable division of the church in Erlanger, Ky., of which S. S. Lappin, office editor of the Christian Standard, is pastor. We did not know why so many sources should have united in informing us of this sad affair until one correspondent frankly suggested it was our chance to "get even" with the Christian Standard by showing that a church presided over by a "conservative" pastor was quite as likely to be torn asunder as one presided over by a "progressive" pastor. We have no intention of exploiting the sorry affair and have only contempt for those who would impute to us such motives for doing so.

Face to Face With The Devil In Prayer and Fight

By Charles Clayton Morrison

William A. Sunday, the Evangelist, Stirring Illinois' Capital City with Relentless Warfare on Sin. Springfield at his Feet. Man of almost Superhuman Fascination

Billy Sunday may properly be numbered among the great preachers, if the standard of greatness is the psychical effect of the sermon. He grips the attention, galvanizes the conscience and bends the will of every man among his thousands of hearers. I think I have never seen the exercise of such power over men as he exhibits. Nine thousand people are held in a vise for an hour and a half while he preaches. No one stirs. He moves his hearers often to applause and to laughter. Rarely does he move them to tears—at least thus far in his meeting.

Thrives on Opposition.

He is primarily a militant preacher. He has enemies and he makes the most of them. If he had no real enemies he would make some for the occasion. In his opening sermon in Springfield he said:

> "Twenty-two years ago I drew the sword in defense of God, home and native land. I have never sheathed it, and never will until the undertaker pumps me full of embalming fluid. Before that I will send for my wife and say, 'Have me skinned, send it to the tanner, make it into drum heads, and send them up and down the land and say, 'My husband still lives and fights the whisky gang.'"

Preaches Like He Plays Ball.

He preaches hard. He flings his physical personality into his sermon with great vehemence. At the climax of a period he is often so exhausted that he cannot get breath and strength to begin a new paragraph. He preaches like he used to run bases on the Chicago base ball team. When I heard him over ten years ago his singer used to "coach" him from behind the pulpit as they coach a base runner. "Fine work, old man! Hit 'em again!" "Come down now, Billy, not so hard, you can't stand that!" "Easy boy! That's better!" "Amen! Now you're coming!" These and similar heartening and restraining "exhortations" could be heard by those sitting on the platform behind the preacher.

Wonderful Endurance Power.

He preaches as if this sermon would be his last, and you feel that it must certainly be his last. How his voice can ever endure another sermon you can not imagine; but he comes up on Sunday night after speaking an hour and a quarter in the morning and again in the afternoon, as fresh, apparently as on the week nights. And he has been keeping this up without surcease for twenty years.

Meeting him again in Springfield twelve years after my association with him in a meeting in an Iowa town, I was surprised at his physical preservation. The newspapers describe the "cat-like" agility of his physical organism. To me he is like a panther with exhaustless, restless and resistless energy.

He Draws the Line Through a Town.

Evidently what Billy Sunday aims to do on entering a town is to get a line drawn between those for and those against. He makes no such shallow assumption as that all church members are on one side of the line and all non-church members on the other. His line weaves itself in and out among the worshippers in the sanctuary, separating sheep from goats there before God's altar. He is merciless in his castigation of church members.

The elements that weaken the church are card playing, dancing and treatre-going, formalism, commercialism and higher criticism. But these are only the signs of the absence of prayer, Bible reading and real worship.

Attacks Definite and Concrete Evils.

He preacher against sins, not against sin. The saloon is his outstanding target. Along with it he puts gambling and gossiping and low-necked gowns and the social evil. He talks about these things in plain words. He makes it clear where his line is drawn. If you do these things or stand for them, you are against God whether you are in the church or out of it. I expect to see thousands of decks of cards destroyed before Sunday is through with Springfield.

Political corruption, too, is exposed in a drastic manner. Here is the strongest and, to my mind, most wholesome influence of the Sunday campaign. He does vitalize the social conscience. He is preëminently a civic or social evangelist. In this respect his work (if one may venture in the second week to forecast the curve of the whole meeting), is unique among evangelists. He is evidently dealing with social forces and striving to flush and cleanse the social channels as well as to rescue individuals from a lost world. But I must not interpret too much just yet. In later papers I will state my judgments about the meeting. Just now I mean only to describe what I see.

Neither a Fanatic Nor a Grafter.

And I must not get too for away from Billy Sunday himself in this paper. He is a wholesome contagion. You think when you read his speeches that he is a raving fanatic. He is anything but that. He sees the humor of the whole situation. He is a great laugher himself. He comes into the building amid the applause of the thousands while some pastor helps him off with his great coat and all the while his tongue is fairly hanging out with contagious laughter. At some sally of wit, when the audience laughs, he turns to the preachers and laughs with them. He enjoys life; sleeps well; dines out; umpires ball games. I have heard him called a maniac. No term is more inappropriate. He holds a sane attitude of detachment which is essential to effectiveness in any public moral task.

Sermons Mostly Committed to Memory.

Yet no one can fairly accuse him of being an actor. He learns his sermons by heart, he told me. But there is not the slightest betrayal of this fact to his hearers. His words sound as if they were composed on the spot. His personality is thoroughly identified with his message. He makes you feel that this message is made especially for you and he delivers it to you with tremendous power. I do not doubt his sincerity for a moment. The fact that he receives vast sums of money seems to me not to warrant the suspicion often cast upon his sincerity. The ten or twelve thousand dollars given him for a five weeks' meeting makes the outside world gasp, but to the townspeople who have witnessed the magnitude of every feature of the meeting it seems proportionate, and the only appropriate thing to do.

Tremendous Personal Power.

There is some thing vast and overwhelming about Billy Sunday. Everybody feels it. It isn't his physical stature; he is not a large man. It isn't his godliness; no one thinks of him as possessing the ascetic virtues; he is no Evan Roberts or Gipsy Smith.

But to you he stands for power. Folks feel that he knows the under side of life. He knows the drains under church and home and market. He knows where these drains are clogged and why and what clogs them. He comes into the city to look after the drains, to flush the sewage mains, to carry off the corruption that has become noisome to the helpless denizens. It is heroic business. There is something wierdly fascinating, almost hypnotic, in the very suggestion of it.

Why Not Leave Out the Slang?

"Mr. Sunday," said a nice minister who had heard him several times, "if you would leave out the slang I cou'd find no fault with you at all." "If I cut out the slang," Sunday replied, "I would preach to no more people than you do." "I am an apostle to the 78,000,000 of the 80,000,000 people of our land," he says again and again. He believes that the great mass of people are just plain folks with a lot of "cussedness" that they need to be rid of. Slang is just the keen edge of the surgeon's knife. Billy Sunday assumes that sin and sinful men are at the bottom of the home's troubles and the church's troubles and the city's troubles and the heart's troubles. It isn't weakness that is the matter, it isn't intellectual doubt, it isn't ignorance—it is just "plain deviltry" he says.

Hell and the Devil are Realities.

The devil is in Springfield. The business men, the politician, the church men and women, the mothers, even, have taken him to their bosoms. The whole town has "hit the grit for hell, H-E-L-L. not Gehenna or hades or any other ethical place."

Billy Sunday's Prayer to the Devil

Following one of his sermons, Mr. Sunday asked all who wished to be prayed for to rise. Nearly every one of the 8,000 people arose. Mr. Sunday prayed as follows while standing upon a chair:

"Jesus, that is a magnificent tribute to our interest in Thee and to Thy cause. I am proud of the men and women at Springfield, and I know you are, too, Jesus. I am sure the devil isn't. I am sure he hates to see them get up. I am sure he tried to keep them down, and that he said to that girl, 'You keep your seat; you know you have not done right.' I am sure he said to that young man, "You keep your seat; you know where you were last night and others know where you were last night, and you went home drunk, too.' I am sure he said to that man, 'You keep still and make no move; you know you cussed him to day and he is sitting over there. Don't listen to Mr. Sunday. You keep your seat.' Say, devil, you have gone up and down these aisles tonight and in and out among the seats and you have done your dirty best to keep men and women down, but they have made a stiff fight and they are too manly and they are too womanly. We hate your cause, devil. We hate the sin you made us commit. We hate it because we are ashamed. We hate it because it brought a blush to our cheek and a tear to our eye, and made our mother blush and our sisters ashamed to call us 'brothers.' It led us to put a stain upon the family escutcheon. It made the name synonymous with sin. We are ashamed. And what do you want us to add to what we have already done, devil? Aren't you satisfied? GOD CURSE YOU! Aren't you satisfied with all the wreckage you have caused? Aren't you satisfied with the houses of ill-fame that you have packed full? Aren't you satisfied with the men and women you have robbed of reason, and especially from our loved ones? Aren't you satisfied with the jails and penitentiaries you have packed full, and with the police stations? Aren't you satisfied with all the wreckage in the stale beer joints and the victims in the dives and the bum haunts and the iniquity in the red-light district, and all the thieving and the cursing, and the lying, and the blasphemy, and the adultery? Oh, devil, aren't you satisfied? Do you want us to do more? Oh, God pity you. We won't, because through Jesus Christ and we are going to see a new Springfield, devil. I tell you, you have cursed yourself. You have stayed here long enough. Do you hear? The forces of righteousness, in the church and out of it, Catholic and Protestant, and all, are going to arise and we are going to put a stop to your work, devil. You will have cold feet when you see the forces that will take their stand for truth and righteousness. And there won't be a traitor. We will all be patriots in these days. Lord, hear us; bless us; bless our wives; bless our little ones; bless, we pray Thee, old Springfield. Lord, hear us and lead us and love us and forgive us and we will praise You forever, through Jesus Christ, our blessed Savior. Amen."

The church's job doesn't call for pity. It doesn't call for science. It doesn't call for scholarship. It calls for two fists. It calls for backbone. It calls for straight-out, straight-up manhood.

So the community comes soon to forget his slang. They take him as you take the scavenger. You do not expect the scavenger to be well dressed nor to speak in a low voice. And if a man is really fighting the devil and demonstrates that he can lick him you don't mind if he does take off his coat and throw away his collar while he does it.

Inside and Outside Views.

This, at least, is the way the people feel who watch the fight from night to night. And if some fledgling psychologist who had read a book about "Primitive Traits in Religious Revivals," or "Varieties of Religious Experience," or some thing of that sort and had made a few trips of inspection to the social settlements of a great city, should venture to suggest that the Sunday Revival, instead of conquering the devil, was making a better chance for him to control the city later on—he would be met with the blankest expression he ever saw upon a human face.

The Tyranny Of Opinionism

By W. T. Moore

While discussing questions in which we differ, it might be well to refresh our minds with a little history. This, I think, is specially appropriate in our Centennial year. In preparing a history of our religious movement, I am deeply impressed with the fact that the fundamental thought of the pioneers was to build upon a "Thus sayeth the Lord" for everything relating to faith and practice. Logical deductions, however plausible, were not to be made tests of Christian fellowship. The following from Mr. Campbell is worthy of much consideration at this particular time:

"Q. Are men never to be called to an account for their opinions?

A. No. There is no instance of this kind in the Jewish or Christian Scriptures—God alone is judge of thoughts and private opinions.

Q. But if private opinions are expressed, are they not to become matters of discipline?

A. By no means, unless a person expresses them for the sake of compelling others to receive them, or to exclude them from their fellowship, if they do not receive them. In that case he is answerable, not for his opinions, but his practices. He is a factionist, is seeking his own honor, making a party, and on these accounts sins against the Christian constitution; and such a person, after a second admonition, is to be rejected.

Q. Are not opinions purely intellectual matters, and not to be regarded as moral principles?

A. They are purely intellectual matters, and ought to be so regarded; but when any person makes them principles of action, he places them upon the same footing with divine oracles, and demands as much for his own reasonings as for the express commandments of the Great King.

Q. How do you distinguish between faith, opinion, and knowledge?

A. Faith is the belief of facts testified, or of testimony; knowledge is the assurance derived from actual and sensible perception, by the exercise of our own senses; and opinion is the view which the mind takes of all matters not certified to us by testimony, or our own experience. Thus Newton, knew that bodies, specifically lighter than water, would swim in it; he believed that King Harry VIII seceded from the Roman Catholic institution; and he was of opinion that the planet Saturn was inhabited.

Q. Does not the correctness of a person's opinions depend upon the amount of information which chance may have thrown in his way, or upon the strength and activity of his own mind, and consequently are not necessarily a part of his moral character?

A. As a man who opines that the earth was once a metallic ball, and he who regards it as having been as flat as a plate, may be equally as good citizens, so he that opines that free agency and rationality are the same thing, and he that opines that God in some mysterious way,

"Binding nature fast in fate,

may be equally good citizens in the kingdom of Messiah.

Q. Are not the opinions of men placed upon the same footing with the commandments of God in all the creeds in the Christian world?

A. They are very generally, if not universally so."

Mr. Campbell wrote this the same year that the union took place between the Reformers and Christians in Kentucky, and in 1844 he wrote a series of articles for the Harbinger under the title, "The Tyranny of Opinionism," in which he elaborated very fully his conviction that Christian union could never be consummated by emphasizing the value of opinions.

But should any one refuse to follow Mr. Campbell's views of this matter, it may be well for him to read carefully what Isaac Errett says about practically the same thing in his first issue of the "Standard" after it was removed to Cincinnati. It appears that a writer in the "Apostolic Times" had sounded the alarm of "apostasy" because "we have preachers in our ranks who grow furious and bluster much if even a hint is dropped as to their lack of soundness; yet ask them what they have to say on expediency, progress, organs, recognition, etc., and they reply: "Oh, Why, Well, and end with a significant chuckle." In replying to this, Brother Errett used the following very impressive language:

"Any attempt to introduce and enforce anything as a matter of faith or duty, which the apostles did not enforce in the name of our Lord, would be a step in apostasy. And any attempt to compel uniformity in thinking or in practice, where the Apostles have left us free, is virtual apostasy.

The following week he continued the argument with respect to the matter of "apostasy," and among other things, he says:

"The germs of apostasy from Christ are found in the presumptuous spirit that seeks to dictate where Christ has not dictated.

Division and its bitter fruits may come as readily through the attempt to forbid that which Christ has not forbidden, as through an attempt to impose that which Christ has not imposed. . . . Two things, it strikes us, must be carefully kept in mind, if we would legitimately work out the spiritual emancipation contemplated in the reformation which we plead:

1. The necessity for free and unembarrassed research with a view to grow in grace and knowledge. It is fatal to assume that we have certainly learned all that the Bible teaches. This has been the silly and baneful conceit of all that have gone before us. Shall we repeat the folly, and superinduce a necessity for another people to be raised up to sound a new battle-cry of reformation? Must every man be branded with heresy or apostasy whose ripe investigations lead him out of our ruts? Must free investigation be smothered by a timid conservatism or a presumptuous bigotry, that takes alarm at every step of progress? Grant that errors may sometimes be thrust upon us. Free and kind discussion will soon correct them. There is not a hundredth part of the danger from an occasional outcropping of error, as the result of free investigation, that must accrue from the murderous stiflings of free thought and free speech. An attempt to preserve union on such conditions not only renders union worthless by the sacrifice of liberty, but will defeat its own purpose, and compel, in time, new revolutionary movements.

2. The absence of all right to control our brethren where Christ has left them free. Such freedom may sometimes alarm us. Creed-bound communities may lift their hands in holy horror at the "latitudinarianism" that we allow. But it is not worth while to accept principles unless we are willing to follow them to their legitimate results; and we insist that Rom. xiv. allows a very large liberty, which we have no right to trench on except with the plea of the demands of Christian love."

Now it will be seen that the founder of the Christian Standard was not only opposed to magnifying opinions into matters of importance, but he carries the war into Africa and affirms that those who do magnify these opinions, or attempt to stifle the "free and unembarrassed research" with a view to grow in grace and knowledge, are the real apostasies, and not those who favor such investigation.

While I have little fear of "apostasy" from either one extreme or the other, of recent discussions, at the same time it is well to understand where we are, from a historical point of view. I have long since held to the view that there is much greater danger from a narrow construction of liberty than from any broad construction of it. We ought to keep from both of these extremes, and I am persuaded that a large majority of our brethren will do so; and I consequently have no fear of any "apostasy," unless it be an apostasy with respect to the regnancy of love.

Echoes Of The March Offering

A GOOD START.

The returns for the first four days following the March Offering for Foreign Missions show that 251 churches sent offerings, a gain of thirty-seven over the corresponding number last year. The 251 churches gave $5,966, a gain over last year of $1,175. The total receipts from all sources for four days amounted to $8,173, a gain of $1,989.

This is a good all around gain. There has never been more wide spread enthusiasm over the March Offering in our history. More than ordinary interest has been taken in reaching the apportionment.

It is gratifying to be able to report thirteen new Living-link churches. A number more are expected soon.

Columbia, Mo.: We will run beyond amount necessary for our living link in foreign missions.—Madison A Hart.

Lockhart, Tex., March 8: Offering for foreign missions in First Church, $50. Meeting apportionment with more to come in. Endeavor Society gives $10 additional.—E. O. Sharpe.

Midland, Texas, March 8: Presented to our people yesterday the Foreign Missionary work, urging that we raise the six hundred dollars to keep our missionary in the field.

We adopted the apportionment plan in the offering, asking each member to give a certain amount—according to his means. Most of them have responded, accepting the apportionment. This assures us a place in the living link column.—A. C. Parker.

We landed on the safe side of our apportionment by a good margin.—J. H. Craig, Logansport, Ind.

We raised our apportionment at Siloam.—J. H. Bornwasser, Lexington, Ky.

Am glad to announce to you that Mansfield, O., Church stays in the Living-link line this year.—Chas. R. Oakley, Mansfield, O.

The Fourth Avenue Church will send check for its apportionment in a few days.—T. L. Lowe, Columbus, O.

The church reaches the apportionment this day. This is a greater victory for us than the giving of $1,000 by stronger churches.—F. M. Morgan, Minonk, Ill.

We have gone a little beyond our apportionment.—M. O. Johnson, Edgerton, O.

Offering for Foreign Missions over $50.00. Raised last year $35.56.—E. D. Salkeld, Lakewood, O.

Mantau Center has passed its apportionment, and is still gathering up some fragments.—M. B. Wood, Hiram, O.

We received the largest offering yesterday in the history of the Ravenna Church. The joint support of A. C. Eicher in India for another year is assured.—M. E. Chatley, Ravenna, O.

Our offering will be near, if not quite, $50.00 against $18.30 last year.—E. B. Redd, Flora, Ill.

Our offering for Foreign Missions $360.00, and more coming.—R. B. Helser, Centralia, Mo.

We are turning our attention to the foreign field, and shall do so during the entire month of March.—Finis Idleman, Des Moines, Ia.

We raised our apportionment.—G. S. McGaughey, Robinson, Ill.

We will nearly double our apportionment.—E. H. Williamson, East Broadway Church, Sedalia, Mo.

The Grandview Church will treble its apportionment, and more.—A. Preston Gray, Portsmouth, O.

The First Church has already done more than 50% above its apportionment. I look for it to nearly double.—Chas. E. Taylor, Wadsworth, O.

Our apportionment was $50.00. $51.00 has been pledged. We feel pretty certain that the total amount of our offering will reach $60.00.—K. F. Nance, Halifax, Canada.

The little band of disciples meeting in a hall in Fargo contributed between $30 and $35 yesterday.—F. B. Sapp, Fargo, N. D.

Our apportionment was $15.00. We send gladly $60.00, regretting that we cannot send more.—Percy R. Atkins, Agra, Kansas.

We sent $20.00 from Cane Valley. This is the best offering this church has ever made for Foreign Missions.—Z. T. Williams, Columbia, Ky.

We will reach our apportionment.—R. W. Lily, Keokuk, Ia.

Our apportionment at Lsadora was $20.00. We raised $25.85.—Challie E. Graham, Sheridan, Mo.

Houstania Church raised $42.00 for Heathen Missions last Sunday. More than doubled usual offering.—J. W. Boulton, Holden, Mo.

We will go beyond our apportionment of $200.—B. H. Melton, Marshall Street Church, Richmond, Va.

Good news! Our official board yesterday, without a dissenting vote, decided to continue in both the Foreign and Home Living-link line. Now to make good! No snap, but it can be and will be done.—W. B. Clemmer, Rock Island, Ill.

Offering yesterday $36.49.—C. S. Weaver, Latham, Ill.

A great day yesterday. $60.00 raised. Our apportionment tripled. Those who gave are feeling fine.—Chas. N. Ross, Cookaville, Ill.

Offering last year $5.80. This year $32.50.—R. J. Bennett, Mitchell, Ind.

Living-link assured. Raised over $400.00 yesterday morning in individual pledges, the largest representation in the offering the congregation has ever had.—S. Boyd White, Moberly, Mo.

Offering at Beasley Creek, Ky., decided advance over last year.—Henry J. Lunger, Lexington, Ky.

Nearly $25.00 in cash and pledges.—W. H. Curtis, Asherville, Kans.

Apportionment $15.00. Our offering will be $50.00 or more.—W. A. Wherry, Norman, Okla.

Offering of the First Church, Emporia, Kansas, $500.00. Expect more.—W. A. Parker, minister.

We will not fall behind last year either in church or Sunday-school, and I hope before the close to see both greatly increased.—G. B. Townsend, Hagerstown, Md.

Our offering was $45.90. Hope to make it $50.00. Offering last year $12.65.—J. B. Brown, Mentor, Texas.

Had a great day here Sunday. Took pledges for $600.00 to be paid next Sunday, March 7, except about $125.00 pledged by the Sunday-school which will be made up and sent to you the first Sunday in June.—J. H. Booth, Centerville, Ia.

The Third Church took an offering yesterday about three times that of last year.—H. E. Stafford, Ft. Wayne, Ind.

We are all rejoicing this morning. Doubled our apportionment for Foreign Missions.—G. F. Cuthrell, Rome, Ga.

Our apportionment for Heathen Missions $100.00, offering $120.00. More to come.—A. E. Trout, Owen Sound, Ont.

Largest missionary offering ever made here. More than doubled that of last year.—Jas. A. Brown, Hartford, Mich.

Our offering for Foreign Missions amounted to $83.02 in cash. We expect to increase this within a week. Our apportionment was $75.00 and we are rejoicing that we were enabled to go above this amount.—E. W. McDiarmid, Beckley, W. Va.

Hustonville, Ky., will raise $50.00 for Foreign Missions.—W. S. Willis.

Splendid offering for this church. We are happy.—P. A. Cave, Charleston, W. Va.

Exceeded our apoprtionment by a good sum.—H. M. Johnson, Fredonia, Kansas.

Our apportionment $35.00. Offering $100.26, and more coming. Randall Ferris, Bristol, Tenn.

Who Comes To The Hospital?

By Elliott I. Osgood, M. D., Missionary of the Foreign Society.

All human life may have lights and shadows but to the sick Chinaman there is little but shadow. Miss Clark was out west of Chu Cheo the other day at the home of a Christian. She heard the women talking of a neighbor woman who for some years had suffered with a chronic ulcer on the leg. It aroused Miss Clark's interest and she went to the home and found the woman lying on a bundle of straw in one corner of the cheerless house. The ulcer has such a vile smell that even the Chinese, who are supposed to be proof against smells, had put her off by herself. Our hospital is only five miles away and the woman could ride a donkey, but they had just let her lie. So Miss Clark and her Bible woman persuaded them to bring in the woman.

Another woman was brought in one day by some of her relatives. She had done wrong in her younger days. Her husband was dead. She had semi-paralysis of the lower limbs and of the tongue. Her friends paid for her food for a short time and then abandoned her to us. They wanted nothing farther to do with her. If we compelled them to take her home they would throw her out to beg and probably die. She has improved while in the hospital but is a problem on our hands. We hope to find some decent home in which she can do enough to pay for her living. If we do not, shall we cast her out, compelling her to beg or live a bad life?

Still another woman has come to us for ministry. She is a good country woman with a bad son-in-law. She had a tumor of the breast and called in a Chinese doctor, who employed the usual method of thrusting in needles with the consequence of exciting into immediate activity a smouldering cancer. She came to us. We are not in a position to operate on such cases. Her son-in-law will give her no money to go to Dr. Macklin's hospital at Nanking and she fears the knife almost as much as she fears death. Poor old woman, she is living under the bondage of great fear. We are ministering to her and relieving some of the bodily pain and trying to lift the weight of mental pain and fear. Can we reveal to her the love of Christ?

A young man came limping into the hospital in great pain. He had stepped on a sharp stub which had broken off in his foot, leaving a piece over one inch long and a quarter of an inch in diameter. He and his neighbors had gained the idea that if they came to us for help they must become members of the church. His great pain had made him willing to even do that if we would help him. We told him that we forced no one to follow Christ. We pulled out the stub and dressed the wound. He has got a copy of one of the gospels and is spending his spare time studying it. Will he find the Christ?

A mere boy worked his way painfully and slowly into the hospital enclosure not long ago. He swung himself along by using his hands as feet while he held up out of harm's way a bad looking leg. One of the lower bones was necrosed and discharging by a number of openings. We took him in. He nows walks with a staff and can even bear his weight on the weak limb. He has had no money to pay for his board, but has willingly sat down by the wood pile and cut wood with a hatchet or dug the weeds out of the walk. He will do anything that his strength will allow. Shouldn't wonder if he became a Christian in time. We have several members of the church who have come up through such a line of treatment, and they are faithful members, too.

We usually put the test of work upon those who are wholly dependent upon our charity. They are not always willing to do the little things they might do, and experience has taught us that of such there is little hope. One such was brought in. He had lain around in the city's gates begging and one cold night had frozen his feet so badly that all the toes came off and great ulcers were formed on the soles of his feet. We kept him for awhile and cared for him and fed him. But when we suggested his doing some little things which he could easily perform with his hands, he objected. He was a beggar born and as a beggar he preferred to live.

A new center of Christian work has been opened as the direct result of the medical work. A man from a little village twenty miles south of here came into the hospital five years ago and broke opium. He began studying the Scriptures and became a Christian. He has now led four others to Christ and has another circle studying who will in the not distant future become followers of Christ.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

Unity and Catholicity

When Jesus prayed for the unity of his disciples, did he pray for the unity of some of them, or all of them?

"Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also that shall believe on me through their word; that they may all be one."

Jesus thought in universals. In this prayer is the thought of universal time—both present and future believers—"neither these only"; and universal number—"that they may all be one."

"And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and they shall become one flock, one shepherd."

Here is added the thought of universal place. Jesus' desire for unity was also a desire for catholicity.

Jesus dreamed of a universal brotherhood of the good—a holy, catholic church; a brotherhood universal in time, place, and number. That was a true insight of the early church into the mind of Jesus when she put in her first confession of faith this article: "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church." So also did Jesus.

Catholicism of Thomas Campbell.

Every dream of unity in the church by apostle or prophet since Jesus spake, has been a dream of catholicity. The first proposition of the Declaration and Address, penned by Thomas Campbell, was a statement of both the unity and catholicity of the church: "That the Church of Christ upon earth is essentially, intentionally, and constitutionally one: consisting of all those in every place that profess their faith in Christ and obedience to him in all things according to the scriptures, and that manifest the same by their tempers and conduct, and of none else; as none else can be truly and properly called Christians."

In that memorable document, the centennial of whose publication the Disciples of Christ are about to celebrate, the author further defines the universal scope of his appeal: "It is the cause of Christ, and of our brethren throughout all the churches, of catholic unity, peace, and purity." He is constantly appealing to "our brethren of all denominations"—"all the churches of Christ;" and just as constantly avowing his purpose to be to "restore unity, peace and purity to the whole church of God."

Unity Must be Inclusive Not Exclusive.

Any plan of union whose scope is narrower than "the whole church of God" is untrue to the purpose of Jesus. Any basis of Christian fellowship which excludes a single, true disciple of Jesus, is not Christian. Nothing will satisfy the love of Jesus for his church but a plan for its rebuilding that will present it to him at last a glorious church, not having spot or blemish or wrinkle or any such thing—a holy, catholic church. No other kind of church but a catholic church can be a glorious church, and none but a holy church can be a church without spot or wrinkle. How delicate and how responsible is the task! Who is sufficient for it but he who has the very mind of Christ? No one else could be faithful to him and just to his people. But this is the task of every man or company of men who propose to the world a basis of Christian union. It is difficult to say which is the more dangerous—to let into the church those who do not by nature belong to it, or to keep out those who by right belong in it. In the one case its purity and peace are endangered, and in the other its unity and catholicity. The danger, on the one hand, is that the church shall be too broad, and on the other hand, too narrow.

Breadth and Narrowness.

The mistake which the church has made in the past has not been on the side of breadth, but of narrowness. Her basis of union has not been broad enough to afford standing room for all who loved Jesus Christ in sincerity and in truth. There was no room in the ancient church for the Montanists and the Donatists; and none in the mediaeval church for the Waldenses and Tallards; while no denomination of the modern church has found room for other denominations. The Presbyterians had no room for the Baptists, and the Baptists no room for the Presbyterians. All denominational houses have been too small for the whole family of God. Hence the children have been compelled to separate into larger or smaller groups to secure the comfort and fellowship of others of like precious faith.

No denomination in modern times has been as broad as Jesus; and none as narrow as Jesus. It is not to be wondered at when we remember that every denomination was born and cradled in a corner, and was the creature of a single man. Luther made the Lutheran Church, and he made it after his own image and likeness; and so completely bound to him is that church that it dare not depart from him. The Lutheran Church is Luther grown big, and partakes of both the breadth and narrowness of Luther. The Methodist church is John Wesley grown big, with few changes. The Presbyterian church is John Calvin multiplied, but still John Calvin.

Who are Luther, Calvin, and Wesley? Their followers have seemed at time to treat them as if they were the Christ returned to earth to settle the faith and order of the church once for all. To propose to change an item of the faith or practice of any of these denominations seems to some of the leaders like proposing to change the will of Christ, with whose will their faith and practice are made identical. As a matter of fact these founders of denominations were men of like passions and minds as ourselves. They had the good fortune to utter a message which their time needed, and all to their own surprise they became the builders of new sects. What they believed their followers still believe; and where they stood, their followers still stand. The private opinions and interpretations of these good and great men have become the public and organic confessions of great churches. Is it any wonder that the denominational houses are not broad and catholic enough to hold all the children of God's household?

Whole Church Must Coöperate.

Who would be so venturesome as to risk the unity of the church upon one man's plan of union, whether Luther's, Calvin's, or Wesley's? Who would be so bold as to affirm that a committee of one could adopt the plan of the church of Christ for every race, age and place? The plan of union for the universal church can only be wrought out in committee of the whole—the whole church of God, past and present, Eastern and Western, Greek and Roman, Protestant and Catholic.

Every plan of union to the present time has been a failure because only a single man, or group of men, a single race or age has drafted it. Before a plan can be formulated which the whole church will accept, the whole church must be represented on the committee. If a committee of Protestants draws up a basis of union, will the Roman Catholics unanimously adopt it? If the Baptists draw up a basis, will the Pedo-baptists accept it without amendment?

In the preparation of that final basis of union for a united Christendom the whole church of God, both past and present, must have a part. The early church must be present and speak through her confessors and martyrs, her fathers and apologists; the mediaeval church must be present and speak through her missionaries and schoolmen, her crusaders and lawyers; the modern church must be present and speak through her reformers and theologians, her missionaries and scholars. None who have hazarded their lives for Christ can be denied a hearing. Each must tell us the secret of his love for Christ, and the ground of his hope in him. When all have finished speaking we shall be struck with two things: the things in which they agree and the things in which they differ. If we take the things in which they all agree we shall have the universals of Christianity—the things which have been and are believed everywhere, always, and by all Christians, to be essential elements of Christian faith and hope.

On no other basis than that of the universals of Christianity, is there any hope of a permanent or a catholic unity.

Notes from the Foreign Society

Last week the Foreign Society received an Annuity gift of $1,000 from a friend in Ohio. The society is receiving many such gifts this year, many more than in the past. The plan grows in favor as it becomes better known.

The Christmas number of the Congo Christian has been received. This is volume two, number two. It is published at Bolenge, Africa, and contains eight pages.

The missionaries at Bolenge, Africa, make a most urgent call for a medical man for the new station at Monieka.

The growth of the Bolenge Church is a marvel. There were fifty baptisms October 11 and fifty-two more January 3.

Thirteen new churches have become Livinglinks. A number more are expected soon.

A F. Hensey left Bolenge January 6 for his furlough. He is in great need of it. The last heard from him he was in Southern France. He will reach America some time in May.

A Belgian gentleman, who holds a high posion in one of the trading companies, after a recent visit to Bolenge, said: "When I first came in contact with your missionaries and evangelists about a year ago, I was opposed to your work; I thought that all missionaries did was to convince the people that they were ill treated by both State and companies, and to induce them not to work for either. Now I have seen what your work really is. I have seen the educational work, the industrial training, and the kind of people you turn out. You are doing more for civilization than any other agency in Congo Free State, and you may count me as a loyal sympathizer."

The Christian Tabernacle, Fort Worth, Texas, joined Living-Link Family February 27, offering $613.7. It was the last Sunday in the old building corner, Fifth and Throckmorton. The building was sold for $33,000 with reservation of all furniture and $2,000 worth of art and memorial windows. They will begin at once in the center of the South side in the midst of fine residence district of 25,000 population.

OUR CHURCH MEN

By John R. Ewers

"The Making of Men"

Decidedly clever, even if somewhat overdrawn, is a short article quoted in "Unity" from the "Universalist Leader." "Would Lincoln Have Been Lincoln?" is the title and it runs as follows: "What would modern educational experts have made of Lincoln, if, as a baby, he had been put in their care? They would probably have started him on sterilized milk, clothed him in disinfected garments, sent him to kindergarten where he would have learned to weave straw-mats and sing about the Blue-bird on the branch. Then the dentist would have straightened his teeth, the oculist would have fitted him with glasses, and in the primary grade he would have been taught by pictures and diagrams the difference between a cow and a pig, and through nature study he would have learned that the catbird did not lay kittens. By the time he was eight he would have become a "young gentleman," at ten he would have known more than the old folks at home, at twelve or fourteen he would have taken up manual training, and within two years made a rolling-pin and tied it with a blue ribbon. In the high-school at sixteen, in four years he would learn that Mars was the reputed son of Juno, and to recite a stanza from The Lady of the Lake. Then to college where he would have joined the Glee Club and a Greek Letter Fraternity, smoked cigarettes and graduated, and then become a clerk in a banker's office; and never, never, do any one harm. Well,—perhaps,—we don't know and can't tell what might have been, but we can't help feeling thankful that Lincoln's training and education were left to Nancy Hanks—and God."

Colleges Good if Used Correctly.

Now I call that rather good. Kindergartens of the right sort are right. Colleges are helpful, if the best they offer is taken and a lot of frills left out. Universities are of the greatest value to people who know how to think before they enter. Like other good things they are good if used correctly. Nevertheless we may well pause and ask whether modern educational methods produce men. Surely we cannot have men for our churches or anywhere else if they are ruined in the making.

Down in little old New York an Englishman named Gorst has been slinging it into our educational system. He says our children are ruined with books. Their heads are crammed with more facts than can be digested, while imagination and reflection are destroyed, or rather, never allowed to develop. He says books are dangerous things and that children should learn to do by doing, which, if I am not mistaken, was the famous dictum of that great German, Froebel.

Newell Dwight Hillis says that no one would try to develop colts by driving forty of them around a track at once. And yet that is precisely what we are doing in our education. There is no chance for individuality to develop. Absolutely none. A room full of all kinds of youngsters, with all kinds of antecedents and environments are rammed and crammed and damned together. How ludicrous to see a trainer driving forty colts of various conditions around a track—Clydesdales with heavy, hairy feet, trim Hamiltonians, stuffy Morgans, tiny Shetlands, roadsters, carriage, race and draft horses, thoroughbreds and plugs—all kinds and conditions—what charming results. The race horse should be fitted for the track, the heavy, ponderous, deliberate fellow for the wagon. In other words individuality must be recognized. A man without personality, the most delightful thing in the universe, is like a statue without life. Ram in the wire and get boxed pins—all alike.

Education on the Cistern Principle.

Dr. Frank Gunsaulus says some education is on the cistern order. When a man wants a cistern he selects the dryest place about, and creates a capacity. He walls up this capacity and makes it water tight. Then he puts a pipe ino it, and the filling process begins. The contents become stagnant and in time foul. Examinations pump out this water. The right method is to open up the vein of living water which flows always clear, fresh and life-giving from the depths. Right education is not to give Jim capacity, but to develop his natural resources and to teach him how to use them, finding supreme joy thereby.

Two things are radically wrong with education in our cities. First, this destruction of individual personality and, second, the removal of all opportunities for self-expression. A country boy can care for animals, have adventures in the meadows and woods, use every muscle, have every part of his mind stirred. Imagination can roam at ease. Reflection is possible. Thus responsibility, inventiveness, self-confidence, the power to think for himself is developed wonderfully. Body, mind and spirit are made strong and vigorous. Every faculty is given development. How pitifully limited is the city boy! Servants do all the work, while his muscles remain small and flabby. He has nothing for which to be responsible. No animal looks to him for food and care. His playground is the dusty street. For adventure he must smash a light or steal a pie.

Men and the Churches.

Rich and poor suffer alike. I recently heard Jacob Riis tell how the introduction of parks and playgrounds in the vicinity of the old Mullberry Bend reduced the gangs of criminals naturally.

Jesus is said to have wondered whether after a time faith would be found on the earth, and we may well wonder whether after awhile there will be any real men to belong to churches or anything else. The day of the Mollycoddle is at hand. And from the forty-year old Mollycoddle, the good Lord deliver us. Some books are good, but more will make fuel for the end of the world. There is some "knowledge never learned in schools." "I say again, God give us men." Let a premium be placed upon courage, self-reliance, initiative, honest responsibility, developed muscles, brains and souls. Well, God has placed the premiums there. The stars fight for us, even if boards of education do not. Fortunately "our little systems have their day and cease to be." Nancy Hanks and God still live.

Mr. Robert Stockton, of St. Louis, has just given $5,000 to the Christian Orphan's Home of that city. Eighteen months ago Mr. Stockton gave $50,000 for the erection of a new building for this home. He was anxious that this benevolence should be as completely equipped as possible. When he found, therefore that $5,000 more was needed he at once supplied it. This makes $55,000 Mr. Stockton has consecrated to this ministry of applied Christianity.

"Studies in the First Book of Samuel"

By Herbert L. Willett.

The appearance of this volume calls attention not only to the book itself, but to the series of which it is a part the Constructive Bible Studies, a series of textbooks for the graded Sunday School, published by the University of Chicago Press.

Other publishing houses have attempted to meet the demand for study material for Sunday Schools desiring to adopt a graded curriculum. The result is represented by series of quarterlies in some cases, and in others an occasional textbook, but no such dignified, complete, and attractive series as that of the Constructive Bible Studies has as yet made its appearance. This may be easily accounted for, when we consider that work upon the series has been continuous through the past nine years, the first volume appearing in 1900; that the volumes thus far published represent the work of fourten different authors, all of whom are specialists in the particular subjects upon which they write, and many of them doing practical service in religious education, both by voice and pen. The books which have already been published range in grade from the kindergarten to the theological seminary, and are represented by seventeen volumes. We are informed by the publishers that three more volumes will be added before the opening of the Sunday Schools in the autumn, and that still other volumes are in manuscript or contracted for. No doubt the series will reach at least thirty volumes within the next two years.

The volume just received is designed for the early years of the high school grades in the Sunday School, or the secular school where Bible Study is a part of the curriculum. The volume includes the full text of the First Book of Samuel as found in the English Revised Version, with occasional simplifications in the marginal readings. The text is divided into short sections for convenience in study, and each section is accompanied by supplementary notes. In these notes an attempt is made to vivify the story found in the text by descriptions of the life, customs, places, and ideas which belong to the history back of the story, and thereby to make the second reading of the text thoroughly intelligent on the part of the pupil. The questions which follow this explanatory material help to fix the story in the mind of the student, and also to lead him to think of the real meaning of the section which he has been studying—its meaning not only for the times out of which it arose, but the deeper meaning for all time. In his effort to make the story live in the minds of the pupils, the author has not neglected the important ethical and religious message. The book contains many illustrations of historic sites, customs, occupations, and types of oriental people. It is provided with a good map of Israel in its tribal stage, and a dozen pages of dictionary material, to which reference is made in the text. The frequent requests for written answers to the review questions constitute home work for the pupil. The mastery of a single book of the Bible which would be gained by the study of this volume is something which it is safe to say no pupils of the high-school age of the present day possess. It would give to them, if secured, a much greater respect for the biblical writers and the religious purpose of the writings.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

Another Letter from Z. T. Sweeney

Dear Brother Willett:—Now that you have published my entire letter, I will endeavor to reply.

1. You criticized my former letter for covering too much territory, but in your reply thereto you take exactly two inches of space to my one. I note also your new definition of supernatural, viz: Contra-natural, arbitrary and capricious, and you say that only in that sense is it objectionable in the Scriptures. This seems to me to shift the whole controversy. I have never believed nor taught that the supernatural is contra-natural, capricious or arbitrary, but merely above the natural. There are laws of nature that are above other laws of nature, but it by no means implies that they are contrary to each other.

Now, then, I am willing to take out of the word "supernatural" all that you say is objectionable and leave it in its pure etymological signification above or beyond the natural. Will you then admit, in the light of this definition, that a miracle is "the intervention of a supernatural being in the realm of natural law?" A plain yes in answer to this question will abridge our correspondence and save you a great deal of future space.

2. You think I did not use the words "account for" in a scientific sense when I said that "every hypothesis must account for the phenomena on which it is based." I used those words exactly in their dictionary sense, which, according to the Standard Dictionary, defines account, when followed by for, "to refer to some cause or natural law." I set forth five miracles of the New Testament and showed that they could be accounted for, by referring them to the intervention of a supernatural power in the realm of natural law. I asked you to account for them by showing that they were effected by the normal activity of a human life at its best.

We both agree upon the old axiom that "every effect must have an adequate cause." These miracles are effects, and I took the ground that the intervention of a supernatural being was an adequate cause for these effects. I called upon you to show that the normal activity of a human life was an adequate cause. I told you that you could not show that such activity was an adequate cause. I say so yet, and the fact that you never attempted to show it is conclusive proof that you know you can't. Your theory is "manifestly at variance with the observed data," and you well say that "it is a poor theory that is manifestly at variance with the observed data." Speaking of poor theories, brings me to the main theory of your entire correspondence, viz.: That Jesus Christ had power over the laws of nature, because of his intimate spiritual communion with God. You have rung the changes on this theory in all your editorials and in all your replies to my letters, as will be borne out by the following quotation from your last reply: "It will be borne in mind by readers of all my statements on this subject that my insistence has been on miracles as the manifestation of a being living in the fullness of communion with God and therefore competent to employ the forces of nature in ways impossible to our meagre and fragmentary lives." If I am a competent judge, that is the spinal chord of your argument against the old theory of miracles, and in favor of what you call a rational theory. The one that "bridges the chasm between miracles and the ordinary course of human events under the reign of law." Has it ever occurred to you, my dear brother, that your spinal chord is a mere supposition and a false supposition at that? There is not a scientist on earth that will support your theory. There is not a fact in all the analogy of nature, nor human nature, that will sustain your theory. There is no evidence on earth to prove that the man who lives in vital and spiritual communion with God will therefore be able to use the laws of nature. Nature yields up her secrets only to those who find the key and unlock the door to her great store house, and she does it regardless of the spiritual nature of such a finder. A Darwin, a Spencer, a Huxley can enter through the vestibule of science into the sacred penetralia of nature as easily as the most spiritual man on this earth. I have a neighbor who lives in as close spiritual communion with God as almost any person I ever saw. She walks and talks with him as an every-day companion, and yet she knows hardly anything about using the forces of nature. Her brother is the chief chemist of the United States and knows one hundred times as much about using the forces of nature as she does, and yet he has not five per cent of her spiritual communion with God. So then, all your talk about living in vital communion with God giving one the power to control the forces of nature, is mere fustian and cannot be supported by the facts of nature or human nature. Again, your theory is manifestly at variance with the observed data, and again you may say, "It is a poor theory, indeed, that is manifestly at variance with the observed data." If you still think your theory is a good one, you have another think coming, my dear brother, for it will be remembered that many miracles were performed by parties of whom it is not recorded, nor from whose lives it is to be inferred that they lived in close and vital communion with God.

3. I note that you still hold that Jesus was not a visitant to this world. I will ask you to reconcile your views with the following scriptures: "And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." John 17:5. Again: "For thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world." John 17:24. Again: "Ye are of this world; I am not of this world." John 8:23. Again: "Ye are from beneath; I am from above." John 8:23. Again: "I am the living bread which came down from Heaven." John 16:27. Again: "I came forth from the Father, and I am come into the world." John 16:27. Again: "What and if you shall see the son of man ascend up where he was before." John 6:62. If these passages do not prove that Jesus was a visitant to this world, I fail to see how it would be possible for anything to prove it. I sincerely hope you will give attention to these passages and show how they may be reconciled with the statement that Jesus was not a visitant to this world.

4. I now proceed to notice your seventh admission: "He wrought no miracles to convince men that he was the Christ." In another place you say: "Men did not believe in Jesus in the Apostolic age, because they believed in the miracles." Let us examine this in the light of the New Testament. In the first place, his disciples did, as we find by referring to John 2:11. "This beginning of his signs did Jesus in Cana of Galilee and manifested his glory and his disciples believed on him." Likewise the nobleman did. John 4:53. "So the Father knew that it was at that hour in which Jesus said unto him, thy son liveth; and himself believed and his whole house. This is the second sign that Jesus did." Again: "The people believed on him." John 6:14. "When, therefore, the people saw the sign which he did, they said, This is of a truth the prophet that cometh into the world." The blind man did. John 9:17. "They say, therefore, unto the blind man again, What sayest thou of him, in that he opened thine eyes? And he said, He is a prophet." Many others did. John 10:41-42. "And many come unto him; And they said, John indeed did no sign. But all things whatsoever John spake of this man were true and many believed on him." John 12:10-11. "But the chief priests took counsel that they might put Lazarus also to death; because that by reason of him many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus." John 20:30. "Many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of the disciples, which are not written in this book: But these are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God." And to close this list of quotations, I use Christ's own challenge, "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not."

When you have finished harmonizing these passages with your statements that "Jesus wrought no miracles to convince men that he was the Christ," and that "Men in the Apostolic days did not believe in him because of his miracles," we will proceed to some other matters which need consideration.

Let us be more prompt with this correspondence, as when delayed so long people lose the thread of the discussion.

Sincerely and fraternally,

Columbus, Ind. Z. T. SWEENEY.

For the purpose of clearness I have taken the liberty of numbering the items in Bro. Sweeney's letter.

1. I am glad to note his statement that he does not regard the supernatural as contra-natural, capricious or arbitrary. If by the "supernatural" here he means miracle, as I understand him to mean, we are quite agreed on that point. I prefer to use the biblical term "miracle" rather than the word supernatural, which is neither biblical nor clear. It is defined too variously to be useful in arriving at a biblical doctrine. It would simplify matters greatly in this correspondence if Bro. Sweeney would state clearly what he means by the word miracle. This I have asked him to do twice over. It is the first requisite of profitable exchange of views that the terms should be defined. My definition of miracle has been given repeatedly, nor does my statement in the article to which he refers differ in the slightest degree from my former descriptions of what I regard as an unsubstantial and untenable view of the miraculous. There has been no shifting whatever of the issue. The modern description of miracle, which I have set forth again and again, is that it is the activity of a perfect life in the domain of nature, the manifestation of power at a higher level than that possible to the incomplete lives men live; the natural employment of law by one able to reach beyond the common powers of men because of unique and full relations with God. Such a view rejects any definition of miracle which makes it a fracture of the laws by which God governs the world. That would be contra-natural, capricious and arbitrary. I am glad to have Bro. Sweeney say that he disavows such a view.

But I wish him to notice the implication of his words that miracle is above the natural. If he means by this that it is above the common, the usual, above the reach of our imperfect human life, no argument is needed. I should emphasize that fact as strongly as any one. But if by that expression he means that miracle is wrought either in disregard of law or in accordance with other laws than those by which God is ruling the universe, the opinion is without a shred of evidence either in Scripture or in science, and rests only on the necessities of a dualism which seeks to widen the supposed distance between God and the world.

His statement that there are laws of nature that are above other laws is interesting if there were any way of demonstrating it. Granting that there are different sets of laws, they are either in harmony or at variance with each other. But Bro. Sweeney insists that they are not contrary or out of harmony. This is precisely my contention. There can be no disharmony in the universe in which God rules. Miracle must be the result of the employment of law at the altitude of one in enjoyment of fuller and completer life than the fragmentary lives we live. In such a conception of the term there is no place for interruption, intervention or the violation of law.

2. Bro. Sweeney asserts that a definition of miracle should account for the facts included under the term. I entirely agree that if by "accounting for" a phenomenon one states a law within whose range the observed facts will fall, the assertion is quite proper. But if he means that a scientific law accounts for the facts included within it in the sense of explaining their nature and processes, he is refuted by every branch of scientific study. We do not know how to explain many of the simplest phenomena of nature. Yet we account for them upon the basis of well-known and accepted laws. Much more ought this to be true of miracle, whose facts lie out in the region to which our common experience does not take us. When he asserts that there is no scientist who supports the theory I have set forth he only misses the issue, for I know of no scientist who discusses the subject of miracle. Does he? The business of science is to deal with observed facts. But no scientist of our day has any miracle with which to deal. Certainly no theory of "intervention" could for a moment secure standing in a scientific inquiry.

But still less does the older view of miracle explain miracles. It only falls back upon the assertion that they were acts of divine power, leaving the problem not only unexplained but complicated by the assumption of something in which all our knowledge of God's work, both in nature and the Scripture, affords us no aid for interpretation.

The illustration of the pious lady and her learned but worldly-minded brother is singularly inept. Would Bro. Sweeney cite this excellent sister as an example of a life possessing the fulness of companionship with God? Would such a person be even a remote expression of life at its highest value of unity with God? Fulness of life is far too narrowly defined if by it one means only religious emotion. The life of Jesus, in whom dwelt the fulness of the divine, manifested in a perfect human experience, gives some measure of the definition. As I wrote in my first response to Bro. Sweeney's questions, the view of miracle which removes the difficulties which metaphysical theology has thrown in the way of Christian faith in our generation defines it as "the manifestation of power at a higher level, and by a being in whom dwelt a fuller life. Jesus was historically such a being, and the only one who ever possessed this power."

3. My objection to the word "visitant" as applied to Jesus is that it is unbiblical, that it assumes that he was but a messenger sent with a divine message, and that it robs him of that genuine humanity, which is as essential to all just comprehension of his nature as is his unique sonship to God. That relation of union with God was timeless, eternal. His human life was actual, normal, complete. An angel would be a "visitant." Jesus was a man, so truly that he spoke of himself as the "Son of Man," the one true and perfect man.

The Fourth Gospel, from which all of Bro. Sweeney's texts on this point are chosen, is everywhere concerned to throw into sharp contrast the divine order and the sinful world. Almost without exception, in this Gospel, "world" signifies not the earth nor the visible universe, but the depraved nature of man, and especially the Jewish people, who brought Jesus to his death. Jesus belongs to the higher world of spiritual forces. In that realm he abides. He even spoke of himself as being in heaven, while he was actually with them in Jerusalem (John 3:13). To the Jews he said, "Ye are from beneath I am from above." But of the disciples he said, "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world" (John 17:14, 16). Would Bro. Sweeney call the disciples "visitants" to the world on the basis of these words? Koheleth declares that the spirit of man is to "return to God who gave it." Is man then a "visitant" to the world? These texts are not obscure. They require only a moment's reflection to reveal their insistence upon the higher life as the normal estate of the children of God. Neither Christ nor his people belong to the world-order. "Our citizenship is in heaven," declares Paul.

4. The final item helps still further to clear up the obscurities which an untenable theory of miracle has created, in its claim that Jesus wrought these miracles for the purpose of arousing faith. The facts are exactly the reverse of this. He knew from the first that these works of power would inevitably produce a certain type of belief in the minds of those who saw them. That this proved to be the case is shown by the passages Bro. Sweeney has cited and by others that might be added to the list. The difficulty with this faith was that it was too partial and superficial to be permanent and trustworthy. The disciples believed, in a way, after the first sign, but that faith needed the deepening and enrichment which could never rest on mere miracle in order to be enduring. Multitudes believed on Jesus beholding the signs which he performed; but they left him at the moment his teachings crossed the current of their lives. Even in Jerusalem, the city where he most wished for genuine faith in himself, he turned away from the kind of faith which depended upon miracle, knowing that it could not be trusted (John 2:23-25). Had he desired that order of belief he might have secured it on most easy terms, for the people were clamorous for such displays of power and eager to follow him as long as he gratified them with miracle. But he had no purpose so to do. It was one of the temptations which he put away from himself in the wilderness, and which he steadily resisted throughout his ministry. He would not astonish the multitude by casting himself from the temple turrets, because the faith thus produced would have been but little worth. He constantly bade those he healed keep silence, when he should have bidden them speak had he wished to secure faith by miracle.

In fact, nowhere is it asserted or even hinted that the purpose of the miracles was to produce faith. They were at first the means of gaining attention to his teachings; they were a part of the revelation of his life and character as loving and beneficent; they were evidences of his divine authority and mission to those who saw them, though far less important and convincing than his teachings and his redemptive purpose; they were illustrations of spiritual truth, and instantaneous pictures of the regular and continuous process of redemption. Jesus' wonderful deeds were an aid to his disciples in the creation and nourishment of their faith in him and in their immediate work of evangelization. But men did not become trusted followers of his because of the miracles he wrought. To use such wonders to convince men of his Messiahship was one of the subtle temptations which he resisted to the end.

I have but to add that which Bro. Sweeney knows full well, that the word "signs" in John 20:30 does not refer to miracles alone nor chiefly, but to all the manifestations of Jesus' life. Otherwise the writer would be limiting the evidences of the Master's Messiahship to this one least important phase of his work. Rather is the word used in its general sense of token, manifestation, declaration, as in Matt. 24:3, 30; 26:48; Luke 2:34; Rom. 4:11.

And now I wish to invite Bro. Sweeney's attention once more to the questions which I have asked him twice before to answer. They are fundamental to the entire matter under consideration. I hope he will not evade them longer, for the answers to them ought to go far to clear up the obscure places in the subject of miracle. The questions are as follows:

1. What is your definition of miracle?
2. What do you consider to be the value of Jesus' miracles today as evidences of his divine nature and purpose, in comparison with his character, his teachings and his program for men?
3. What do you consider to be the present value of the miracles of Jesus as aids to Christian living?

The Crucial Contest

By J. F. Williams.

A battle now is being fought
By masters in the realm of thought,
Upon a hill before our eyes,
On whose results hang destinies—
Soul-destinies—whose drift depends
On how the crucial contest ends.

The turning points of history,
That bind men's souls or set them free,
Are, as a rule, achieved with swords
Whose point is truth, whose thrusts are words,
Whose strokes, though bloodless, hateless, too,
Outrank the swords of Waterloo.

While in the forum of debate,
Period of bitterness and hate,
The contest shall intensify,
Thousands shall watch with anxious eye,
With eye and trembling heart, to see
If truth shall win the victory.

We pray, but not for either side,
Believing we are justified
Only as we but choose the right,
The stainless good, the clearer light,
Interpreting the Master's mind
And the true Father of mankind.

Let all, who would the Cause befriend,
In fervent prayer await the end;
Let faith and hope and love abide,
And perish all sectarian pride.
The Truth shall stand, though systems fall;
He still, who wills, shall hear her call.

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER VII

Winston's Decision.

Farmer Winston crossed the frontier without molestation and spent one night in a little wooden town, where several people recognized him. Then he pushed on southwards, and passed a week in the especially desolated settlement he had been directed to. A few dilapidated frame houses rose out of the white wilderness beside the broad beaten trail, and, for here the prairie rolled south in long rises like the waves of a frozen sea, a long low wooden building on the crest of one cut the skyline a league away. It served as an outpost for a squadron of United States cavalry and the troopers daily maligned the Government which had sent them in that desolation on police duty.

There was nothing else visible but a few dusky groves of willows and the dazzling snow. The ramshackle wooden hotel was rather more than usually badly kept and comfortless, and Winston, who had managed to conciliate his host, felt relieved one afternoon when the latter flung down the cards disgustedly.

"I guess I've had enough," he said. "Playing for stakes of this kind isn't good enough for you!"

Winston laughed a little to hide his resentment, as he said, "I don't quite understand."

"Pshaw!" said the American, with a contemptuous gesture. "Three times out of four I've spoiled your hand, and if I didn't know that black horse I'd take you for some blamed Canadian rancher. You didn't handle the pictures that way when you stripped the boys to the hide at Regent, Mr. Courthorne."

"Regent?" said Winston.

The hotel-keeper laughed. "Oh, yes," he said. "I wouldn't go back there too soon, any way. The boys don't seem quite contented, and I don't figure they would be very nice to you. Well, now, I've no use for fooling with a man who's too proud to take my money, and I've a pair of horses just stuffed with wickedness in the stable. There's not much you don't know about a beast, any way, and you can take them out a league or two if you feel like it."

Winston, who had grown very tired of his host, was glad of any distraction, especially as he surmised that while the man had never seen Courthorne, he knew rather more than he did himself about his doings. Accordingly, he got into the sleigh that was brought out by and by, and enjoyed the struggle with the half-tamed team, which stood with ears laid back, prepared for conflict. Oats had been very plentiful, and prices low that season. Winston, who knew at least as much about a horse as Lance Courthorne, however, bent faint clip-clop coming down the trail behind them to his will, and the team were trotting quietly through the shadow of a big birch bluff a league from town, when he heard a him. It led straight beneath the leafless branches, and was beaten smooth and firm, while Winston, who had noticed already that whenever he strayed any distance from the hotel there was a mounted cavalryman somewhere in the vicinity, shook the reins.

The team swung into faster stride, the cold wind whistled past him, and the snow whirled up from beneath the runners, but while he listened, the rhythmic drumming behind him also quickened a little. Then a faintly musical jingle of steel accompanied the beat of hoofs, and Winston glanced about him with a little laugh of annoyance. The dusk was creeping across the prairie, and a pale star or two growing into brilliancy in the cloudless sweep of indigo.

"It's getting a trifle tiresome. I'll find out what the fellow wants," he said.

Wheeling the team he drove back the way he came, and when a dusky object materialized out of the shadows beneath the birches, swung the horses right across the trail. The snow lay deep on either side of it just there, with a sharp crust upon its surface, which rendered it inadvisable to take a horse round the sleigh. The mounted man accordingly drew bridle, and the jingle and rattle betokened his profession, though it was already too dark to see him clearly.

"Hello!" he said. "Been buying this trail up, stranger?"

"No," said Winston quietly, though he still held his team across the way. "Still, I've got the same right as any other citizen to walk or drive along it without anybody prowling after me, and just now I want to know if there is any reason why I should be favored with your company."

The trooper laughed a little. "I guess there is. It's down in the orders that whoever's on patrol near the settlement should keep his eye on you. You see, if you lit out of here we would want to know just where you were going to."

"I am," said Winston, "a Canadian citizen, and I came out here for quietness."

"Well," said the other, "you're an American, too. Any way, when you were in a tight place down in Regent there, you told the boys so. Now, no sensible man would boast of being a Britisher unless it was helping him to play out his hand."

Winston kept his temper. "I want a straight answer. Can you tell me what you and the boys are trailing me for?"

"No," said the trooper. "Still, I guess our commander could. If you don't know of any reason, you might ask him."

Winston tightened his grip on the reins. "I'll ride back with you to the outpost now."

The trooper shook his bridle, and trotted behind the sleigh, while, as it swung up and down over the prairie, Winston became sensible of a curious expectancy. The bare, hopeless life he had led seemed to have slipped behind him, and though he suspected there was no great difference between his escort and a prisoner's guard, the old love of excitement he once fancied he had outgrown forever, awoke again within him. Anything that was different from the past would be a relief, and the man who had for eight long years of strenuous toil practiced the grimmest self-denial wondered with a quickening of all his faculties what the future, that could not be more colorless, might have in store for him.

It was dark, and very cold, when they reached the wooden building, but Winston's step was lighter, and his spirits more buoyant than they had been for some months, when, handing the sleigh over to an orderly, he walked into the guard-room, where bronzed men in uniform glanced at him curiously. Then he was shown into a bare log-walled hall, where a young man in blue uniform with a weather-darkened face was writing at a table.

"I've been partly expecting a visit," he said. "I'm glad to see you, Mr. Courthorne."

Winston laughed with a very good intimation of the outlaw's recklessness, and wondered the while because it cost him no effort. He, who had, throughout the last two adverse seasons, seldom smiled at all, and then but grimly, experienced the same delight in an adventure that he had done when he came out to Canada.

"I don't know that I can return the compliment just yet," he said. "I have one or two things to ask you."

The young soldier smiled good-humoredly. "Oh, sit down and shake those furs off," he said. "I'm not a worrying policeman, and we're white men, any way. If you'd been twelve months in this forsaken place, you'd know what I'm feeling."

Winston flung himself down in a hide chair, and stretched out his feet towards the stove. "In the first place, I want to know why your boys are shadowing me. You see, you couldn't arrest me unless our folks in the Dominion had got their papers through."

The officer nodded. "No. We couldn't lay hands on you, and we only had orders to see where you went to when you left this place, so the folks there could corral you if they got the papers. That's about the size of it at present, but, as I've sent a trooper over to Regent, I'll know tomorrow."

Winston laughed. "It may appear a little astonishing, but I haven't the faintest notion why the police in Canada should worry about me. Is there any reason why you shouldn't tell me?"

The officer looked at him thoughtfully. "Bluff? I'm quite smart at it myself," he said.

"No," and Winston shook his head. "It's a straight question. I want to know."

"Well," said the other, "it couldn't do much harm if I told you. You were running whisky a little while ago, and, though the folks didn't seem to suspect, you had a farmer or a rancher for a partner—it appears he has mixed up things for you."

"Winston?" asked the farmer.

"That's the man," said his companion. "Well, though I guess it's no news to you, the police come down upon your friends at a river-crossing, and Farmer Winston put a bullet into a young trooper, Shannon, I fancy."

Winston sat upright, and the blood that surged to his forehead sank from it suddenly, and left his face gray with anger.

"He killed him?" he asked.

"Yes, sir," said the officer. "Killing's not quite the word, because one shot would have been enough to free him of the lad, and the rancher fired twice into him. They figured, from the way the trooper was lying and the footprints, that he meant to finish him."

The farmer's face was very grim as he said, "They were sure it was Winston?"

"Yes," and the soldier watched him curiously. "Any way, they were sure of his horse, and it was Winston's rifle. Another trooper nearly got him, and he left it behind him. It wasn't killing, for the trooper don't seem to have had a show at all, and I'm glad to see it makes you kind of sick. Only that one of the troopers allows he was trailing you at a time which shows you had no hand in the thing, you wouldn't be sitting there."

It was almost a minute before Winston could trust his voice. Then he said slowly. "And what do they want me for?"

"I guess they don't quite know whether they do or not," said the officer. "They crawl slow in Canada. In the meanwhile they wanted to know where you were, so they could take out papers if anything turned up against you."

"And Winston?" said the farmer.

"Got away with a trooper close behind him. The rest of them had headed him off from the prairie, and he took to the river. Went through the ice and drowned himself, though as there was a blizzard nobody quite saw the end of him, and in case there was any doubt they've got a warrant out. Farmer Winston's dead, and if he isn't he soon will be, for the troopers have got their net right across the prairie, and the Canadians don't fool time away as we do when it comes to hanging anybody. The tale seems to have worried you."

Winston sat rigidly still and silent for almost a minute. Then he rose up with a curious little shake of his shoulders.

"And Farmer Winston's dead. Well, he had a hard life. I knew him rather well," he said. "Thank you for the story. On my word, this is the first time I've heard it, and now it's time I was going."

The officer laughed a little. "Sit right down again. Now, there's something about you that makes me like you, and as I can't talk to the boys, I'll give you the best supper we can raise in the whole forsaken country, and you can camp here until tomorrow. It's an arrangement that will meet the views of everybody, because I'll know whether the Canadians want you or not, in the morning."

Winston did not know what prompted him to agree, but it all seemed part of a purpose that impelled him against his reasoning will, and he sat still beside the stove, while his host went out to give orders respecting supper and the return of the sleigh. He was also glad to be alone for a while, for now and then a fit of anger shook him as he saw how he had been duped by Courthorne. He had heard Shannon's story, and, remembering it, could fancy that Courthorne had planned the trooper's destruction with a cunning that recognized by what means the blame could be laid upon a guiltless man. Winston's face became mottled with gray again as he realized that if he revealed his identity he had nothing to offer but his word in proof of his innocence.

Still, it was anger and not fear that stirred him, for nobody could arrest a man who was dead, and there was no reason that would render it undesirable for him to remain so. His farm would when sold realize the money borrowed upon it, and the holder of the mortgage had received a profitable interest already. Had the unforseen not happened, Winston would have held to the end of the struggle, but now he had no regret that this was out of the question. Fate had been too strong for him as Farmer Winston, but it might deal more kindly with him as Courthorne. He could also make a quick decision, and when the officer returned to say that supper was ready, he rose with a smile.

They sat down to a meal that was barbaric in its simplicity and abundance, for men live and eat in Homeric fashion in the Northwest.

"Here's better fortune to Farmer Winston!" he said.

The officer stared at him. "No, sir," he said. "If the old folks taught me right, Winston's———"

A curious smile flickered in the farmer's eyes. "No," he said slowly. "He was tolerably near it once or twice when he was alive, and, because of something he went through then, there may have been something better in store for him."

They talked until nearly midnight, sitting clase to the stove, while a doleful wind that moaned without drove the dust of snow pattering against the windows, and the shadows grew darker in the corners of the great log-walled room each time the icy draughts set the lamp flickering. Then the officer, rising, expressed the feelings of his guest as he said, "It's a forsaken country, and I'm thankful one can sleep and forget it."

He had, however, an honorable calling, and a welcome from friend and kinsman awaiting him when he went East again, to revel in the life of the cities, but the man who followed him silently to the sleeping-room had nothing but a half-instinctive assurance that the future could not well be harder or more lonely than the past had been. Still, Farmer Winston was a man of courage with a quiet belief in himself, and in ten minutes he was fast asleep.

When he came down to breakfast his host was already seated with a bundle of letters before him, and one addressed to Courthorne lay unopened by Winston's plate. The officer nodded when he saw him.

"The trooper has come in with the mail, and your friends in Canada are not worrying over you," he said. "Now, if you feel like staying a few days, it would be a favor to me."

Winston had in the meanwhile opened the envelope. He knew that when once the decision was made, there could only be peril in half-measures, and his eyes grew thoughtful as he read. The letter had been written by a Winnipeg lawyer from a little town not far away, and requested Courthorne to meet and confer with him respecting certain suggestions made by a Colonel Barrington. Winston decided to take the risk.

"I'm sorry, but I have got to go into Annerly at once," he said."

"Then," said the officer, "I'll drive you. I've some stores to get down there."

They started after breakfast, but it was dusk next day when they reached the little town, and Winston walked quietly into a private room of the wooden hotel, where a middle-aged man with a shrewd face sat waiting him. The big nickeled lamp flickered in the draughts that found their way in, and Winston was glad of it, though he was outwardly very collected. The stubborn patience and self-control with which he had faced the loss of his wheat crops and frozen stock stood him in good stead now. He fancied the lawyer seemed a trifle astonished at his appearance, and sat down wondering whether he had previously spoken to Courthorne, until the question was answered for him.

"Although I have never had the pleasure of meeting you before, I have acted as Colonel Barrington's legal adviser ever since he settled at Silverdale, and am, therefore, well posted as to his affairs, which are, of course, connected with those of your own family," said the lawyer. "We can accordingly talk with greater freedom, and I hope without the acerbity which in your recent communications somewhat annoyed the Colonel."

"Well," said Winston, who had never heard of Colonel Barrington, "I am ready to listen."

The lawyer drummed on the table. "It might be best to come to the point at once," he said. "Colonel Barrington does not deem it convenient that you should settle at Silverdale, and would be prepared to offer you a reasonable sum to relinquish your claim."

"My claim?" said Winston, who remembered having heard of the Silverdale Colony which lay several hundred miles away.

"Of course," said the lawyer. "The legacy lately left you by Roger Courthorne. I have brought you a schedule of the wheat in store, and amounts due to you on various sales made. You will also find the acreage, stock, and implements detailed at a well-known appraiser's valuation, which you could of course confirm, and Colonel Barrington would hand you a check for half the total now. He, however, asks four years to pay the balance in, which would carry bank interest in the meanwhile."

Winston, who was glad of the excuse, spent at least ten minutes studying the paper, and realized that it referred to a large and well-appointed farm, though it occurred to him that the crop was a good deal smaller than it should have been. He noticed this as it were instinctively, for his brain was otherwise very busy.

"Colonel Barrington seems somewhat anxious to get rid of me," he said. "You see, this land is mine by right."

"Yes," said the lawyer. "Colonel Barrington does not dispute it, though I am of the opinion that he might have done so under one clause of the will. I do not think we need discuss his motives."

Winston moistened his lips with his tongue, and his lips quivered a little. He had hitherto been an honest man, and now it was impossible for him to take the money. It, however, appeared equally impossible to reveal his identity and escape the halter, and he felt the dead man had wronged him horribly. He was entitled at least to safety by way of compensation, for by passing as Courthorne he would avoid recognition as Winston.

"Still I do not know how I have offended Colonel Barrington," he said.

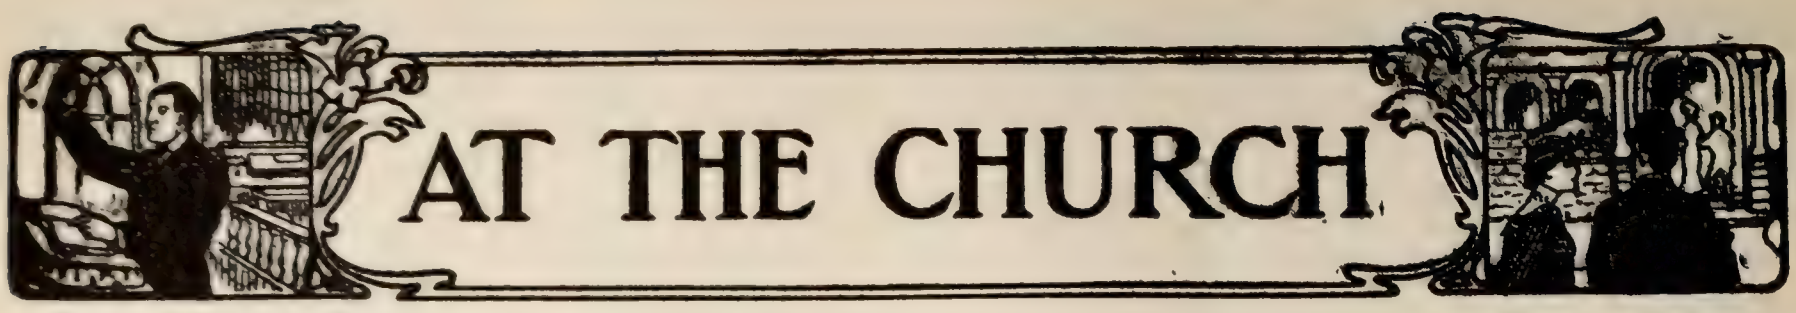
"I would sooner," said the lawyer, "not go into that. It is, I fancy, fifteen years since Colonel Barrington saw you, but he desired me to find means of tracing your Canadian record, and did not seem pleased with it. Nor, at the risk of offending you, could I deem him unduly prejudiced."

"In fact," said Winston dryly, "this man who has not seen me for fifteen years is desirous of withholding what is mine from me at almost any cost."

The lawyer nodded. "There is nothing to be gained by endeavoring to controvert it. Colonel Barrington is also, as you know, a somewhat determined gentleman."

Winston laughed, for he was essentially a stubborn man, and felt little kindliness towards any one connected with Courthorne, as the Colonel evidently was.

"I fancy I am not entirely unlike him in that respect," he said. "What you have told me makes me the more determined to follow my own inclination. Is there any one else at Silverdale prejudiced against me?"



The lawyer fell into the trap. "Miss Barrington, of course, takes her brother's view, and her niece would scarcely go counter to them. She must have been a very young girl when she last saw you, but from what I know of her character I should expect her to support the Colonel."

"Well," said Winston, "I want to think over the thing. We will talk again tomorrow. You would require me to establish my identity, any way?"

"The fact that a famous inquiry agent has traced your movements down to a week or two ago, and told me where to find you, will render that simple," said the lawyer dryly.

Winston sat up late that night turning over the papers the lawyer left him and thinking hard. It was evident that in the meanwhile he must pass as Courthorne, but as the thought of taking the money revolted him, the next step led to the occupation of the dead man's property. The assumption of it would apparently do nobody a wrong, while he felt that Courthorne had taken so much from him that the farm at Silverdale would be a very small reparation. It was not, he saw, a great inheritance, but one

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

The Cause of Sorrows*

There are three temperance lessons in the current year, closing respectively the first, second, and third quarters of the International Sunday-school lessons. One is sometimes tempted to think that these temperance lessons come rather too frequently. But this can never be a mature or permanent impression, for there is no question of the present time which deserves greater attention at the hands of Sunday-school teachers than this same question of temperance. It has come to be a national issue in a very important sense. Far beyond all matters of mere political policy, beyond all trade and industrial considerations, it takes its place as the compelling issue of our day. As slavery occupied the field of moral interest and national concern during all the middle period of the last century, so is temperance becoming the theme of national consideration in the days in which we live.

Use of Wine.

It need not be denied that the Bible material on temperance is very largely restricted to the individual side of the question. The men of Bible times knew nothing of such a traffic in intoxicants as has grown up in modern days. Then wine was commonly used by all classes. Its ordinary use was in an unfermented state like cider, but it was also used after fermentation since there were no very adequate means of preserving it from contact with the air. The usual method of storing wine was in sacks (called "bottles" in the Bible) made from the skins of animals, usually goats. While these retained the wine, they did not wholly exclude the air and fermentation naturally caused the swelling of the bags so that, after being two or three times used, they were worthless because liable to burst with the fermenting wine. Such beverages were of ordinary use in the domestic economy of the people of Bible Lands; and there were, of course, men who sold wine as they would sell other products intended for domestic use.

The Traffic in Liquor.

But there was no traffic organized to create an appetite for strong drink and to fatten upon the vices and wretchedness of those who became its victims. In this regard the problem of temperance has absolutely changed since biblical days, for today we are not contending merely against the individual use of wine nor against such a sale of liquor as would compare with that of biblical times. We are rather contending against the business, intrenched, formidable, conscienceless, and exercising every ingenious device for the prostitution of youth by the solicitation and allurement of liquor. In such a situation of human nature. The drunkard is a pitiable and despicable object, whether he be clothed in rags or in evening dress. The woman who indulges in wine is the source of evil example and contamination, whether she belongs to the aristocracy of the boulevards or is the most wretched denizen of the slums. Indeed too frequently the one passes rapidly into the other upon the downward slopes of this inferno.

The Temperance Awakening.

It is a consolation to know that the country is rousing itself with a sense of alarm, and that the temperance sentiment is rapidly voicing itself in prohibitory laws throughout the union. The vast sweep of prohibition conviction registered during the past year in the extension of local option and the wiping out of the drink traffic from many cities is one of the most encouraging signs of the times. It is also apparent that the churches must take up the matter with renewed interest. The Disciples of Christ, alert to such a movement as this, have put themselves into line with the progress of events by the organization of a national Board of Temperance, whose task it will be to keep the brotherhood reminded of its duty to this great cause.

The Board of Temperance.

The Board of Temperance of the Disciples of Christ is located at Indianapolis and is prepared to assist all our churches and Sunday-schools in the temperance and prohibition campaign. It is not too much to hope that through its aid and that of the hundred other instruments whose edges are being sharpened for the conflict, we may hope within this generation to see the extirpation of this traffic. Small towns and country districts are rapidly becoming prohibition territory. Larger cities are struggling with the problem. State prohibition will vanquish the traffic in even the greatest cities, and then a national prohibition law will give permanence and sanction to our new Emancipation Proclamation, which will herald the day of deliverance from a greater woe than slavery. Lincoln used to say "A nation cannot exist half slave and half free." It is ours to insist that a nation cannot exist half drunk and half sober. Total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the community are the only pathways to liberty and righteousness.

Drinking in Hotels and Restaurants.

The saloon has come to be the greatest menace of our life; and by the saloon is not meant merely the low dive, which would probably repel any sensitive and well trained young man. Far more dangerous is the elaborate and handsome hotel bar where boys may gain their first knowledge of intoxicants under conditions which mislead them into the thought that such an experience is an essential part of a young man's life. Even more dangerous still is the wide-spread and apparently growing use of liquors, such as beer, wine, and champagne, in restaurants and at hotel tables. In the cities it is not uncommon to see dining rooms thronged with beautifully dressed women who represent the elite of fashionable life, and yet are freely indulging their taste for wines quite unconscious of the effect of this practice either upon themselves or those who follow their example.

Proverbs and Modern Life.

The Bible is a very old book, and the Proverbs belong to the common life of Israel all the way from the days of Solomon to the latest pre-Christian period. And yet no truer sayings have ever been penned than those found in our lesson in reference to the woes wrought by strong drink. The misery, the crime, the heart break, the disruption of family life, the wrecking of hopes, and the national disgrace due to intemperance are simply incalculable. No pictures of the drunkard's debasement and infamy painted by a Gough or a Beecher have ever been made obsolete by the growth of civilization or the penalties put upon the traffic in strong drink.

The Horror of Strong Drink.

No matter how fashionable the indulgence in such evils may be, they can never cease to be revolting and hideous in their common expression. The wise man understood this and knew that beneath the fascination of social revelry or private drinking, there lay the secret of debasement and the profanation nothing remains to the self-respecting lover of his country but a firm and uncompromising stand against all use of this dangerous instrument of public destruction.

PRAYER MEETING

Silas Jones

Expediency and Love.

Topic, March 24. I Cor. 8:1-13; 10:23, 24.

Love is passionate devotion to the highest good. It expresses itself in deeds that have a definite aim. It involves intelligence and faith. It is never divorced from reason and knowledge. Love therefore never wastes itself on abstractions. It searches out persons and bestows benefits upon them. Cold-hearted intellectualism may scoff at the sacrifices of love but experience will put this sort of intellectualism to confusion. Love inflicts pain and it soothes. Ignorance and foolishness withhold needed correction. Love chastises us for our good.

Expediency is holding to the main issue and leaving purely private opinions to individuals. The main issue is determined by the nature of the organization with which we are connected. Is it the state? Then I may coöperate with men whose religious convictions are at variance with mine. Lowell said that some people thought Lincoln had been elected president of an anti-slavery society and they demanded that he act as such. Lincoln knew that he had been elected president of the United States and he saw clearly the task in which he and the people could unite. He steadfastly declined to take up side issues. He asked men to support him in his efforts to preserve the union. The emancipation proclamation was issued with that end in view. Is the church the organization in which we seek to coöperate with others? Expediency requires that the largest possible liberty be allowed to the individual. The church is lacking in wisdom when it rejects the assistance of any man who stands for the fundamental principles of the gospel.

Expediency has acquired a bad name because unprincipled men have used the term to cover up downright deception. The trader who is more than willing to drive a sharp bargain believes that lying is expedient. The politician is against the saloon when he goes to church and for it when he is with a saloon crowd. An editor may advocate the cause of the popular party for the sake of increasing his circulation. Preachers have been known to speak the sentiments of the pew rather than their own. A vast amount of harm is done by calling practices like these expedient. The word "business" is frequently employed in the same sense. Much confusion will be avoided if we use plain words to designate immoral actions. Lying and stealing may have a harsh sound but if men will lie and steal they are entitled to enjoy a reputation that accords with their conduct.

"All things are lawful; but not all things build up." The church is trying to grow men and women. It is therefore highly inexpedient for it to emphasize theories that have nothing to do with building Christian character. The church whose teachers treat the great themes of the gospel will draw into its membership people of intellectual and moral capacity. The most expedient preaching is that which gives expression to the truth. The truth, however, must be brought to the understanding of the hearer. It is one thing to preach to the illiterate and another to preach to the cultured. Both must be taught to love God and man but the same manner of speaking is not adapted to both. Furthermore, the liberty which we have in Christ is qualified by the obligation to serve. The Christian man is not one who goes about avowing that he does not care what people think of him. The Christian man does care what results flow from his conduct. He will not do wrong to please men, neither will he be indifferent to the effect of his conduct on the less instructed.

It is inexpedient to withhold the gospel from the world because some in the church are opposed to world-wide evangelization. What would be the influence of the church today if Carey and Judson had listened to the protests against their mission to the non-Christian world? And what will be the place of the church fifty years hence if it does not raise up men who will dare to proclaim the gospel of social redemption? When the church addresses itself to the task before it and asks how the Master would have it meet its obligations, it will forget its divisions and reach the only kind of unity that the Lord demands of it, that of service. Whatever may be the prejudices that separate us, it is expedient to state plainly the duty of the church and insist that the church shall live up to her opportunity.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY

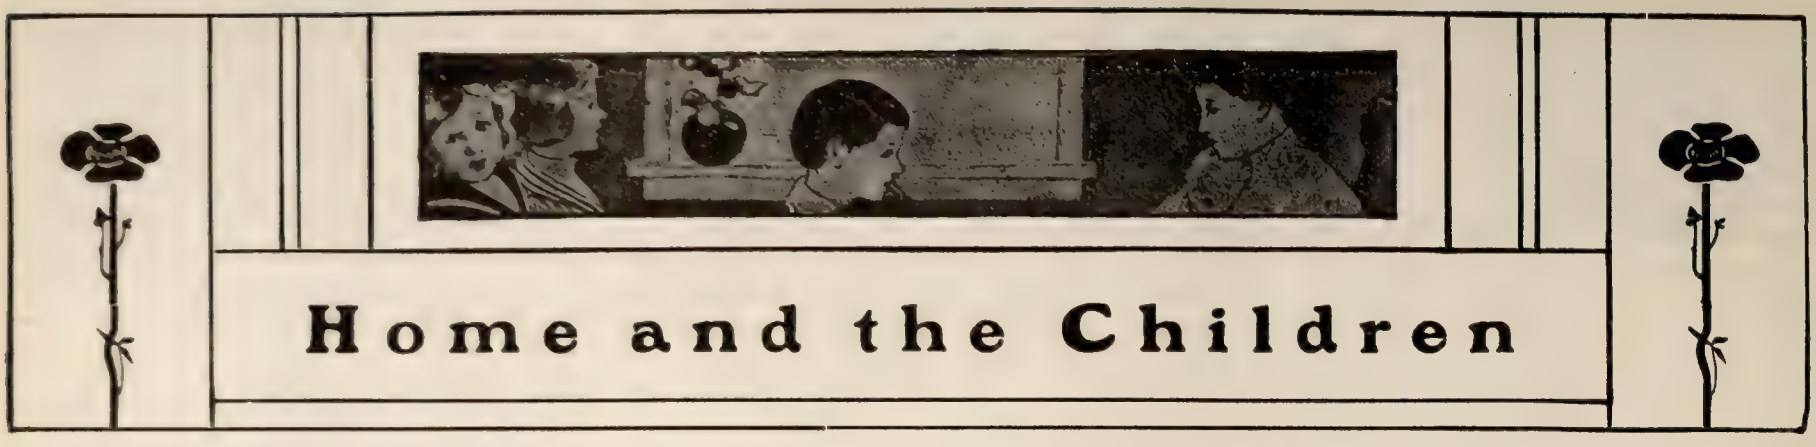
LESSON XIV. PSYCHOLOGICAL FOUNDATIONS.

I. THE MIND AND THE SOUL. Psychology is the science of the human mind, and a sound psychological theory is the necessary basis for a sound educational practice. Psychology knows no distinction between the MIND, SOUL and SPIRIT. These are just different names for the same thing, namely, the self or personality of the individual, considered as performing different acts. The mind may be defined as the self engaged in thinking, the soul as the self engaged in feeling, and the spirit as the self engaged in communion with God. The mind is the intellectual I, the soul the emotional I, the spirit the religious I. But these distinctions belong rather to rhetoric than to science. For psychology and education there is but on thing, called mind, soul, spirit, ego, psyche or self. The first of these, "mind," is the term with the broadest reference and in most familiar use.

II. PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGION. This explains why there can be a PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGION. (1) Psychology comes from two Greek words, "psyche," meaning mind or soul, and "logos," meaning reason. It is the reason or science of the soul. Thus there is a psychology or science of the soul in all its relationships—a psychology of knowing, of æsthetics, of ethics, etc. But religion is also an act of the soul. It is the soul exercising its highest functions of worship. Hence there must be psychology of religion, i. e., A REASON OR SCIENCE OF THE SOUL IN ITS RELATION TO GOD. (2) In religion the soul can EXERCISE NO OTHER THAN ITS NATIVE POWERS. It can do neither more nor less than think, feel and will. That the object of these powers happen to be God does not change their nature or the science that deals with them. That nature is still mental, that science is still psychology. You can "save a soul" only through its thoughts, emotions and volitions.

III. RELIGIOUS PEDAGOGY. It follows that there must be a science of religious education. RELIGION IS TEACHABLE. It has to do, as we have seen, with the human mind, and the most fundamental thing about the mind is that it is educable. There must, therefore, be a science which shall do for religion what the science of pedagogy has done for secular education. That science exists and is called religious pedagogy.

IV. PSYCHOLOGICAL FOUNDATIONS. It follows again that a general knowledge of the nature of the mind and its ways of working is essential to intelligent teaching in the Sunday-school. No doubt there are certain principles that all teachers INSTINCTIVELY OBEY; but there are many others that can be known only by a special study of the mind and its laws. No doubt, too, there are BORN TEACHERS just as there are born musicians; but even in their case a knowledge of the human mind and the technique of teaching will greatly strengthen their natural powers. Every educational principle involves a psychological fact or law, acquaintance with which makes easier and more effective the application of the principle. New laws of teaching are constantly being discovered as our knowledge of the human mind grows. This and the following chapters will be an atttempt to bring the reader into at least a bowing acquaintance with the FACTS OF MODERN PSYCHOLOGY as they bear upon the science of religious education.



V. THE UNITY OF THE MIND. The mind is a unity. People used to talk about the knowing, feeling and willing "faculties," as though they were separate organs of the soul. It is now understood that this is a mistake. The whole mind or soul is involved in every one of our mental or spiritual acts. When I "think" it is I, the feeling, willing subject that thinks. When I "will" my act of will is colored by my thoughts and feelings. This is nature's hint that EDUCATION SHOULD BE A UNITY, and that intellect, feeling and will should be developed evenly. The poise or balance of all the mental powers is nature's ideal, and she always revenges herself on the personality for a lop-sided development.

VI. THE ACTIVITY OF THE MIND. In every mental experience or phase of conscious life the MIND IS ACTIVE. Even in the simplest act of seeing the mind is busy working up the data of sense into a "perception" of the object seen. The old idea of the mind as a BLANK SHEET OF PAPER upon which thoughts and images write themselves mechanically, is negatived by all the facts. Even when the mind seems most passive, it is really active. True teaching, therefore, cannot be the pouring of facts into the mind from outside; for whether the teacher wishes it or not, these "facts" are working over by the mind into something often sufficiently remote from the idea intended to be conveyed. Thus, the little girl who heard the hymn, "The consecrated cross I'd bear," sung in Sunday-school, and asked her mother on going home what "a consecrated cross-eyed bear" was, had worked over the sound of the words into something very different from their original meaning. Education is not putting in, but drawing out. It is a stimulation of the mind. The educated scholar in the Sunday-school is not the one who can repeat the books of the bible, or the dates of the kings, or can tell you that manna was like "coriander seed, white; and the taste was like wafers made with honey," but the one who has worked over the things given him into conceptions that he can utilize for life. And the business of the Sunday-school teacher is so to present the raw material of religious knowledge that it can thus be worked over.

LITERATURE: Coe's, "The Spiritual Life"; Fitch's, "Educational Aims and Methods"; Dexter's, "Psychology in the Sunday-school"; Starback's, "The Psychology of Religion"; James', "Talks to Teachers on Psychology"; Bryan's "The Basis of Practical Teaching"; Bladwin's, "The Story of the Mind"; James', "Psychology"; or any of the other standard psychologies.

QUESTIONS: (1) Discuss "mind, soul and spirit." (2) What is the derivation of the word psychology? (3) What has psychology to do with "saving a soul?" (4) What is religious pedagogy? and justify its existence. (5) What is its value for the practical work of Sunday-school teaching? (6) What is meant by the "unity of the mind"? (7) What does this suggest about education? (8) What is meant by the "activity of the mind"? (9) Criticise the "blank sheet of paper theory" of the mind? (10) Give an illustration from your own knowledge of the way in which the mind works over what is given to it.

The Centennial year has opened auspiciously for our Benevolent Association. Already $16,000 in special gifts has been received. The indications are that many others are planning to have joyful fellowship in making a generous Centennial offering to the tender ministry of benevolences. Individuals are asking about annuities. Churches and Bible-schools are pledging themselves to enlarge their gifts for this ministry. There is a feeling that our rejoicing over a century of unparalleled achievement will be greatly marred with the unanswered cry of the orphans and the indigent aged sounding in our ears. It would surely mean a note of discord in our psalm of thanksgiving.

March

The March-Wind-Elves are jolly sprites!
Look out, for they are here!
They're wild and boisterous and their pranks are very, very queer;
With little fans they'll toss your curls, they'll give your caps a fling,
And make them mount into the air like kites without a string;
And then they'll paint each cheek and ear
with red, until it glows,
And, deary me!—they might, perhaps, splash freckles on your nose!

A Queer World

A pin has a head, but has no hair;
A clock has a face, but no mouth there;
Needles have eyes, but they cannot see;
A fly has a trunk without lock or key;
A timepeace may lose, but cannot win;
A cornfield dimples without a chin;
A hill has no leg, but has a foot;
A wineglass a stem, but not a root;
A watch has hands, but no thumb or finger;
A boot has a tongue, but is no singer;
Rivers run, though they have no feet;
A saw has teeth, but it does not eat;
Ash trees have keys, yet never a lock;
And baby crows, without being a cock.

—Christina Rossetti.

A Black Boy's Heart

Here is a good story for boys: read it and profit by the moral it teaches.

They were the prettiest pair of ponies ever exhibited at the state fair, and their groom was only a colored boy who ran by their side stopped before the grandstand, the ponies rubbed up to Cato as though they loved him.

"What is their price?" asked a horse-dealer, for it was known that they were for sale.

"Five hundred dollars," said Cato.

"Stuff and nonsense," said the horse-dealer, "I'll give you $300 cash for them."

Cato shook his head and turned away for another offer; but, though every one admired them, no one wanted to buy.

"There," said the horse-dealer, "you see no one wants them. Tell me who owns them. He will be glad to take my offer."

"Dey 'longs to my young missus, an' she ain't gwine to sell 'cept she got $500 for 'em," said Cato.

"Humph!" said the horse-dealer. "A young girl owns them, does she? Well, if you will swear that one of them went lame, I will give you $50. You never had so much money in your life—did you, now?"

Cato gave such a start that the ponies started, too. Then, looking up, he said:

"Reck'n yer t'ink dat 'cause de Lord done give Cato a black skin, he gave him a black heart, too. 'Taint so, an' he ain't gwine blacken it dat way, nuther."

"Cato," said a gentleman standing by who had overheard the conversation, "why does your mistress want to sell her ponies?"

"De plantation, it bound to be sold nex' week," he said, "if me and Miss Helen can't raise de money. Marster he got all but $500 an' he took sick an' de barn burn down. Dat how comes Miss Helen sell de ponies."

"Well," said the gentleman, "you take them back and tell her they are sold for $500. My man will go with you and take the money. Tell her I am going to Europe for a year, and could consider it a favor if she would use them while I am away. If she can buy them back when I return I shall be very glad to sell them to her."

"Ef Cato ever kin serve you, sir, he jes' boun'ter do dat t'ing."

"You have done it already, Cato."

"What; sah? I ain't never see you befo'."

"True; but you have given me an opportunity to help another in trouble. You gave it to me just now, when I overheard you refuse to blacken your heart for that man's money."—Selected.

The Junior Pulpit

RICHARD W. GENTRY, PREACHER.

THE BODY AND THE SOUL.

How did God put the Soul and Body together? Did He sew them?

There are two parts to you and me. One is what we call the body. The body is a very useful thing. Its feet are made so they can do all kinds of work. They can jump out of bed in the morning with a jolly thump that says "Good cheer," for the day. They can run one after the other to the store for bread. They can stand still and refuse to move when they are tempted to do something wrong. The hands are very useful. They can pick up a basket or pick up a pin. They can sew, dig, scrape, peel, and pound. The body is a very beautiful thing. It is smooth, and rounded with graceful curves. Its skin is as soft as the leaf of a rose, and touched with delicate pink.

But there is also a soul. We do not know just where the soul is, or what it is. The soul makes the body a living thing, so that the hands move and the brain thinks. The soul is what makes us love mother, and mother love us, so. The soul is what makes you and me say our prayers at night and think of God. And the soul is what makes us feel,—oh, as if we wanted to be somebody great and good.

The soul and the body are together. How did God put them together? We do not know just how God put them together. We might say He knitted them together. So we must not try to take them apart. The soul lives in the body and we must make it feel at home. It will not feel at home unless the hands do useful things, the brain thinks noble things, and the lips speak kind things. We do not understand our souls quite as well as our bodies. Therefore we need God to help us take care of them. This is why at night-time we say, "Now I lay me down to sleep; I pray the Lord my soul to keep."

that in the right hands could be made profitable, and Winston, who had fought a plucky fight with obsolete and worthless implements and indifferent teams, felt that he could do a great deal with what was, as it were, thrust upon him at Silverdale. It was not avarice that tempted him, though he knew he was tempted now, but a longing to find a fair outlet for his energies, and show what, once given the chance that most men had, he could do. He had stinted himself and toiled almost as a beast of burden, but now he could use his brains in place of wringing the last effort out of overtaxed muscle. He had also during the long struggle lost to some extent his clearness of vision, and only saw himself as a lonely man fighting for his own hand with fate against him. Now, when prosperity was offered him, it seemed but folly to stand aside when he could stretch out a strong hand and take it.

During the last hour he sat almost motionless, the issue hung in the balance, and he laid himself down still undecided. Still, he had lived long in primitive fashion in close touch with the soil, and sank, as most men would not have done, into restful sleep. The sun hung red above the rim of the prairie when he awakened, and going down to breakfast found the lawyer waiting for him.

"You can tell Colonel Barrington I'm coming to Silverdale," he said.

The lawyer looked at him curiously. "Would there be any use in asking you to reconsider?"

Winston laughed. "No," he said. "Now, I rather like the way you talked to me, and, if it wouldn't be disloyalty to the Colonel, I should be pleased if you would undertake to put me in due possession of my property."

He said nothing further, and the lawyer sat down to write Colonel Barrington.

"Mr. Courthorne proved obdurate," he said. "He is, however, by no means the type of man I expected to find, and I venture to surmise that you will eventually discover him to be a less undesirable addition to Silverdale than you are at present inclined to fancy."

CHICAGO

Pioneer Work in a Pioneer City. The Interesting Steel City of Gary, Indiana, a Chicago Suburb, Grown as by Magic. Work of Disciples, modestly begun, should receive generous support

BY O. F. JORDAN.

It is freely predicted by the enthusiastic citizens of larger Chicago, that the city will grow within a life-time to four millions of people, extending around the lake from Waukegan to Michigan City, and eventually become the largest city in the world. In going about this city in our investigations for the Chicago Christian Missionary Society, we are impressed all the time with the stupendous character of the building operations of Chicago, and with the growth of the outlying suburbs. Express trains now bring in men from forty miles around in less than an hour to the office in the morning and home again at night. The city dweller is often willing to double the time spent in transportation in order that he may have clean air and a door-yard for his children and that he may come eventually to own a home of his own.

A recent trip was that to Gary, Indiana. While this young city is located thirty-six miles from the loop district and is in another state, it is yet organically connected with Chicago. A solid line of suburbs like beads on a string lie around the lake shore. As this suburb is so typical of Chicago enterprise, we have chosen it as a text from which to draw some morals in missionary operation.

A City Springing Up Like Magic.

A few years ago the meat packing industries bought up the land on the south side of the lake, realizing the strategic importance of the location. For a time there was much talk of moving the stock-yards to this place, but this enterprise failed for some reason. The real estate speculation for the packing people was a good one, however, as this was the very place the steel trust desired for their great plant and they were compelled to pay a thousand dollars an acre for a wild tract that was nothing but sand dunes and brush. Less than three years ago the Indiana Steel Company began the erection of their plant. Now there is a city there with a business street two miles long, paved throughout, with fine brick and stone business blocks on either side. The steel trust made an initial appropriation of a hundred million dollars for their plant. Of this amount sixty millions are already expended and the mills are now turning out the finished product. Additional appropriations will be made until this great steel plant will be the largest in the world, exceeding the plants at Pittsburgh, and the Krupp gun works in Germany. The ore will be shipped from Michigan and dumped out on one end of the nine-thousand-acre strip of land on the lake shore. Every time it is moved it will approach a little closer the other end of the strip, where the finished steel product is being loaded into the cars. Because of the cheapness of lake transportation, steel can be made in this plant twenty-two cents a ton cheaper than in Pittsburgh, and therefore this will be the last steel mill in the world ever to shut down. In this plant the present contracts provide for equipment that will employ from sixteen to twenty thousand men.

Home Building Not So Fast as Population Growth.

Other great works are under contract to build at Gary in the near future. The American Locomotive Works will employ from twelve to fifteen thousand men. The American Bridge Company will employ twelve thousand men. The present contracts for factories will bring not less than fifty thousand men to Gary to work in the mills. When it is understood that Indianapolis has employment for only seventeen thousand men, it will be seen that the expectation that Gary will be the largest city in the state of Indiana is justified by the facts. Men are coming on every train and securing employment. Great crowds leave the city every night to find a place to sleep, for with all of the stupendous building operations, the builders have not yet caught up with the needs of the town.

Let us not think, however, that the churchman is less enterprising than the business man. Though the town is only two years old, all the leading denominations are on the field and many of them have buildings. The Episcopal Bishop of Northern Indiana is touring the churches outside of his diocese telling the wonderful story of Gary. They have a little temporary pioneer chapel at present, but will build soon with ten thousand dollars' outside aid and possibly twenty thousand dollars. The Congregationalists are the first to have a permanent building in use. They brought in ten thousand dollars' outside money to put up the building. The Presbyterians will move into a modern structure in a few weeks, which was erected with the help of ten thousand dollars of outside money. The Baptists are putting in ten thousand dollars, but their building is not up yet. The Methodists have anticipated the time when they would need two churches in Gary and have locations in two different parts of town. These lots have been purchased with outside money and their minister is supported with outside money. The Roman Catholics already have a school building and a hospital in operation. The leading surgeon of the town is a Disciple but his only hope of a great hospital equipment was in connection with the Sisters. Through his influence, the hospital administration will be unusually liberal.

H. H. CLARK

The public school enterprise is shown in the erection of a two hundred thousand dollar High School, and in the letting of another contract immediately for a two hundred thousand dollar grade school building. Still other buildings are being planned for by the school board.

The Disciples in Gary.

Meanwhile, what of the Disciples in Gary? They are there as they are in every town in Indiana. They are of unusual influence in the town. A. B. Kellar is cashier of the Gary State Bank, Dr. H. M. Hosmer is the leading surgeon of the town, C. V. Ridgely is an enterprising young lawyer who already has a fine practice. He is the church treasurer. Dr. W. P. Alexander is a popular general practioneer in medicine, A. D. Milner is one of the leading real estate dealers, A. D. Polk is a cement contractor. This group of business men was hunted up by an enterprising young evangelist, H. H. Clark, last August, and organized into a church. The little church has about forty members, but has been self-supporting.

Seldom have we seen a minister make the sacrifices that our brother, H. H. Clark, has made. He was in demand at forty dollars a week in the evangelistic field. He has received a salary of eight hundred dollars a year in Gary, where living expenses are high and with his family of four has known what economy means. He is so thoroughly convinced of the ultimate outcome of things that he stays on, and labors and waits. Though he has appealed to all the available sources, not a dollar of outside help has come to him. As a last resort he appealed to Chicago. His appeal is now being considered by that board.

The church had been meeting in a temporary school house abandoned by the town. Recently they were ordered to vacate as the building was to be moved. The only auditorium of the town will cost them four hundred dollars a year. This they are unable to pay unless help comes.

Business in Christianity.

Their enterprise is shown by the fact that they secured an option on the finest church corner in the city. A corner 90x125 is now held by them. The contract price was $2,400, of which they have paid four hundred dollars. These lots have already made a sharp advance in value since the purchase last year. To hold them the interest must be paid with steady installments on the principal. Every lot sold in the city is sold with a contract to build within a specified time. Otherwise the title reverts.

The pastor, H. H. Clark, did his Liberal Arts work at the Free Baptist college at Hillsdale, Michigan. He has been a pastor at Cincinnati, Pittsburgh and Salem, Ohio. He is a popular lecturer, using a stereopticon with microscopic attachment to illustrate a lecture entitled, "A Cage or a Universe." The proceeds of this lecture he is devoting at the present time to the little church at Gary.

Weakness of Our Missionary Policy in Cities.

We went away from Gary with a deep feeling of sadness. The Disciples have the quality of leadership to be the leading people of Gary. Their nucleus is of the stuff to make it so. But owing to our principle of not appropriating money for church lots or buildings, in our missionary administration, we are to be again outstripped in the race for leadership. So far as pluck and genuine religion will influence the future, our people have it. But they have the heavy handicap of connection with a brotherhood which has not yet adopted the liberal policy toward new missions that should be. Where is the fault? Not with the societies. They have no money except as it is given. They are being continually criticised because of lack of conservatism. The fault lies with the great rank and file who have not yet been informed of the real nature of the task of taking a city for Christ. When any one asks again, "Why are we weak in the cities?" let it be replied, "Because we are stingy with our city missions."

Chicago Church Notes

The Evanston church will hold revival services beginning March 21. The pastor will do the preaching and the local musical talent lead the music. A large display advertisement of the services will be run in a commercial paper reaching every home, and several thousand pieces of printed matter will be distributed besides. A question box and a stereopticon prelude to the sermon will assist in attracting an audience.

A thorough canvass has been made of the north shore between the Evanston church and the Sheffield Avenue church to look for a good location for a new Mission. The report will be submitted to the city board at an early date.

Alva W. Taylor of Eureka began his ministry at the Irving Park church March 21. The church has been having meetings of the men to plan big enterprises before the coming of the pastor. They want to build the rear section of a new church building this summer. Rev. Taylor is well known to the Chicago ministry and receives a most cordial welcome here. He is just the man for the place.

Our church near Armitage avenue is meeting in the building vacated by the Salem Free Norwegian church. This building is located on Point street near California. It is for sale at four thousand dollars. A radius of a mile will not reach any other English-speaking church. While there are many Scandinavians, they are of the second generation and there is a strong native American element. If we do not buy the building some other organization will want it soon.

E. M. Todd held special services at the Austin church for a week recently, with most beneficial results.

R. R. Hill gave his stereopticon lecture on "Religious Problems in Cuba" at the Evanston church one Sunday night recently.

R. E. L. Prunty began his ministry at Chicago Heights about the first of February. He reports heavy losses to the church there, owing to the financial panic. He is most hopeful of the outlook, however.

Guy Israel Hoover has resigned at West Pullman to accept the church at Tipton, Indiana. In his ministry great advance has been made at West Pullman. He leaves the church out of debt and with a good building in complete repair. The church is thoroughly organized and harmonious and under proper leadership will grow into a power in the community. Mr. Hoover was in much demand to speak at the union meetings of his community. The church to which he goes has a large membership and a fine building, and we trust his influence will be exercised to bless a correspondingly greater number of people.

W. J. Wright will speak at the quarterly Rally of the Disciples of Chicago and suburbs, April 25. The last rally was an epoch-making one, but doubtless it will be exceeded by this one. The deep indebtedness of our cause in Chicago to the American Christian Missionary Society will induce our people to respond as never before.

In Memory of Parker Stockdale

The representatives of the Chicago Christian Ministerial Association, in the fraternal fellowship which has bound them with our lamented Brother Parker Stockdale, desire to convey in some measure the esteem in which this minister of Christ is held—a measure which words can but feebly express, and with heart feelings which can not be moulded in form of resolutions.

To the officers and members of the Jackson Boulevard Christian Church, of which Parker Stockdale was the trusted and beloved pastor for three years of successful and progressive work in the service and affection of the entire community, our sympathy and prayers that in their hour of separation his faith may inspire them to even larger life and service; and that God may give to them a man of like spirit and vision in the continuance of their great ministry and message to the people among whom he was so universally beloved.

To the members of every fraternity with which he was associated in life and service, we commend that fundamental principle of his life: "It is not so much to organize a brotherhood as to fraternize the hearts of already existing institutions." In every relation, to every soul, Parker Stockdale stood as a brother. "One was his Master, and all were brethren."

To his family—that inner group whom he loved as his own life as father and husband, may his God and his Saviour be Comforter and upholder in this hour when all we can say seems weak and futile. The Lord multiply to his loved ones his mercies and his love. May all that was noble and true in his manly spirit unfold itself in the latent capabilities of those who in their innocent faces and childlike hearts bear stamped the image of a sainted father. The Lord will not only comfort; he will provide. He will not forsake.

To the aged mother, whose fondest longings were anticipated in her successful son—whose dream of life is so suddenly broken—may no small measure of peace come in the glorious work already wrought by our brother, and in the certainty of his reward at the hand of the Christ he served, his Saviour and hers. To all his relatives and friends may the peace which passeth understanding come through that highest goal of service which he so faithfully sought and reached.

Our ministerial concepts have been enlivened, our love deepened, our memories solemnized, our hopes quickened, our lives energized by his presence and cheer during three years' fellowship in the Chicago Christian Ministerial Association. With all his friends—a multitude—we say: "It were better to have loved awhile—and lost by death—than not to have known and felt the influence of his optimistic, open-hearted life.

H. W. ELLIOTT, SECRETARY,
Sulphur.

Harlan county is fortunate in having A. E. Robertson as the preacher for a part of the churches. He has been at work two months and regards the outlook as full of promise. A fine hearing at all services. The Oldham churches have made possible his work and he is their "living link."

W. A. Nance is enjoying a scholarship furnished by the "Smallwood Fund" at McLean College and while pursuing his studies he is preaching. In the past six months he has baptized twenty-seven—added six otherwise.

G. B. Swann is in the same institution and received help from the same source and hence his work is reported to the board. He has baptized four and added fourteen otherwise. Both these young men are reported as consecrated servants of the Lord who bid fair to be greatly useful.

Boone county's "living link"—W. A. Wolfe, is progressing well at Springfield. Two added by letter and every department of the work moving well.

Breathitt county has the services of J. B. Flinchum because Harrodsburg church helps in his support and his labors are being blessed in the building up of the cause in that needy county.

J. W. Masters baptized five in Whitley county, reclaimed one and added three from another religious body.

W. P. Collins is receiving help in his work in the Sandy Valley. He baptized one—preaching nineteen sermons.

Bardstown moves on in the even tenor of its way, enjoying preaching half time by J. B. Briney.

Paintsville and A. Saunders move forward in the good work. Woodford county churches, outside of Midway, contribute enough to make this work and worker their "link."

Bromley is planning for a meeting. L. A. Kohler and the church will have W. J. Hudspeth in a meeting, immediately after a meeting at Ludlow, beginning March 8. A good meeting is expected.

Broadway, Lexington, must find joy in the work of her worker, Z. Ball, in Jackson and adjoining counties. Ten baptized and three added otherwise.

J. B. Lockhart and the South Louisville Church held a short meeting and although there were floods and rains good was wrought. Ten added—three by confession and baptism. Audiences much larger and work improving.

G. H. Thomas, in second division of London district, baptized three and added two otherwise.

E. C. Lunger and the Second Church at Richmond progress well in the work. This is the "link" of First Church, Richmond.

W. J. Cocke did good work at Lebanon. The new house was dedicated with enough money raised in cash and pledges to provide for the expense—$670. Twelve baptized and two other additions. This is a distinct victory for Lebanon. W. P. Walden is the acceptable leader of the struggling congregation at that place.

W. J. Hudspeth was in Ohio and Daviess counties. He baptized four, and added one other. As indicated above he is to be in northern Kentucky for some meetings.

D. G. Combs was at work one-third of the month. Short time caused by change of dates arranged for a meeting in western Kentucky. He baptized three and reclaimed one. He is Winchester's special worker and is doing a great work.

H. C. Runyon and Latonia are pushing forward with their usual vim. No report for February, but if they did not have additions it is unusual.

Jackson has been without a preacher for some time. It is hoped that Paris' "link" will soon be linked with a good worker.

A number of our men not heard from. We urge prompt reports at close of each month.

H. W. Elliott was busy all the month, in the field and at the desk. The receipts amounted to $1,167.41, an increase of $654.18 over February, 1908. If we can keep up that gait until September, 1909, we will present a report to the Centennial Convention of which we will not be ashamed. Two score, or more, churches have raised money that has not been sent in. Send it in now brethren. We need every dollar of it. Our obligations are heavy and we covet your help today.

Dean Norton and Dean Barr of Drake University, were in Chicago last week attending the meeting of the National Educational Association.

E. M. Pardee is beginning his work at Lexington, Neb., and the local papers speak most highly of an address which he made on temperance.

Wilhite and Gates are in a rousing meeting at Mt. Vernon, Ohio. There were sixty-six additions in eight days. L. O. Newcomer is the pastor.

The church at California, Mo., has called to its pastorate, A. F. Roadhouse, who has been studying at the Missouri Bible College, Columbia, Mo.

W. F. Turner, Central Church, Peoria, Ill., expects to have one hundred persons in a teacher training class. They will use the Moninger book.

The Independence Avenue Church, Kansas City, Mo., has employed George P. Taubman, as Sunday-school superintendent and assistant and pastor.

Vernon Harrington, evangelist, is assisting Pastor G. L. Eaton and the church at Hot Springs, Ark., in a meeting. There have been forty-four additions.

O. W. Lawrence, pastor of the church at Decatur, Ill., recently gave an address before the Training for Service class of the Sunday-school at Taylorville, Ill.

The Men's Association of the church at Kalamazoo held a recent banquet with E. B. Barnes of the Lyon Street Church, Grand Rapids, as chief speaker.

Thomas H. Popplewell is pushing the work with vigor at Arkansas City, Kansas. The Sunday-school has an attendance of 220, with a boys' class of fifty-eight.

The church for which J. H. Gilliland ministers in Bloomington, Ill., will erect a house of worship this spring. The plans are now being drawn by the architects.

During February there were sixteen additions to the church at Wichita, Kansas, in regular services. There are additions every Sunday. E. W. Allen is the pastor.

H. D. Williams, Kalamazoo, Mich., has just closed a two weeks' meeting which resulted in nine additions to the church. He was assisted by C. J. Marks, who led the singing.

Brooks Brothers are now stirring things at Moundsville, W. Va. More than 150 people had been reached before the close of February. George H. Stead is the hard working pastor.

The church at Greenville, Miss., has recently closed a meeting which was a decided uplift to the church. The preaching was done by Ernest Elliott of Alabama. L. E. Lakin is pastor.

The Foreign offering of the church at Blue Mound, Ill., was $40,00, which exceeded their apportionment. There were also five additions to the church the day of the offering. E. T. Clements is the successful pastor.

J. Perry Conder, minister at Heppner, Oregon, begins his work under most encouraging conditions. The Sunday-school has an enrollment of 200, and the evening audiences are taxing the capacity of the building.

A. R. Liverett, who has been acting as State Evangelist for Iowa, has begun work as pastor of the church at Cameron, Mo. He has just closed a meeting at Wagoner, Okla., in which there were thirty-seven additions to the church.

Claris Yeuell is assisting in a meeting at Lancaster, England, wher H. A. Procter, a graduate of Kimberly Heights and Bethany, is the minister. There is a strong movement toward the union of the Disciples and Baptists at Lancaster.

James R. McIntyre has begun his fourth year's work with the church at Grand Island, Neb. During the last year there have been 115 additions to the church, seventy-five by confession. The pastor has had thirteen weddings and twelve funerals.

V. E. Ridenour, Singing Evangelist of Topeka, Kans., is assisting Minister Z. E. Bates of Atchison. They claim over 1,000 members. His address while there will be Corner 5th and Parallel streets.

The Church of Christ of Hartford, Ohio, will celebrate its Fiftieth Anniversary on Sunday, March 21, 1909. Many former pastors and members will be present. H. N. Miller, of Cleveland, will be principal speaker. Stanton E. Hoover is pastor.

Under the leadership of J. H. Hardin, a very large number of the best Bible-schools of Missouri are organizing adult Bible classes, and the movement is proving a great impetus to the work of the churches in the state, even being the means of bringing some of them into the living link class, for Foreign Missions.

The young people of the Portland Avenue Church, Minneapolis, where P. J. Rice is pastor, are announcing three special Sunday evening meetings when the pastor will preach upon the following subjects: "A Fast Young Man," or "Sins of the Flesh;" "An Unbrotherly Brother," or "Sins of the Spirit;" "A Fatherly Father," or "Love in Action."

S. B. White reports an encouraging beginning of his work at the Central Church, Moberly, Mo. There have been twenty-two additions since the first of January. The church gave a reception to the new minister which was also a farewell to the departing minister, W. B. Taylor, who goes to Newport News, Va. W. M. White of Mexico, and F. W. Allen, Paris, Mo., were present at the reception. A Berean Brotherhood of seventy-five members has been organized.

A welcome reception was extended F. F. Walters by the First Christian Church, Joplin, Mo., March 10. The following extensive program was followed: On behalf Jasper County, D. W. Buchanan; on behalf South Joplin Christian Church, George L. Peters; on behalf Villa Heights Christian Church, John Famuliner; on behalf Commercial Club, A. H. Waite; on behalf Joplin Press, Bart Howard; on behalf First Christian Church, Dr. S. D. Soash; response by F. F. Walters.

DIDN'T REALIZE

How Injurious Coffee Really Was.

Many persons go on drinking coffee year after year without realizing that it is the cause of many obscure but persistent ailments.

The drug—caffeine—in coffee and tea, is very like uric acid and is often the cause of rheumatic attacks which, when coffee is used habitually, become chronic.

A Washington lady said, recently:

"I am sixty-five and have had a good deal of experience with coffee. I consider it very injurious and the cause of many diseases. I am sure it causes decay of teeth in children.

"When I drank coffee I had sick spells and still did not realize that coffee could be so harmful, till about a year ago I had rheumatism in my arms and fingers, got so nervous I could not sleep and was all run down.

"At last, after finding that medicines did me no good, I decided to quit coffee entirely and try Postum. After using it six months I fully recovered my health beyond all expectations, can sleep sound and my rheumatism is all gone." "There's a Reason."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WITH THE WORKERS

Dedication at West Rupert, Vermont

That which for some years had been seen and hoped for in faith by a few, was fully realized by the many in West Rupert, Vermont, on February 3. The beautiful new rock-faced marble church was dedicated free from debt, and friends and neighbors, as well as those who had labored long, went home with beaming faces and happy hearts.

The work had been under way just about a year, a building committee and a soliciting committee having been elected by the church at the annual meeting in January, 1908. Much work had been done in a quiet way, previously, but it was at that time that the first steps were taken publicly. Encouraged by a proposition made by Brother C. W. Sherman, his brother, wife and mother, to double all the church would raise up to $3,500.00, providing at least $3,000.00 be raised, the church quickly pledged goodly sums until, up to the date of dedication, nearly $9,000.00 had been raised. Dedication day dawned with an indebtedness of about $1,000.00. Brother H. A. Denton was here to help us, and under the charm of his pleasant manner and earnest words the congregation, of more than three hundred people, soon pledged more than enough to cover the indebtedness. These pledges, like those first made, are as good as cash.

The building is modern in design and construction. The auditorium seats about 150. The Bible school room and class rooms, which are readily made a part of the main room by opening the accordian doors, easily seat as many more. In the basement is a roomy, well-appointed dining-room with kitchen. The heat is furnished by a hot air furnace and light by an acetylene gas plant. While $10,000.00 covers the cost, visiting business men, who have means of knowing, estimate that in the cities it would have taken from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars to produce the same thing.

This work stands out the more prominently because of its being in New England and one of the only two congregations of diciples in the state of Vermont. Its history dates back to a visit of Alexander Campbell to Pawlet, Vt., in 1836. Organization was effected in 1837 under the leadership of Dr. Charles J. White. From that time on the church has stood through various vicissitudes as a beacon light. Some well-known names among the disciples are associated with this church. Some distinguished men have ministered here. President James A. Garfield being among the number who have preached in the old house. The first six years of W. L. Hayden's ministry were spent in this place.

We count it a great joy to have our new building in this centennial year. Brother Denton remains with us over Lord's day, preaching each evening.

One thing in particular we still lack in the way of equipment and that is a suitable organ. A fund is already started for this purpose and we trust will soon swell to the necessary proportions.

F. Richard Eaton, Minister.

Somerset, Pa., March 4, 1909.—George L. Snively has just closed an eighteen days' meeting here with sixty-five additions. Although the women greatly predominate in number since the day of the "Three Marys" who started the movement here, thirty-three of the number were males and thirty-two females. The average age is about 21. For the conservative east, this is a large ingathering, and is the largest in the history of this church, or of any church in Somerset. J. D. Garrison is pastor.

Telegrams

Des Moines, Iowa, March 15.—We all appreciate the sane, wholesome, splendid report of our work in the Century last week, as given by George A. Campbell.—Chas. Reign Scoville.

Canton, Mo., March 13, 1909.—Canton Church doubled its Foreign Missions apportionment last Lord's Day, giving $105.00, the largest offering in its history. Credit is due the minister, G. W. Buckner.—B. H. Cleaver.

Fresno, Calif., March 1, 1909.—In midst of great meeting. Breeden, evangelist; Saxton, singer. Became Living-link yesterday in both home and foreign societies. Hundred sixty to date.—J. R. Perkins, Pastor.

Mishawaka, Ind., March 8.—Great closing week. Forty-four additions. Encountered four blizzards. Minister Hull and wife also singer sick during meeting. Seven pastors here in eight years. Enough said. Among additions splendid pipe organist and Evangelist Buss, widely known as soloist and cornetist. Bergholz, Ohio, next.—Clarence D. Mitchell.

Des Moines, Iowa, March 15.—Forty converts in two invitations yesterday. Six hundred in nineteen days with University Church and Brother Medbury. Phenomenal crowds, with exceedingly large per cent Christians; 1,464 accessions since coming to Des Moines. We will dedicate the new Auditorium next Sunday, March 21, the greatest auditorium built by Disciples of Christ in a century. It is the opportunity of a life time to work with such a pastor and church and the men of Drake University. Pray for our work and workers.—Chas. Reign Scoville.

Wheeling, W. Va., March 14.—We just closed the greatest meeting ever held at Flushing, Ohio. Nearly every evening audience was over half men. Ninety-one were added in sixteen days' invitation, and more than half of them were men. Seventy-nine were over twelve years of age and fifteen were heads of families. Charles R. Newton is the consecrated pastor and is doing a noble work. We had to close prematurely on account of our own meeting approaching at the Island Church by Coombs and Lewis. Miss Vida Kimble of Wheeling did excellent work as soloist and director. She ought to be kept busy constantly.—Rufus A. Finnell, Evangelist.

Kansas City, Mo., March 15.—Twenty-seven additions not reported since I took the work here in the absence of Brother Combs. Minister enjoying his foreign trip. All is well with him and family. Enthusiastically beloved here by his great church. Brother Geo. Taubman busy man in the Sunday-school campaign here. C. M. Chilton and Fife and Sons in two great meetings at First and Ivanhoe churches. Men's Brotherhood organized three weeks ago; 105 members. Feeling the pull of this strong body of men in Independence Boulevard church. The Brotherhood Covenant is great. The first section provides evangelistic material; second section provides men to do the personal work. The Brotherhood movement most tremendous thing before our people today. Push it everywhere.—James Small.

Des Moines Ministers' Meeting March 1, 1909. Central (Idleman) five confessions; Capitol Hill (Van Horn) three additions; Ninth and Shaw (Finch), five additions; South Side and Chesterfield (Finkle) two additions; Grant Park (Horne) three confessions, two by statement.

C. R. Wolford, pastor at Blandsinville, writes in optimistic tones of his work there. He is specially gratified at the development of the men's work in his church which, while yet in the experimental stage, he hopes will shortly be realizing the motto "A man's work in a man's way." "Hon. John Huston, one of our own zealous workers, gave a masterly address at the last meeting of the Men's league," the pastor writes. "Mrs. Dr. Butchart of China gave us a long-to-be-remembered message on the work at Lu Cheo Fu on February 28. Last, but not least, we believe the CHRISTIAN CENTURY is growing richer each week.

PIMPLY PRETTY FACES

May Be Made Clean and Clear By Using Stuart's Calcium Wafers.

Trial Package Sent Free.

Pretty faces are daily seen about us marred and marked with pimples, blotches and eruptions.

There is absolutely no necessity for this condition being so exceedingly prevalent. Pimples and skin troubles show that the blood is impure, and is forcing its impurities into the cells and glands of the skin, there festering and breaking out into many eruptive disorders.

Don't Mar Your Beauty by Neglect. Stuart's Calcium Wafers Sent Free for Trial.

Calcium Sulphide is one of the greatest blood purifiers known to science, and is so powerful that in a few days dreadful conditions of skin disease are overcome, and pimples and ordinary skin troubles have been removed in a few days.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers contain this great purifier and preserve its fullest strength in the peculiar process called Stuart's. Combined with the Calcium Sulphide are three other great blood invigorators, each doing a special work intended for rapid and complete mastery over blood impurities and skin diseases.

By using Stuart's Calcium Wafers in a few days one notices the good effects, and in a short time the blood responds quickly and purges itself of its irritating and impure parts.

These wafers are not experimental, they do their great work so fast and are so uniformly successful that they are known in every hamlet and by every druggist. Physicians will tell you of Calcium Sulphide, and how hard it is to prepare it to hold its full strength. Stuart has solved the question with Stuart's Calcium Wafers. They sell at all druggists for 50c., or send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 175 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

Centennial Bulletin

The Quality of Mercy

Mercy and the Brotherhood.

A Brotherhood rally was held in Pittsburg, Monday evening, March 8. More than 250 men were present. It remains undecided which was greater, Pittsburg's enthusiastic appreciation of the new Brotherhood secretary, P. C. MacFarlane, and his splendid presentation of the great work inaugurated, or MacFarlane's enthusiastic appreciation of the record breaking reception given him and the Men's Movement by the men of the Centennial City. But one thing is settled, the climax of the evening was reached in the Big Brother's appeal for a chivalric attitude toward woman, and a tender regard for children. Christ's men are about to restore the quality of mercy to Christ's church.

Mercy and the Pittsburg Survey.

The Centennial city has just come out from under the microscope of the Sage Foundation experts. The trend of the better twentieth century is indicated by the Survey's commendation of provisions of mercy as steps of public policy: Playgrounds for the children, juvenile courts for the bad (?) boys, hospitals for the sick and crippled, homes for the orphans and worse-than-orphans, libraries, parks and filtered water for everybody. How finely Pittsburg is cleaning up for the Centennial is indicated by the fact that the enjoyment of filtered water for just a part of 1908, and other sanitary reforms for a similar brief period, reduced the death rate to the extent of saving two thousand lives.

Mercy and the Woman's Hemisphere of Christianity.

Some of us are so much pleased with the return to the old custom of seating the men and women separately on opposite sides of the church in the C. W. B. M. camp fires, that we are almost ready to advocate the restoration of this way of our grandparents. The feminine as well as the masculine hemisphere of Christianity has suffered by the confusion of the sexes in church and school and industry. Simultaneously with the Men's Movement in various forms, we have many varieties of segregated feminine effort. The most extreme of these is Christian Science. Absurd as it may appear Mrs. Eddy's demand that we recognize "the motherhood of God," the splendid success of both the C. W. B. M. and the National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church attests the vital place that motherhood and home must hold in Restored Christianity.

Mercy and Easter.

It is a doubly happy arrangement that always allows the children's societies and the Bible-schools of our churches, with whatever assistance they can secure from their elders, to consecrate Easter with its memories of our Saviour's Resurrection to the promotion of organized Christian mercy, both at home and abroad. Siv orphanages of the one organization in other lands, and six orphanages of the other under the Stars and Stripes, are dependent upon the Easter fund.

Mercy and the Centennial.

"The greatest of these is love," but it is also the last. The original leaders of this of tender heart and warm Christian sympathy. But they were compelled to devote their Restoration Movement were individually men days and their strentgh to battling for the faith. They had to make conquests of peace with the sword of the Spirit. Through their valor and devotion we have reached the larger places of full apostolic realization. The Centennial finds the Disciples of this century a million and a half strong, and lacking nothing of worldly goods, a very Solomon ready to build the divinely patterned temple with the material gathered by warrior hands. May the lesson of the old dispensation not be lost upon us. May the unselfish love be supreme in the House of God, and so the sons of the twentieth century prove worthy successors of the sires who inaugurated the ninteenth century.

W. R. Warren,
Centennial Secretary.

Pittsburg and Around About

A most enthusiastic meeting of the Ministerial Association of the churches in and around Pittsburg was held Monday morning, March 8, with thirty-three present. A part of the order of the day was the receiving of reports from the various churches as to the work done. In these reports it was discovered that the churches were working along two lines especially. First, in evangelistic campaigns carried on by the preachers themselves, or by the assistance of men procured from other states. Thus, George W. Knepper reports eighty-six additions since the first of the year, with Brother and Sister Kendall assisting in a three weeks' meeting.

Thomas Hughes of Turtle Creek, reports 207 additions, with F. A. Wight preaching.

C. L. Thurgood reports nine additions at Central, Pittsburg, with J. A. Jayne preaching.

E. A. Hibler reports 161 additions at First, Johnstown.

E. A. Cole, 200 additions at First, Washington.

F. A. Bright reports eighty-four additions at Waynesburg, twenty-two at Holbrook and three at Windridge, all within ninety days.

J. D. Dabney reports nineteen additions at Herron Hill.

Percy Davis reports thirty-two at Duquesne.

F. M. Gordon 117 at Knoxville.

Systematic campaigns are being carried on in Bible-school work also. Howard Cramblet reports one Baraca class and three Philathea classes at McKeesport, with 600 enrolled in the school. Fred M. Gordon reports an adult class of 140 at Knoxville. Brother Canfield of Perryopolis reports a great awakening there, especially in the Bible-school.

On the evening of March 8, P. C. Macfarlane, national secretary of the Men's Movement, delivered a glowing address before a large gathering of men in the Evangelical Lutheran Church of this city.

A systematic campaign in the interest of the Bible-school is being carried on in the old historic mother church, Northside, where Dr. Wallace Tharp ministers, under the able leadership of Leroy Boggs.

We are sorry to note the resignations of John G. Slayter of the East End, which takes place the first of April, at which time he goes to Brooklyn to carry on an evangelistic campaign in the interest of the churches there, and J. C. Crosby of Braddock, who gives up the work there and begins his new work at Wellsville, N. Y., next Lord's Day.

We were glad to welcome into our fellowship, Holly M. Hale, of Wellsville, Mo., who has taken up the work at Crafton, Pa.

O. H. Philips.

Benevolent Centennial Aims

In addition to its regular work our Benevolent Association has undertaken to increase our Centennial joy by the accomplishment of certain definite objects. It is calling the attention of the friends of the widow and the orphan to several most worthy ends which it desires to reach.

First: It is in need of $1,000 for the purpose of repairing the Orphans' Home at Baldwin, Ga. These improvements are greatly needed, and if made would place that most deserving institution in position to do a great work for years at small expense.

Second: The Colorado Christian Orphans' Home, the only one we have in the West, is $4,000 short of enough to secure for itself a good building. We have hundreds of brethren who could supply this need and feel nothing but joy in doing it.

Third: We are without a single open door of refuge and comfort for the aged, indigent Disciple of Christ in all the South. The people of Texas have $3,000 of the $15,000 needed for this Home. It should be a small matter to raise the other $12,000.

Fourth: The Babies' Home and Christian Hospital, one of the most fruitful ministries of the brotherhood, is living in a hired house. It cares for young babies and has aided over 2,000. We could give the $20,000 needed to provide a nest for these little ones and never miss it from any other line of work.

Fifth: In addition to these needs there is an indebtedness on the institutions of the Association. This should be lifted that the hands of Love may be untied. The total amount needed is only $28,700. The total amount needed to make the needed improvements and clear all the Homes is $65,700. The realization of these aims would place the benevolent work of our great brotherhood upon a broad, permanent foundation. Once that is done a great work can be easily maintained. Such an achievement for such a ministry would mean the completion of our Centennial joy. Shall it be done? God is interested in our answer. What shall be our reply?

In this our Centennial year we are on trial before Christ and the world. If in the midst of our splendid achievements for missions and evangelism it is manifest that we have played well the part of the Good Samaritan, the world will take knowledge that we have been with Jesus, and He will approve.

CONVINCED
Woman's Interesting Experience.

A Md. woman tells how she was convinced in regard to a matter of vital importance. She says:

"Before I used Grape-Nuts I was almost a physical wreck. I suffered untold agonies from indigestion, could not sleep at night, was on the verge of nervous prostration.

"I finally purchased a pkg. of Grape-Nuts, and the one pkg. convinced me it was just what I needed. I gradually grew better as I continued to eat the food and my ills vanished.

"I can now sleep soundly every night, going to sleep as soon as I retire. I never have dyspepsia any more.

"Too much cannot be said in favor of Grape-Nuts as a brain food for school children—makes them rosy and active.

"It is just the kind of food one needs for that tired feeling, and produces a reserve force and energy which lasts." "There's a Reason."

Hobnobbing With Hoosiers

By Richard W. Gentry.

We have been to Indiana. Always before we have been through. And we confess that on this occasion we crossed the state line with considerable trepidation. For our knowledge of Indiana confined itself almost wholly to Bud and his dog in "Hoosier Schoolmaster," at which Bud looked proudly down and said, "When Bull once takes a holt, heaven and yarth can't make him let go!"

The occasion was the Central Indiana Ministerial Institute, held in the Downey Avenue Church, Indianapolis, March 8 and 9. As we arrived in the city and took the car for Irvington, the request of the announcements that one should meander from car to church was made clear, and being late we fairly curved and teeter-tottered our way to the door. If the good pastor, Bro. C. H. Winders, has not the foreign element of the city to contend with, he has enough crescent-shaped geography to offset it. The church is situated in delightful surroundings. In every direction stretch the homes of its members and friends, with large yards just beginning to take on their spring coat of green. Only a short distance to the south and east rise the buildings of Butler College and the Missionary Training Building of the C. W. B. M.

The Institute was opened with able addresses on "Do the Disciples Need a New Apologetic?" by William Oeschger, and "The Preacher and His Library," by Prof. Jabez Hall. The address of J. M. Rudy on "Modern Evangelistic Methods" was missed in an effort to see Butler College, but from reading his writings in our current literature we are familiar with the vigorous thought it must have contained. The closing part of the program was also lost in taking an afternoon train. But those addresses which were heard gave knowledge of the breadth of the program, and the varied activities of the Indiana ministry. On the one hand we heard J. B. Burkhardt on the "Preacher and Practical Problems." His address dealt chiefly with the liquor question and his stories of persistent labor with inebriates set before us a self-sacrificing ideal. On the other hand was J. C. Todd's able and scholarly paper on "The Growth of the New Testament Canon." In the evening, President E. B. Bryan gave an address on "The Relation of Education to the Religious Life," full of sound thought, in which he showed that the aim of the two was the same, the method only differing.

The social feature of the Institute was not the least important. The Missouri outside latch-string and hearty handshake seem characteristic also of Indiana. At the church we ate of the good meals the ladies served. At night time we were likewise in good hands, for a missionary named Moses took us under his roof. During a portion of the institute, and especially on Monday night, much water, congruously, fell. Tuesday an interesting visit was made to Butler College chapel, where our eyes met the inspiring sight of a large room comfortably filled with young men and women. Butler College occupies a beautiful natural site, enhanced by the several large buildings. In the center stands the main building, while across the green in different directions are the Athletic Field, Laboratory Hall, the Gymnasium, the Women's Residence, and the splendid Thomson Memorial Library. The inadequate interest which the Disciples have always shown in their educational institutions is rendered more pathetic by the richness of the natural sites and resources which they possess. Let us hope that such gatherings as this under the shadow of our colleges will find for our hands a work to do.

Andrew P. Johnson closed his work with the Bethany, Mo., Church, March 1. Two additions to the church on his last Sunday. He was given a farewell reception by the congregation.

The Cross and the Modern Mind

It is the practice of some types of conservative preachers and evangelists to speak slightingly of the work done by those who hold different views from their own in regard to the interpretations of Christian truth. It is highly characteristic of men of a certain grade of culture to believe that theirs is the only attitude which can be held toward biblical doctrines. At least they are confident that any other interpretation than theirs is inconsistent with the teachings of the Word of God. This narrowness manifests itself in many ways, but in none more striking than the effort to discredit the achievements of the Christian teachers, preachers, missionaries, and authors who have found value in the modern studies of science, criticism, and social uplift. It is often the effort of conservative writers and speakers to disparage all activities save those which represent their own school of thought; and particularly is this tendency apparent in connection with evangelistic effort.

When, however, one goes more deeply into the facts, he is likely to discover that the men of the modern school who are familiar with the facts of science, who have studied their Bibles under the light of the historical method, and who are trying to interpret Christianity as a vital and effective force for personal regeneration and social betterment, are accomplishing results which give promise of quite as widespread values and quite as much permanency as those of any other school of thought. More than this we do not care to say. It is not by boasting that the values of any view of Holy Scripture are to be maintained. It is rather by observation of the character of Christian life and effectiveness of church work which grows out of the modern view of God and of the world.

Point is given to these reflections by the spirited correspondence which has recently appeared in English religious journals over the statement made by a reviewer in the notice of a recently published book. The following is the word of the reviewer, including his quotation from the volume, whose title is "The Wondrous Cross," by Thomas Clow:

"On the very first page we are arrested by a story of a man of wide reading attending an evangelistic meeting, and revolting at the claim made by the Cross. Yet, as Mr Clow says, 'the evangelist was right, wholly right,' for 'every religious movement . . . which leaves out the redeeming Cross, ends like a desert river in a marsh, or slips into a chill and pallid Unitarianism.' And then come these significant words:

"'A few years ago Henry Drummond, a forever endeared name, himself a fully consenting believer, was preaching a Gospel which did not focus on the Cross. His brilliant gifts and his mesmeric personality gave his message a potent charm. Crowds of young men flocked to his meetings. The movement has passed, and is little more than a tender memory.' (P. 3.)

"This is courageously put, and perhaps it required saying just as lovingly and faithfully as Mr. Clow has been able to say it."

It must have surprised men who had the slightest acquaintance with the life and influence of Henry Drummond to read an utterance so little in harmony with the facts as author and reviewer have permitted themselves to state in the above quotation. It is not surprising, therefore, that a storm of protests appeared, including not only the words of those who share Henry Drummond's scientific and critical views, but as well men of quite different attitudes toward the Bible and the problems which are now engaging the minds of Christian scholars. These protests point out the fact that never has Henry Drummond's influence been so widespread and salutary as it is today in those communities where he wrought through the years of his university instruction. Not only was he profoundly committed to the essentials of Christian truth, bearing unceasing testimony to the basic elements of our holy faith, the atonement, the forgiveness of sins, the saving work of Christ, but his own life was a living expression of these truths which he so deeply held. University students throughout the world probably owe to Henry Drummond more than to any other one man in the way of spiritual uplift. He gave direction and character to the students' movement, which has grown under the stimulus of his example and his teachings. As Dr. Alexander Whyte, perhaps the most noted preacher in Edinburgh, declares of Drummond's work among the students of the university: "Into that world of plastic young humanity he stepped, a man absolutely pure, a gentleman, and a Christian. . . . From that day to this certain ways which used to be accepted as merely part of the day's life to those who chose to live that way have been bad form. . . . Certain aspirations and ideals after the noblest things have been held in honor. . . . Few religious teachers in our time have commanded so vast an audience at home and throughout the world."

Similar words regarding the depth and strength of Drummond's religious convictions and utterances are given by such men as John Kelman, George Adam Smith, A. R. Simpson, and a great company beside. When any cause finds itself compelled to resort to slighting references to a great servant of God like Henry Drummond, it has come to an unhappy and unholy pass. Such flings at the beliefs and services of the type of men which Drummond represents, a type which is now dominant and increasing in the leadership of all the churches, both in America and abroad, only react to deepen the conviction that such criticisms can only proceed from ignorance of the facts or ineradicable prejudice.

The Cross of Christ has never in the history of the church been given so vital and effective a place in the preaching of Christianity as today and by the men of modern training. They do not make the death of Christ a mere episode of the past, but the necessary and fitting climax and interpretation of his life. Nor is it merely the ground of sacramental grace in a scheme of divine jurisprudence, but the disclosure of the life of God as essentially sacrificial and loving, and the secret of the Christian's character as the child of God, partaking necessarily of these elements. The secret of the cross is not a theory of the atonement, but the possession of the holy life and the redemptive passion of Jesus.

PARCELS POST AND BOOKS

The League of Library Commissions urges the parcels post because it will "enable librarians to send individual volumes to patrons on rural routes at less than half the present cost, thus encouraging home study." They point out the fact that the distribution of library books in rural homes is almost impossible because of the prohibitive cost of transportation. If the library is one of the great agents of enlightenment why confine its work to the towns? Anything that makes the distribution of intelligence easy is a forward step for citizenship and all else for which civilization strives.

A NOTABLE CONVERT

News comes from China of the declaration at Tien-Tsin by Chang Po Ling, one of the most influential of the new Chinese educators, that he is a convert to Christianity. The president of the Imperial University declares his conversion equals, in significance to Christianity in China, all other conversions there in the last forty years.

The Shanghai Conference asked for one hundred of the ablest young men the college and universities could send out to take places in the schools of higher learning being established by the government. The International Commission of the Y. M. C. A. has recently furnished five men to the public schools at Tien-Tsin. The Shanghai Association has 500 young men in its educational classes. American educators can do more than can American diplomats or commerce for the rejuvenation of China, by moulding her thought for the next generation and training her future rulers.

THE SHANGHAI OPIUM CONFERENCE

Seven nations participated in the Shanghai conference, which was called by this country to consider the opium question. China's earnest endeavor to throttle the monster that has its coils about her moral and economic life, led reformers to petition President Roosevelt to call this conference.

China is not yet out of the swaddling clothes in which she was placed in the days of the Taipings. She cannot act in all things as she would like because the powers do not yet consider that her proneness to hate the "foreign devil" can be trusted to give justice and insure peace on all occasions. Then too, once a commercial power gets an advantage she is reluctant to lose it. Japan waited long for recognition on the basis of a civilized and competent nation, and only within the past few years has she had power to try cases in her own courts where the property or person of a foreigner was involved. But America seeks to play the part of big brother to China and to give her moral and diplomatic protection against vested interests.

The Viceroy, Tuan-fang, opened the conference by an address in which he claimed that the consumption of the drug had been reduced one-half. It will be remembered that the reform edict gives ten years for the complete subsidence of the growing of the poppy and the officials say it is being enforced by an annual decrease of production. The government asked that all foreign nations enforce a like reduction of importation, a thing which China ought to be allowed to do without fear or favor of any power. England reluctantly agrees on a reduction of one-tenth of the annual Indian importation for three years. But India derives large revenues from that trade and the Royal Commission appointed some years ago to report on the matter said, "the common use of opium is a moderate use leading to no ill effects." But suppose that were so, has one nation the right to force another to receive goods which that nation condemns as threatening her national life. Out of 50,000,000 men in China more than 13,000,000 smoke the deadly drug. In time British conscience will overcome trading interests in India and both the Chinese and Hindus will be protected against the Godless greed of illicit traffic.

The conference recommends further that all foreign nations forbid the use of the drug on their concessions. This is being done now, but has been a serious hindrance heretofore. If Portland tried to honestly rid herself of drink and China had a hundred acres right by her docks that she governed as Chinese territory, and its streets became a row of saloons, we would have a fit illustration of what the Chinese ask of other governments in this matter. Morphine is being extensively used as opium goes out, and its manufacture will have to be stopped.

Japan has demonstrated in Formosa what can be done with the opium evil in Chinese territory and we are engaged in the same demonstration in the Philippines. If any one doubts the ravages of the habit in China let him read Samuel Merriam's recent book entitled "Drugging A Nation." The conference is generally considered a failure on account of British protests against effective prohibition.

THE BATTLE WITH THE BOTTLE

The merry battle with the bottle progresses from week to week with undiminished vigor. Not all asked for is given by the legislatures, but little that could reasonably be expected is denied. South Carolina and West Virginia lost state prohibition, but the measures put on the statute books will all but make both states "dry" by the local option principle. South Carolina abolishes the State Dispensary and leaves counties to settle for themselves whether they will have a county dispensary or no liquor. The Arkansas House passed the state-wide prohibition measure by overwhelming vote. The prediction in these columns that the election of Tom Marshall and a Democratic legislature in Indiana did not mean a repeal of Hanly's county option law is justified by the killing of the repeal measure in the Senate.

Kansas establishes a new principle. So far anti-saloon legislation has been directed against the open saloon. After years of state prohibition the Sunflower state finds such desperate outlawry innate in the business, that she must meet the issue with the most severe measure that ever went on a statute book in regard to the liquor trade. She allows no drug stores to handle it and no physician to prescribe it and collect his fee for so doing. This law will have to stand the constitutional test as the state constitution of Kansas makes an exception of medicine, science and mechanical arts. On the other hand the U. S. courts have declared that the absolute prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicants is a good and honest right of the people. The new principle established by Kansas is that of denying the right to use liquor. The effort to abolish the saloon may lead to such measures in order to make law enforceable.

In Illinois the enforcement of the new law is proving less difficult than expected. The judiciary are earnest in their attitude and give the law an honest chance. The penalties are generally adequate and full of warning. A Search and Seizure law, such as the Anti-Saloon League is asking, will make the law serious to the "Blind Tiger" and convince the people that more is better.

The general effect of the battle is demonstrated by the fact that the Whisky Trust last year distilled but 128,000,000 gallons as against 168,000,000 the year before. This is a clear loss of 25% in one year.

In New Zealand the electorate shows a clear majority against the saloon. The entire colony would go "dry" could the matter be settled by a majority vote. The present law requires a two-fifths vote to create "dry" territory and permits elections in districts only.

MAKING INTELLIGENCE QUICK AND INEXPENSIVE

Saskatchewan has bought out the Bell Telephones and made them governmental property. Manitoba's success encouraged the step. In one year the latter province made a profit of $250,000 on its investment of $4,000,000, and greatly reduced rates besides. Further reductions of from 25% to 40% are promised. In Winnipeg a business phone costs but $39 and one in a residence but $25. This is from one-half to one-third our average city rates.

Sir Joseph Ward, Prime Minister of New Zealand, reports rates there but one-half what they were under private ownership. Sweden is generally considered the most up-to-date telephone country in the world, but New Zealand does a larger volume of business with a population but one-fifth as dense and no large cities like Stockholm.

In France the government-owned telegraph now transmits night messages of fifty or more words at the rate of one centime, or one-fifth of one cent, per word. Another favorable report on public ownership of natural monopolies is that of the Ottawa, Can., city council on the third year's operation of their Municipal Lighting Plant. An increase in patronage of 250%, and of revenues of 200% recommends the undertaking.

EDITORIAL

Pastor Wagner of Paris, who is well known as the author of "The Simple Life" and who has written widely for American and English religious journals since his visit to this country three years ago, has just published a new book entitled "The Home of the Soul."

The third number of "Christian Men," the journal of the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ, is full of good things. The editor, P. C. Macfarlane, who is also the General Secretary of the Brotherhood, is producing a spirited and helpful magazine. It has come in the nick of time. The brotherhood spirit is in the air. All the churches should be eager to avail themselves of the value of such an instrument of service. The present number of "Christian Men" contains a model constitution for local brotherhoods. It is sufficiently flexible to meet the needs of any group of Christian men.

The responses that have come to the office of the American Christian Missionary Society from churches and pastors in reference to the great offering for home missions the first Sunday in May are exceedingly encouraging. There is every reason to believe that a record-breaking gift will be made by the Disciples of Christ in this, the centennial year. This will not only mean an advance along the whole line of our home mission work, but it will be a proof to all who watch our work with interest that it is marked by consecration and an earnest effort to push on into new fields and forms of service.

Dean W. J. Lhamon, of the Bible College of Missouri, who expects in the near future to take up his residence at Des Moines, Iowa, has arranged to spend some time in evangelistic work in coöperation with Byron L. Burditt, Singer. Dean Lhamon's ability as a preacher, his long experience in teaching and preaching and his consecration to the ideals of the Kingdom of God in teaching and in ministerial work make him a desirable leader in campaigns of evangelism which the churches are sure to desire. No congregation will fail of spiritual uplift and inspiration under the direction of these men. We understand that they will be ready for service in the early autumn. In connection with the evangelistic meetings Mr. Lhamon delivers courses of lectures on such themes as Additional Studies in the Character of Christ, Comparative Religion and New Testament Book Studies.

The Summer Quarter of the University of Chicago will be especially attractive this year for ministers and Christian workers by reason of the fact that Professor George Adam Smith, of Scotland, will be one of the instructors in the Biblical faculty during the first term. Professor Smith is perhaps the greatest living exponent of Biblical literature. He combines the elements of the highest scholarship with great personal magnetism and his work in the class room and in the pulpit has drawn to him a host of students and others, both in Europe and in this country. Three years ago it was the expectation that Professor Smith would spend a term at the university during the Summer Quarter, but his serious illness prevented him from fulfilling this promise. Now he comes to fill this engagement and his arrival is awaited with the greatest interest not only by the members of the university, but by a wide circle of teachers and ministers who will avail themselves of the opportunity to spend a period of study at the university.

Last year the Christian world was surprised and pained to learn that, after many years of service, Principal A. M. Fairbairn of Mansfield College, Oxford, had resigned his position in order to spend the remainder of his life in the greater leisure of his study and in the discharge of wider duties to Congregationalism and the free churches in general. Dr. Fairbairn's name has been so intimately connected with Mansfield College, the one non-conformist, evangelical school at Oxford, that it hardly seems possible to think of the institution without his presence. Yet his friends recognize the justice of his plea for release. After several months of careful consideration, the Council of Mansfield College has selected a new principal in the person of Rev. W. B. Selbie, M. A., of Cambridge, pastor of Emmanuel Church. Dr. Selbie has been a notable figure among the preachers of Cambridge for years. He is a great favorite with the undergraduates and with the students of Homerton College, a large number of whom attend Emmanuel Church. He will be a worthy successor to Dr. Fairbairn, though he would be the last to claim either the great learning or the brilliant expository power of his predecessor. In accepting the position he will be returning to the college where he received his own theological training and where he was for a time lecturer on Hebrew and the Old Testament.

Professor Harnack of Berlin has recently published an additional preface to his work "What is Christianity?" in connection with the new edition which is now being issued from the press. A work so important as this could not fail to awaken widespread interest and cause much discussion. In that discussion Dr. Harnack himself took no part, preferring to let the book speak for itself and to allow the exchange of views suggested by the statement of the book to go on. It was not until the fiftieth thousand appeared that he consented to review the discussion up to date. In the new edition, which is the sixtieth thousand, he has appended a few pages of annotations, several of which enlarge or modify statements made in the original work, but none of which in any essential matter changes the thesis of "Das Wesen des Christentums."

Dr Harnack is a prolific producer, his recent works on the New Testament being among the most important contributed to biblical studies in recent years. In order to secure greater leisure for his literary work, he has largely withdrawn from the duties of his university position and has accepted the place of Head Librarian of the great Berlin Library. This does not entirely interfere with his university instruction, which still continues, under limitations prescribed by his desire for greater leisure for literary work. It is not too much to say that Dr. Harnack is the most conspicuous writer on biblical literature, history and criticism in Germany.

The latest number of "The Congo Christian," published at Bolenge, Africa, and dated at the Christian season, brings the news of the urgent need of a doctor at once for the mission station at Monieka. At the same time comes an urgent letter from Dr. Royal J. Dye, whose name is intimately linked with our mission interests on the Congo. His appeal is intended to be transmitted to any consecrated Christian physician who is young enough and enthusiastic enough to give his life to this wonderful opportunity. To such a man Dr. Dye says in the letter just received, "Would you practice your chosen profession? Why not do so, then, where but for you they will have no relief from their many ailments; where by the very skill of your splendid equipment as a physician you may be able to open a great region now in darkness and sin to the glorious gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; where you may confound the witch doctor, the best they have in the medical art, and overthrow his rule and sway over their lives? Surely, here is an opening for you. Last year the medical missionary at Bolenge, Dr. W. Charles Widdowson, treated over 10,000 patients. Could you get such a practice at home. There, in the treating of their ailments, you get the inestimable opportunity of representing the Great Physician and offering the balm of his healing for their sin-sick souls. You can be the pioneer of the great new station that Northern California is building in this memorable Centennial year." To such an appeal as this there should be immediate response. It is no light task, but it is a glorious opportunity for a life to be put at the service of Christ in a way which will lay the foundations for Christianity and the higher civilization for centuries to come.

As we approach the Adult Bible Class Day, March 28, the report of W. C. Pearce, International Superintendent of Adult Bible class work, is especially interesting. He shows that the Disciples report an enrollment of 15,304 adult classes, standing second in the list with the M. E. church first with 20,117 classes and the Baptist third with 10,591 classes. For the past quarter the Disciples have organized nearly twice as many classes as any other religious body, reporting 245 against their nearest rival, the Methodist Episcopal church, which reports 137. Mr. Marion Stevenson our National Superintendent of Bible School work believes that the Disciples may rank first shortly in this important work.

The Biblical Recorder, a Baptist newspaper published in North Carolina, recently contained an editorial with a drastic expose of plagiarism in Herbert Moninger's Teacher Training volume. "It appears," the editor says, "that the little book is a piece of bold plagiarism, copying without credit the Normal Lessons of Hurlbut, using outlines, diagrams, quotations, slightly changed sentences and paragraphs, etc. Whereat we infer that if Mr. Moninger has not made himself liable to prosecution by the publishers of the earlier work, at least his reputation for originality and honesty has been seriously and justly impaired."

It will be a source of much satisfaction to Mr. Moninger's host of friends among the Disciples to read an editorial explanation in the same paper a month later than the above appeared. The following is the revised statement:

"We have learned, however, that Mr. Moninger while preparing his book, for which in the preface he does not claim originality, was teaching a class in Hurlbut's 'Outline'—a booklet which he has used with many classes and knows by heart. Similarity between the two books we would therefore say in justice to Mr. Moninger, can be accounted for by a somewhat similar use of the material usually covered in such courses and by a similarity of expression which naturally comes to one who is a close student of another."

Our reason for giving the Biblical Recorder's explanation is that it may serve to settle the gossip that has been going the rounds of many circles in our own brotherhood.

In the efforts of the city of Toronto to raise $500,000 per year for missions, the Baptist churches a year ago assumed $50,000 of the total. They had given $23,225 the year before. Not only have they raised and paid into the treasury the $50,000 they undertook, but over $5,000 in addition, thus making an increase in a single year of 137 per cent and bringing up their average giving to missions to about $8.00 per member. The Laymen's Missionary Movement is largely responsible for this great increase.

The Summer School of Theology will be held at Oxford in the month of September. This enterprise has attracted large notice during recent years. It is supported by the Hibbert trustees, and among the lectures already announced for the coming season are Dr. J. E. Carpenter, Professor Driver, Dr. P. H. Wicksteed, Professor Lake, Dr. G. B. Gray, and others. The program is under the general direction of Dr. J. E. Carpenter, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford.

An Evening in the Billy Sunday Revival

AN ACCOUNT OF A SINGLE EVENING SERVICE IN THE GREAT SUNDAY REVIVAL IN SPRINGFIELD. BILLY SUNDAY NOT JUST AN INDIVIDUAL BUT AN ORGANIZATION

By Charles Clayton Morrison

I have been loking forward to my third attendance upon the Sunday Revival in Springfield with especial interest, because at this time the organization would be in action in the real business of getting converts. Mr. Sunday was in Springfield over two weeks before he extended an invitation. He began this feature at the great children's meeting on a Saturday, with an attendance of over four thousand. He had close to four hundred converts among the children at this service. From that point on he has been bearing down hard on the wills of stubborn church members who refuse to go into the congregation to "work." His style of speech has undergone a change. His speech is more chaste, though not wholly free from slang, and there is a vein of tenderness in his appeal, though it is yet, in the main, heroic.

An Easy Human Informality.

The meeting starts off like a picnic. There is not the slightest formality. People had been coming for an hour and a half before I arrived. The huge barn-like tabernacle was full at 7:30 o'clock save for the seats that were reserved for privileged persons. The Elks lodge and the Woodmen had large reservations that night. Regularly a large section is kept for working women and clerks, who are unable to come early and camp. Likewise the doctors have a section and the deaf. Seats in the latter section are fitted with acousticon attachments. I got in with the deaf people, but was spied by one of the ministers who made me sit in the ministers' row on the platform.

I say it was like going into a picnic crowd. There was a gladness and freedom about everybody. It didn't seem a bit like church. Everybody was talking and laughing and waiting for "Billy" to come.

The boys on the front seats (the front seats are reserved for boys) kept close watch on the door where Mr. Sunday usually enters, and when they espied the shiny peak of his little cap and the fur collar of his great coat their applause was the signal for the eight thousand people to clap their hands and wave their handkerchiefs. This is the way the Evangelist is welcomed every night.

Applause at the Pull of the Trigger.

The crowd is ready to applaud at the slightest pretext. They do not say "amen" so much as we would expect. They clap their hands. I am not sure that I know why this is unless it is because of the unconventional character of Mr. Sunday's speech. He does not use the cant expressions much. He talks about religion in a wonderfully concrete and vital way and frames the truth in such secular style that "amens" seem hardly to fit.

Mr. Fischer announced a song simultaneously with Mr. Sunday's appearance. At the end of the first verse Mr. Gill (one of the Sunday functionaries) shouted out, "Engineer Burns is wanted at the round-house!" By the time the song was finished he announced that Dr. ——— was wanted at 1039 Spring Street. Every thing is done to make the meetings homey and informal. There is no noise save that the voices make. Compressed shavings are spread over the hard dirt floor. The improvised benches are really very comfortable with a much wider board used for the back than is usually selected for such temporary purposes.

Dignitaries are Especially Welcomed.

Just a little commotion was added to the minister's group on the platform, when the omnipresent Mr. Gill informed us that Mayor Reece was in the house. This would be his first appearance at the meetings, and while dignitaries higher up than he had been there (Governor Deneen attended the men's meeting on Sunday afternoon, I think), yet this man Reece would be sure to hear something pertinent to his duties as Mayor if he were in the house, and it would be well to have him on the platform where he could be seen of men. He didn't come up, however.

Novel Variations in the Singing.

Mr. Fischer had trouble getting the people to sing that night. He tried the choir and the congregation on one song for an unconscionably long time, finally giving it up and choosing

"Shall We Gather at the River?"

The six hundred in the choir sang it and the seventy-five hundred in the congregation sang it. Then the crowd of two hundred boys on the front seats were told to stand up in their chairs and face the people and sing it. They brought the house down in applause. Then all the mothers over forty years of age sang it. How tremulous and pensive their voices sounded!

"Shall we gather at the river?
Where bright angel feet have trod;
Where the crystal stream forever,
Flows down from the throne of God?"

I thought the climax had been reached. But Mr. Fischer asked the Elks to sing the chorus. And they made the rafters vibrate.

"Yes we'll gather at the river,
The beautiful, the beautiful river,
Gather with the Saints at the river
That flows by the throne of God."

You should have heard the applause the Elks received.

Out of Town People as Guests.

Mr. Fischer asked everybody to stand while President Hieronymus, of Eureka college led in prayer. Mr. Hieronymus was in town, one of a considerable number of visiting preachers and educators, studying Mr. Sunday's methods. Men come from great distances and pay room-rent and board to discover, if they can, the secret of this man's power over the people. I had a chat with Matthew Small, one of our well known evangelists, who is spending ten days studying Billy's devices. I was much interested in his characterization of Mr. Sunday as a cross between Scoville and Sam Jones! He thinks there are certain points our Disciple evangelists will do well to adopt from Mr. Sunday and hopes soon to see our men holding union meetings.

After the college president's prayer the evangelist took the reins himself. Up to this point Mr. Fischer, the song director, had been in charge and the preacher had been screwing around on his little kitchen chair on the platform.

Evangelist Not Wholly Recovered From Sprain.

Mr. Sunday was a little lame yet from his sprained ankle. He had laid aside the crutches he used on my former visits. He seemed worn out. He rubbed his face violently and seemed a bit hesitant in his talk. He buried his face in his hands once and declared to the preachers that he "didn't see how he could stand it." His voice was hoarse at first and feather-edged, but when he got into his sermon later on it was ringing and clear. He hadn't begun his sermon yet.

He announced that over two thousand people had met in houses and churches that morning for prayer. Then he said a word of welcome to the lodges. The lodge is a good thing. Its fellowship is good. When you're sick it takes care of you, when you die it gets the best casket the undertaker can provide and it goes with you to the grave. But that is where the lodge stops. It cannot go farther. From that point on you must go alone. "Now I will go with you just as far as you can go, brothers," he said, "but I want some one who will stay with me when you quit; and there's no one but Christ who will do that. He goes with me beyond the grave, where no lodge can go."

BILLY SUNDAY IN ACTION.

A Popular Song Beautifully Sung.

After this came the sermon. I was glad when I heard the text, "Behold I stand at the door and knock." He had been castigating congregation, evidently, as it was sung on my former visits,too. The voices are beautiful each in its own right, and their blending and phrasing and shading in this trio made a tender and stirring appeal. I never heard the song before and can recall only the first two lines,

"When we cross the valley
There need be no shadows."

Sunday's Sermon a Challenge to Your Honor.

After this came the sermon. I was glad when I heard the tevt, "Behold I stand at the door and knock." He had been costigating the church members, I had been told, during several preceding nights for their inertia when he bade them do personal work in the congregation. I feared that he might be continuing that tonight and I had come down from Chicago to hear him preach to the unconverted. Well, he preached to the unconverted with a vengeance. It was one of the most drastic appeals (is that a paradox?) I ever heard.

It was a challenge.

I like that quality in Billy Sunday; he appeals to your sense of honor. So far as his sermon goes there is no wheedling, no coaxing, no tricking of the emotions. He shows you the big work to be done as he sees it; he shows you what has been done for you and he puts it "up to you." Here are some paragraphs from his sermon. The picture on this page may help to make the atmosphere in which to read his words. He doesn't take off his coat in the services for men and women; I think that gesture is made only at his men's meetings. But his bodily reënforcement of his words is no less emphatic. He preaches with his fists and his legs. The perspiration rolls down his face in streams. His collar looks like a dish cloth within ten minutes after he begins to preach. But here are some of his words:

Jesus Christ is Center.

"You can preach Buddhism without old Buddha; you can preach Mohammedism without old Mohammed; you can preach Confucianism without old Confucius; you can preach Zoroastrianism without old Zoroaster. No matter what kind of a man Confucius, or Mohammed, or Buddah might have been, you will find a line of teaching for every devotee to follow, no matter what the individual might have been; but not so with Jesus.

Jesus Christ is the center, the circumference and the nucleus of the Bible. You can't preach Christianity without Jesus Christ. You can preach Buddhism without Buddha and you can preach Mohammedism without Mohammed, but you can't preach Christianity without Jesus Christ. So a Unitarian isn't a Christian. A Unitarian isn't even in the Kingdom of God. He can't get in. Somebody says: "Why, Mr. Sunday, Ralph Waldo Emerson was a Unitarian." That doesn't make any difference. God will damn him just as quickly as he will a hobo. What does God care about Ralph Waldo Emerson?"

God's Love So Deep.

When I quit playing ball, the sudden change from outdoor, active athletic life to an indoor, office life nearly killed me, and I was compelled to quit the Y. M. C. A. I went to Lake Geneva to the Y. M. C. A. camp there, to build up and recuperate. One day, when I became convalescent, I strolled out in the beautiful August sun, walked out on the pier, stood there with a company of my friends. We looked down into the clear blue waters of Lake Geneva and away down I saw a pebble held in the embrace of a ray of sunlight, and I said to my friends: "Let's go in bathing." They said: "Let's do it." We hurried back, changed our clothing, and with bathing suits on we walked again on the pier, I stood and looked and still away down I could see the pebble, or whatever it was, held in the embrace of a ray of sunlight, and I said to my friend, John Hansel: "I'll dive and get it." He said: "No, it's too deep." I said: "I used to be a good diver when I was a boy in Iowa. I can get it." He said: "It's too deep. When the sun is at the right angle you can see something brilliant away down in the water. Lots of people have tried to get it."

I said: "I'll try and get it anyway." So I got ready, I shot down, down, down, down I went. The water roared above my head. I plunged on and with eyes open and hands far outstretched deeper down I plunged, and I felt the pressure of the water increasing with the ratio of the depth. I plunged again and the water chilled me until I could feel my teeth chattering with the cold and I said: "But I will get it now." I felt my breath getting shorter and I said: "Once more, if I fail, I fail," and I plunged down and reached out with eyes open and hands outstretched and I whirled and shot out of the water. Just as my head came above John said: "Billy, did you get it?" "Nope, too deep."

And I've heard people tell about God's love, and they could not fathom it. Twenty years ago in Chicago, one dark, stormy night, I stood on the bank and said: "I will fathom it," and by faith I plunged in and went down, down, down. But, gentlemen, it's too deep. I have never touched the depths of God's love.

God in the Spare Room.

Some have let Him in and have shut Him up in the spare room. Did you ever see a spare room? Have you one in your home? Did you ever sleep in one? Were you ever entertained in a spare room? It's usually the northwest corner room and they keep it for the preachers and evangelists. It's enough to give a man pneumonia to look into a spare room. I'd as lief crawl in between two cakes of ice as to crawl between the sheets of a bed in a spare room. We had one in the house on the farm where I lived out in Iowa. It was a little room, so small that you had to back out of it to turn around. It was the only room in the house that had carpet on the floor. It had a little patch of green carpet and it was also the only room in the house that had paper on the wall. It had paper on it that had a little border about that wide, and the figures in the wall paper and the figures in the carpet matched. There were polliwogs, lizards, alligators and snakes. It was the only room in the house that could boast of a piece of upholstered furniture, and that was an old horse-hair lounge that was as slick as a toboggan slide. It had done time for generations and the springs were broken and the intestines were falling out of it. My grandfather made the bed, and he made the laths. The bed was made of black walnut and on the top were great round balls and each post looked like Atlas holding up the world. It had no springs or slats. It had pegs in the rails and we used to string ropes across. It always had a spookish appearance to me. Whenever a stranger came to our house he always had the honor of sleeping in the spare room. He had my sympathy. They never opened the doors or the windows of the spare room except when they wanted to air it or keep it from mildewing. I wouldn't have slept in that spare room if they would have given me the farm.

So, some have let Jesus in but they have locked Him up in the spare room. They have kept Him there so long he is chilled. What little life He had is nearly gone. Go and rap on the door of the spare room and say: "Jesus, are you in there?" And you will hear his voice faintly say: "Yes, but you have nearly chilled me to death." You have given your parlor to hell and have kept Jesus locked up while you turn your children over to the devil. Go open the door and call Him out. He will come.

I thank God some people are opening the door and letting Jesus out of the spare room. Go home and let Him out. Bring Him down and let him sit with you in the family circle. Say to Him: "Jesus, we are going to talk about you and of your wanderings. Will you kneel with us and pray? Sit right down here, Jesus. My husband is a business man, a banker, a merchant, his scales are a little shy, but he is going to change them today." Just lock arms with Him and he will go with you and see that you give 36 inches in every yard and 16 ounces in every pound. Get Him out of the spare room and let him get at your heart. He says: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock."

After the sermon came the invitation. I was irreverent enough to look about me while Mr. Sunday was saying the prayer after his sermon. The organization was perfect. Mr. Ackley was on the piano stool a moment after Mr. Sunday said "let us pray!" Mr. Butler and Mr. Gill were stationed each at one end of the front benches to remove the boys. Mr. Fischer found his way quietly to the platform while the prayer was going on. When the prayer was done everybody was ready. The song began softly and Mr. Sunday commanded all the choir people to go out into the crowd and do personal work. A fifth of them, perhaps, left their seats. The evangelist looked angrily and spoke to them appropriately to his mood. A few more went. The pastors all went out into the throng. The whole mass was in motion except the almost solid bank of over four hundred singers on the platform. Young women came up leading little children. A little girl brought her father to grasp the hand of the preacher. All the converts were seated on the front benches, according to the custom that we Disciples are familiar with. About fifty persons came to the front, probably thirty of them were children, making a total of 817 conversions to date with the invitations only just begun and the meeting to continue three weeks longer.

Mr. Sunday took the confession of all in unison. He spoke these words and they were repeated by the converts in concert:

> "I accept Jesus Christ as my personal Saviour;
> I turn from every known sin;
> God be merciful to me a sinner!"

The secretaries then gave cards to all those who had come forward, urging each one to sign stating his determination to live a Christian life, and giving his denominational preference. Not all who come forward sign the cards, I am told. The invitation to which they respond is somewhat ambiguous. At the men's meeting, the Sunday before, the evangelist asked all who "believed it was a manly thing to be a Christian to come forward." One hundred and eighty did so. But not all of them signed cards. I could wish that Mr. Sunday made more of the church in giving his invitation. He is "sound" on the church in his preaching, but does not make church membership explicit enough as an element in his invitation. But here I am arguing again, and I have promised to "save up" my own opinions until the meeting is over.

I wish I could have taken down the prayer Mr. Sunday offered at the close of the invitation. He prayed God to bless everybody; and he named everybody. Beginning with the state officials in the capitol, the county officials in the court house, the bankers, lawyers, doctors, plasterers, brickmasons, carpenters, ditch diggers, train despatchers, conductors, engineers, section workers, laundry-workers, watch makers, clerks, stenographers—well, I'm run out, but Sunday wasn't—he asked the Lord to bless them and convert them all. His prayer was almost a text book on sociology.

And then the meeting was over. I went to the Chicago sleeper standing on the tracks and tried to write about it. But my power of analysis was gone. I felt that I had been caught up into a great enterprise of the spirit. My will was melted into the organized will of the godly people of Springfield who are striving to cleanse their city of its corruption. I didn't want to write. I wanted to stay and help.

Side Lights On Serious Problems

AS SEEN FROM A PASTOR'S STUDY.

Practical Atheism

During these recent days something black and hideous has been hovering over and about the study until all but a ray of light has been shut out. That something was the sable-robed messenger which we call "the angel of Death." He was without but he seemed determined to come within. It was his purpose to carry away with him our darling baby boy. For twelve long days and longer nights this black thing which ever was close at hand grinned at us as if to mock our efforts to drive him away. We were fighting him with trained nurses, skilled physicians and specialists; still he lingered and seemed to be coming ever nearer. At last when he seemed to be taking hold of the feeble life with his bony hands, with all of the boldness of desperate souls we threw ourselves in the abandonment of faith through prayer upon the mercy of God, and—strange as it may appear—the ugly thing vanished and the child is with us still.

Life Deepened Through Suffering.

Such an experience does not leave one the same. Life has been deepened, love has been strengthened and faith has been emboldened. And in this particular instance, with the lifting of the sombre wings, some side lights on a serious problem have come into the study. This problem expresses itself in the form of a paradox—indeed it is just this very paradox that makes the problem so serious—which we might summarize in this phrase "the problem of an atheistic faith." Or to put it more nearly in the form in which it is found in the every day lives of Christians we would say it is the paradox of a theoretical belief and a practical atheism.

We feel that this is a serious problem because it lies at the very base of our philosophy of God; it is underneath our theological thinking; and it is ever present in our practical living. This religious question of faith and atheism—whether men are to trust in the visible forces of the world or in the invisible God—is a fundamental question. And it is so serious because most Christians, with a sort of paradoxical dualism, try to have faith in both visible force and invisible God, and end in trusting neither completely. But let us be a little more explicit as to what we mean by this problem.

Most every one who calls himself a Christian professes to believe the words of the New Testament. We therefore claim to believe that Jesus' words, "all things are possible to him that believeth," "whatsoever ye ask believing, ye shall receive," "if ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you," are true. We give a passing intellectual assent to these words, but in the face of some practical question, or in the midst of such hours as those through which the pastor has so recently passed, do we not either forget them or put them aside? There are natural laws all about us—laws of light, heat, electricity, drugs, health and disease; certain world forces—and in the presence of these powers, do we not either cringe before them, or trust in them, at the crisis hour, rather than in the Being who is back of them and whose love and justice is far above them? Are not most of us theoretical believers but practical are we try to dodge the question by relegating those words to the apostolic age and saying that they applied only to the Disciples of that time.

The Neglected Part of the Great Commission.

The pastor has just been reading the last chapter of the supposedly oldest of the gospels—the gospel of Mark. And as he read he recalled hearing many sermons preached from the sixteenth verse of that chapter, "Go ye . . . He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned," but he did not remember ever hearing a sermon preached on the seventeenth verse. Now without going into the question of the authenticity of these latter verses of Mark, may we not ask why it is that we have shunned the words "and these signs shall accompany them that believe; . . . they shall lay their hands on the sick and they shall recover," when at the same time we have been so insistent upon those words concerning baptism? We have actually heard some contend that the seventeenth verse refers only to the apostles, but the grammatical construction is clear as to that, and nothing but the strongest presupposition can take those words out of their connection and twist them thus. Why do we shun them, or try to explain them away—is it not because of our atheism, which finds no practical place for God in those experiences of our day? Clearly the great commission according to Mark—whether it be the correct ending to the gospel or not—has reference to those that shall believe, and why should we not claim the promise.

The Heresy of Ignoring God.

We hear much in our day about destructive criticism, infidelity, heretics, etc., and perhaps it is well to be cautious in regard to those things; but we hear so little of the atheism of the average orthodox Christian. There is great fear in the ranks if some one comes along and declares some passage of scripture to be an interpolation, but no panic arises when by a priori reasoning and false pre-suppositions passages of scripture are twisted out of their context and limited in their scope to a particular time or class when to do so means the greatest violence to them. We hear much of the infidelity of the heretic, but what shall we say of the atheism of the orthodox?

Do we not all need to return to the New Testament standard of faith, prayer and reliance upon the power of God? Is there any reason why there should not be the practice of the laying on of hands, the anointing with oil and praying with the sick by the elders of the church? Is there not a place in this twentieth century for a first century church not alone as to ordinances but also as to faith and prayer and practice? To the pastor these needs are very apparent; and the materialism in which the average believer is encased is very serious to faith. May God help us to deliver ourselves from our practical atheism!

The Convention's Answer to the Bitter Cry of the Slums of Pittsburg

By Harris R. Cooley

The face of our Brotherhood is set toward the Centennial Convention city, where we are to consider the struggles, victories and changes which a hundred years have brought. This city itself is typical of much that is highest and lowest in our social life and a study of it is of deepest interest. A human survey of Pittsburg has recently been made, occupying months of painstaking, searching toil given by expert experienced investigators. In the current numbers of Charities and the Commons are being published the result of this careful survey, presenting social and industrial elevations and depressions. Pittsburg is like the cities of its kind, with its frenzied industries and fabulous wealth; with its squalor, wretchedness, poverty and misery.

Children Damned into the World.

In the slums of this, as of other great cities, the lives of children are sacrificed with as much abandonment and cruelty as in the worship of Molech or by the bloody Herod. One of the settlement workers writes, "Not one child in ten comes to us from the river-bottom section without a blood or skin disease, usually of long standing. Not one out of ten comes to us physically up to the normal for his or her age. Worse than that, few of them are up to the mental standard, and an increasing percentage are imbecile." Here is where the children, as Josiah Strong says, "are damned into the world rather than born into it." Another worker describes conditions which she found: "Rookeries perched on the hillsides were swarming with men, women and children, entire families living in one room and accommodating 'boarders' in a corner thereof. Cellar rooms were the abiding places of other families. Courts and alleys fouled by bad drainage and piles of rubbish were playgrounds for rickety, pale-faced grimy children."

The slums are the breeding places of vice, drunkenness, crime and disease. Diphtheria, scarlet fever, typhoid, tuberculosis, are needlessly devouring the lives of these unfortunate chilren of men. On the other hand, fabulous wealth and luxury are sapping the foundations of right living. Pittsburg has furnished examples of plutocratic degeneracy. More than thirty million dollars worth of real estate in the congested region is held by those who live abroad on their inherited fortunes. The fabulous, unearned incomes must work the greatest injustice to the weakest of the toilers. If some men live in great luxury without working, some other men, women and children must work in great misery without living. This is a law as fundamental as the law of gravitation.

Sufferings of the Unprivileged.

The conditions of the great numbers of disinherited, unprivileged workers is practically the same in all the centers of trade and industry. One-tenth of our American families hold more of the national wealth than the remaining nine-tenths. There are approximately a million American children under fourteen years of age who are day laborers. In the civilized world, tuberculosis, which is a curable, social disease, claims each year a million deaths. Eleven New York blocks have a density of twelve hundred per acre. "This means that if the whole of little Delaware were similarly crowded, it would contain the entire population of the world, white, black, yellow and red." This greatest city of our land has three hundred and fifty thousand inside bedrooms, without sunlight or fresh air.

Jesus Christ has identified Himself with each individual of the multitudes of these victims of poverty and wretchedness; with every slum child, every girl ruined, every wasting consumptive, every victim of social vice, every outcast criminal. He says, "I was hungry and ye gave me no meat, naked and ye clothed me not; I was sick and in prison and ye visited me not. Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the these least, ye did it not to me." In His own account of the judgment of men, He makes this the final test of religion. This social service is not something which can be added to a true religious life, it is the center and heart of the religion of Jesus.

Where Christ is Found.

In his "Parable," Lowell represents Christ as coming to earth to see how men believe in Him. He found needless wretchedness and poverty along with the temples built in His name. At His reproof, his followers said:

"O Lord and Master, not ours the guilt,
We build but as our fathers built."

Then Christ sought out an artisan,
A low-browed, stunted, haggard man,
And a motherless girl, whose fingers thin
Pushed from her faintly want and sin.

These set he in the midst of them,
And as they drew back their garment-hem,
For fear of defilement, "Lo, here," said he,
"The images ye have made of me."

It cannot be possible that our great convention is going to Pittsburg only to recount the wonderful achievements of the century and "passing by on the other side" from suffering human need, to return home. Suppose Alexander Campbell, with his great heart and mind, should come again to Pittsburg after a hundred years. Would he be blind to the thin, bloodless hands of the children, or deaf to the helpless cry of the outcast? Would he not feel the vital social and industrial problems of today? Would he not strive to meet them as he met the problems of his day? His voice seems to say to the gathering multitudes, "Be ye followers of me as I also am of the Christ. Follow what I followed. As I applied religion to the questions of my day, so you, in the spirit of Christ, apply His teachings to the present day conditions."

Shall the Church Lead in Social Service?

Jesus had compassion upon the multitude because they had nothing to eat. In the early dawn on the sea of Galilee, the risen Lord spoke to the tired toilers of the night, and his question was not concerning their souls, but he said, "Children, have ye aught to eat?" In the final judgment He declared that His followers would be tested by their personal ministry to the poor, the hungry, the outcast, the prisoner.

Can it be that His church is not to lead in the growth of the social feeling and conscience? Can it be that His church is to pass by on the other side, saying that the question of the opportunity for every man and woman to earn an honest, decent livelihood is not a religious one? Can it be that His church is to deal with this great complex problem superficially, narrowly, making bitter war on one or two of the effects of the slums and not going deeply into the fundamental questions of justice and right, which involve the future of our Christianity and of our civilization?

There come to us the faith and hope that the followers of Jesus Christ will make the coming century more glorious than the past in the blessing and ministry to the common life. In this humble service, how high, how united, how like the Master His church will grow. It will hold fast to the full development of the individual into His likeness. It will add to this mission the social service to the humblest, weakest outcast; thus making its own life full and complete.

OUR READERS' OPINIONS

An Appreciation

That the last number of the Christian Century is "up-to-date" along evangelistic lines is plainly evidenced by the two live editorial articles on "Billy Sunday" and "Charles Reign Scoville." There are few themes more calculated to interest the average reader of a religious journal than just this with which these graphic articles deal. The record of leaders like these, in the field of evangelism should be followed with keenest zest by every Christian.

W. P. Keeler.

Chicago, March 13.

Chicago Secretary Criticized

Editor Christian Century:—I have been much interested in reading in your issues of this week and last week the accounts by Mr. O. F. Jordan of the visit of some ministers of your denomination to a Christian Science testimony meeting at Third Church of Christ, Scientist, in this city recently.

Mr. Jordan in commenting on the appearance of the congregation, said: "The queer faces and peculiar contour of head disclosed abnormality on every hand, though often coupled with more than ordinary intelligence. They were recruited from the class of hysterical Americans who have been worn out in city excitement or have fallen behind by reason of hereditary peculiarities." Further on he says: "Probably very few in the audience were never members of any other church. . . It (Christian Science) only takes ordinary Christians who have been trained by the older theology," etc., etc. Following out this line of argument, it must naturally be concluded that if these people are as "queer" and "abnormal" in appearance as Mr. Jordan seems to think, and if practically all of them came out of the older churches as he asserts, then their "queer" and "abnormal" appearance must be chargeable to their orthodox Christian parentage and to their early theological training rather than to their comparatively recent association with Christian Science. However that may be, it is generally admitted that the average Christian Science congregation will compare very favorably in appearance with congregations of other churches.

Regarding Mr. Jordan's comments on the testimonies which he heard and of which he makes the complaint that they were not "miraculous," it may be said that other people visiting these meetings for the first time often complain that the testimonies of healing are so wonderful as to be almost beyond their power of comprehension and they prefer to hear the simpler statements of the application of Christian Science to every-day affairs. It seems difficult to satisfy all. However, it is a fact that the character of the testimonies given at these meetings varies from week to week, and if Mr. Jordan continues in his attendance he is quite sure to hear "miraculous" testimonies. Allowing for the unimportant, irrelevant, or unenlightened testimonies which are sometimes given in these meetings, there still remains a great abundance of interesting and convincing testimony of reliable witnesses to the power of God to heal disease and sin. Therefore Mr. Jordan's conclusion that Christian Science is good only for the temporary encouragement of "incurables" and for the treatment of "simple illnesses" for which the doctor would not give remedies is not justified by the facts.

I have no doubt that Mr. Jordan's observations were based upon what appeared to him to be the facts in the case and that his desire was to present the subject fairly to your readers. I would like, therefore, to thank him for the great tribute he paid to Christian Science in his frank admission of what it is accomplishing in the way of overcoming fear and hate.

coming fear and hate. Very truly yours,

Light Dispels Fog

A straight line of light running through a few passages of scripture will dispel the "fog" and harmonize Gates, Spencer and Moore. Read Acts 2:23-38, 22:16; Col. 1:13; I Pet. 3:21.

The person dead in trespasses and sins is quickened into a new life by faith (1 Jno. 5:1). Then "the Christian nature, created by faith and repentance, makes a formal confession of it" in baptism calling upon the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. Thus baptism doth now save those whom the Father "hath delivered from the power of darkness and hath translated in the kingdom of God's dear Son, in which kingdom there is realized the assurance of forgiveness and the gift of the Holy Spirit which sheds abroad the love of God in our hearts. Thus baptism is "the symbolic act by which personal relationship to God passes into social relationship to the Christian brotherhood and humanity—by which faith completes itself in fellowship."

The giving of the true meaning to the phrase "in the name" in Acts 2:38 as seen in its evident allusion to verse 21, will remove the greatest hindrance to an agreement between Baptists and Disciples upon this famous passage. It is accepted by them when thus presented, as I have found in many instances and gives baptism its place and value as we have rightly taught. We must not arouse prejudice and perpetuate disunity by cramped interpretations.

The Best From the Poorest

That is surely a marvelous process, by means of which the poorest quality of material is transformed into the best quality of product. This is an achievement made possible by the orphanage work in heathen lands.

The children in our mission orphanages are those who would have had, in the nature of things, the poorest possible chance for life—if, indeed, they had been spared to live at all. Many of them were famine children—poor mites rescued just before starvation had completed its horrible work. "Better that they should have died," the cold-blooded economist might have argued. But the event has not so proven. Nursed back to health of body and of mind, they have grown into the promise of strong Christian manhood and womanhood. It was well that they lived.

Those who were not waifs of the famine period came from the homes of the very poor, and were given up to the missionaries because their relatives were unable to care for them. One shudders to think what the lives of these little ones would have been, had they not been rescued by Christian benevolence.

But the children thus rescued have not been kept from lives of evil merely. They are coming to be the finest product of Christianity in heathen lands. A cultured woman who visited our orphanages in India gave this as her testimony: "Before I saw what is being done there I believed that character is ninety-five per cent heredity and five per cent training. Now I believe it is five per cent heredity and ninety-five per cent training." Surely this is a wonderful tribute.

To establish a Christian native home on heathen soil is one of the great triumphs of Christianity. The presence of one such home is more convincing to the heathen mind than scores of books on apologetics. The young men and the young women who have been trained in our orphanages are going out as they complete their education, to build Christian homes, and at the same time to be teachers and preachers of righteousness. What a pity that we cannot number these trained native Christians by the thousands instead of by the hundreds.

On Easter Sunday our Sunday-schools, Junior Endeavor Societies and mission bands will make their annual offering for orphanage work the world over. Churches may well afford to encourage this work, which is furnishing Christian homes and native Christian leadership to the dark lands of the earth.

Looks Like Thirty Cents

The proposition to give $100,000, if the friends of Bethany College will raise $400,000 looks just like thirty cents; that is, if the $400,000 should be divided so that every Disciple of Christ may take part in this great contribution to the endowment of the college, it would be about thirty cents, or perhaps a little less, per member. Already I am beginning to hear from the friends of the college. The first man to respond to this great proposition was the Honorable Champ Clark, leader of the Democrats in the House of Representatives at Washington. His letter was short but to the point. He says: "Put me down $100 for the Bethany Endowment Fund." That letter had the true ring. I do not care for long letters. Send the cash or a negotiable note bearing interest from date. That will do just as well to secure the $100,000 from my friend, if the note is negotiable at the bank. You need not pay until it is convenient, if you prefer to take that course. How many will duplicate the Honorable Champ Clark's sum? How many will give a thousand dollars? How many five hundred? How many twenty-five dollars? Make your propositions in blocks and say that you will be one of this block. The smaller sums are coming in rapidly, but we must have some larger sums in order to meet the deficiency which is sure to exist through neglect or want of interest of those who are always waiting for others to do what they ought to do themselves. The proposition is awaking great enthusiasm, but the time is short, and every friend of the college must get busy, in order to make it a success. In order that every one may have a specific plan before him in reference to this great matter, I submit the following blocks, and believe that it is a perfectly reasonable division of the amount that should be raised.

No. of persons	Am't from each	Total
5	$10,000.00	$50,000.00
10	5,000.00	50,000.00
20	2,500.00	50,000.00
50	1,000.00	50,000.00
100	500.00	50,000.00
200	250.00	50,000.00
500	100.00	50,000.00
1000	50.00	50,000.00
2000	25.00	50,000.00
5000	10.00	50,000.00
50000	1.00	50,000.00
		$550,000.00

It will be seen that the sum of this estimate exceeds the amount necessary to be raised by $155,000.00, but this overplus is necessary to meet certain failures that might probably acrue in filling up any of the blocks indicated. Undoubtedly this scheme ought to raise $400,000.00, and this will give us $100,000.00 from my friend, who is really very anxious to meet his promise if the $400,000.00 are raised. Let every one select one of these blocks and let me know at once what he will do.

THE BOOK WORLD

The Gospel according to Saint Mark, by Rev. S. W. Green, M. A., New York: Fleming H. Revell Company. Pp. 242. $.75 net.

This is the second volume in the Westminster New Testament, edited by Professor Garvie of New College, London. There is an introduction discussing the general characteristics of Mark and the problems connected with its relation to Matthew and Luke. The author gives a fair statement of the critical questions involved. Then follows a compact and helpful commentary upon the text of the gospel. The form of the book is convenient even for pocket use, and the standpoint and accuracy of the work make it a valuable help for New Testament study.

Life in the Word, by Philip Mauro. New York: Fleming H. Revell Company, 1909. Pp. 110. $.50 net.

The author of this work attempts to defend, mainly on the lines of the most conservative theology, the inspiration and authority of the Bible. The book is an illustration of that type of apologetic which was once thought to be necessary in defense of the Scriptures but which has been largely displaced by more reasonable and defensible views. No writer who attempts to make the Bible a final authority on scientific and historical questions, as this one does, can gain much of a hearing from a generation that has studied these questions with care. The fault of such a book as this is that in its effort to prove the Bible a divine book by impossible and arbitrary means, it misses the most evident and convincing proofs of its nature as the record of God's revelation to men and as sufficient for instruction in righteousness.

Jerusalem in Bible Times, by Lewis B. Paton, Ph. D. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1908. Pp. 149; $1.00 net.

Dr. Paton, who is Professor of Old Testament Exegesis and Criticism in Hartford Theological Seminary, was the Director of the American School of Oriental Study and Research in Palestine during the winter of 1903-04. He is the author of the "Early History of Syria and Palestine" in Scribner's Semitic Series. During his residence in Jerusalem he was naturally deeply interested in the topography and history of the city and has gathered much of this material into the convenient little volume now issued. Of course this work is not to be compared in extent and wealth of information with George Adam Smith's two volume work on Jerusalem, issued last year. But it is a capital handbook for students who wish to make a summary study of the holy city. It is embellished with numerous photographic illustrations and contains bibliography and indexes.

The Epistle to the Hebrews, by Edgar J. Goodspeed. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1908. Pp. 124; $.50 net.

This is another of the volumes in the "Bible for Home and School," edited by Professor Shailer Mathews. It is the purpose of this series to present concise and competent comments upon the text and interpretation of biblical books. Reference was made recently to Professor Gilbert's volume on Acts. The present work, while dealing with a briefer document of the New Testament, is perhaps even more serviceable in the value of its introduction to the book and its wealth of helpful material regarding the text of the Book of Hebrews.

What the Bible Teaches, by H. C. Garvin, Eldon, Mo. Published by the Author. $1.50.

One who looks over the table of contents of this book will form but partial idea of its real character and purpose, for the list of titles contains some forty different items, including "God the Creator," "Order of Creation," "Angels," "Origin of Sin," "Anointing," "Was Jesus Free from Sin?" "Making Intercession," "Church," "Sacraments," etc. This is a group of themes such as might well belong to a treatise on systematic theology. Yet a reading of the book shows that it has a very definite purpose, quite removed from a mere general survey of the field of Christian doctrine. It is an essay on the nature and evils of sacramentalism in the Christian Church. Its central aim is to insist that religion of any sort to be valuable must seek to bring the souls of men into right relations with God, and that the Christian religion lifts this motive to the highest level of importance. Religion therefore can never consist in the performance of rites of any sort, least of all can Christianity be so degraded. It has been the bane of the church, just as it was of the synagogue that it has dignified acts of ritual to the place of essentials, and thereby has obscured the simplicity of Christianity as an effort to reproduce in human life the spirit and purpose of Jesus.

Professor Garvin reviews hastily the principles of the Hebrew religion and the constant tendency to sacramentalism in the practice of the priestly guardians of the cultus in that period. Then he gives a fairly adequate statement of the teachings of Jesus on the essentials of religion, and shows how far it was from the mind of the Master to bind on his followers a new ceremonialism with insistence upon rites. From this the thesis is developed that Jesus never commanded either baptism or the Supper. It would have been inconsistent with the vital principle of his life, and the passages on which the two institutions rest as ordinances are believed by the author to be the work of later hands. In this he has, as New Testament students know, excellent though not conclusive authority. But perhaps the most startling of Professor Garvin's contentions is to the effect that the act of baptism as practiced by John, by the disciples during the ministry of Jesus and by the apostles throughout the first age of the church was merely that of washing the body, performed by the candidate himself, as in the purification ceremonies of the Hebrew cultus, and not administered by another. When the apostles baptized their converts they did so in the same sense that Moses cleansed the people of Israel, by directing them to wash their bodies as the initial step in the new life. Here we are unable to follow the author's argument. It seems to us that the voice of the Greek verbs used in the New Testament declares insistently that baptism was an act in which the candidate was passive, though there are instances in which the middle or reflexive form may be understood.

With the basic contention of the book we are in entire agreement. Jesus came to lift religion from the plain of rites to that of character. He would therefore be the last to bind his people to a new sacramentalism by the imposition of mere forms. He did not intend to make outward acts like fasting, feet washing, baptism or the Supper tests of citizenship in the kingdom. And wherever any of these acts is given sacramental value, the essence of Christianity is missed.

Yet this is far from saying that the free use of highly symbolic observances, like baptism and the Lord's Supper, known to have been used by the Master himself, may not have a value with which the church will not lightly dispense. The Lord's Day rests upon no command either of Jesus or the apostles, yet all Christians hold it in deep reverence. The holy supper is not to be regarded as a legal demand of the Master, but as a loving request, growing out of his perception of its suggestive nature. All the more do the people of God hold it in regard, and wish to observe it, though they have almost ceased to invest it with sacramental power. So also of baptism. Even if criticism makes conclusive the fact that Jesus never commanded it as an act of obedience to himself, and that the baptismal formula is distinctly a post-apostolic gloss, the significance of baptism as an act of public declaration of discipleship hallowed by the example of the Lord, by apostolic usage and by the voice of Christian history, will continue to make it precious while it will also remove it from the legal to the spiritual plain.

Our criticism of the book is two-fold. It overstates its thesis, attempting to prove more than is either possible or necessary in its contention against sacraments. And secondly, it fails of effectiveness in its inclusion of too many topics unrelated to its purpose. But it is a stimulating book, whose reading will repay one who wishes to have his ideas stirred up by statements which compel him to think through the meaning of Christianity in a fresh manner.

A Hindu Estimate of Missionaries

The following is an extract from a recent number of the Vedic Magazine, an Indian periodical, published in Benares, the center of Mrs. Annie Besant's propaganda for the revival of Hinduism.

"One of the foremost causes of success of the missionary is his burning zeal for his religion. He believes in his message. He has left parents, his friends and his native land to spread his gospel. He has crossed the seas to attack us. He belongs to a cold country, but he chooses to live under the scorching Indian sun in order to save us from going to a hotter place after death. Young men, belonging to the richest families, have sacrificed their all in order to fight our civilization. I know persons of the most brilliant parts at Oxford—first-class scholars who have won any number of prizes and degrees—who throw up their worldly career and come out as missionaries. Our young men can have no idea of the sacrifices they undergo. They accept exile for the sake of their religion; they work day and night like coolies in a country thousands of miles from their homes. Many of them are quite young; they have not tasted any of the sweet things of life. They live solely for Christianity. They are determined, earnest men who are devoid of avarice, who know no rest in the pursuit of their aim, who never lost heart amid difficulties, and who realize that life is given to man to be spent for some great and good cause.

"Such tremendous enthusiasm can overcome many obstacles. Endowed with such enormous moral capital, a movement can go a long way, even against heavy odds. Give me such workers and I will Hinduise the world in a decade. Even falsehood can prosper for a while, if it can secure good servants. If the truth of Hindu nationality and ethics can find such doughty champions, I can show the world the spectacle of Rambella being celebrated in the streets of Buenos Ayres and erect statues to Sita in the squares of Vancouver. Give me such zeal, such steadfastness of purpose, and I shall have the Rishis honored by the banks of the Mississippi as they are revered in the basin of the Ganges. Oh! nothing is impossible of achievement for the Hindus, if they are once fired with the ideal of a Hinduised world with its center at Benares."

Could testimony more striking than this be given to the motive power which Christ exercises in inspiring His servants to speed far over sea and land?

Is it not strange that this Hindu editor should not seek more deeply for the source and inspiration of all this "sacrifice" and "tremendous enthusiasm" of which he writes, in order that he may stir up his fellow-religionists to similar endeavor for Hinduism and a Hinduised world?

These servants of the Christ come to India not primarily or chiefly to save the Indians from "a hotter place"; not "to attack our civilization" for there are many things in the Indian type of civilization that are well worthy of preservation and development under the power of Christianity; and not merely to have the Indians change one religion for another. They come rather because of the power, which is symbolized in the cross of Christ and experienced in their own lives. They would have others know His peace and His power. The love of Christ constrains them; because they judge this: "that one died for all, therefore all died; and He died for all that they who live might no longer live to themselves but to Him that for them died and rose."

How strange that any man should think of getting such power displayed amid either the philosophy of the Higher Hinduism or the idolatry and bestiality of every-day Hinduism! Philosophy cannot answer the hunger of the human heart or nourish it in a life of high endeavor as the love of God, displayed in the life of Christ, can. Even so strong and clean an indigenous religious movement as the Brahmo-Samaj is in a pitiable condition for lack of men and money to carry forward its missionary and educational work. There are various reasons given for this condition, but undoubtedly the chiefest is: the movement lacks motive power. This fact is acknowledged by some of the foremost present day leaders of the movement in Calcutta. The philosophy of the Brahmo-Samaj may in a measure satisfy the mind, but it cannot nurture the heart and charge the life with motive power which leads to a life of sacrifice and service. If this motive power is lacking in so lofty a movement as the Brahmo-Samaj what shall we say of the ordinary Hinduism as known to the millions of India?

Is it not passing strange that this Hindu writer does not recognize that in owning the possession of this Spirit by Christian missionaries he has really proclaimed the absolute supremacy of the Christ—that Incomparable One who alone is worthy to receive the devotion of India's countless millions.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

How long was Christ in the grave? Was he crucified on Thursday or Friday? If on Friday, I don't understand how he was three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. C. C. M.

North Royalton, Ohio.

Efforts have been made to show that the crucifixion of Jesus occurred on Thursday, but this has never been a satisfactory view of the matter. The expression "three days and three nights" must be construed in the usual Jewish sense, in which any part of the day reckoned for the whole. It seems reasonably certain that the crucifixion occurred on Friday.

Please explain Luke 2:25-27, where it is said that Simeon received the Holy Spirit and in the Spirit entered the temple. Reader.

Champaign, Ill.

Simeon's piety and devotion to the will of God are emphasized by the statement that the Holy Spirit was upon him. This means that he was a spiritual man. His chief interests were those of the kingdom of God. Jewish hopes at this period were high in confident expectation of the coming Messiah. Simeon shared this hope, and his single-minded devotion to the divine will and open-hearted acceptance of the leadings of the Spirit led him to believe implicitly that within his life the hopes of Israel would be realized. This was his constant frame of mind. In such a spirit he was accustomed to visit the temple, and on one of these occasions met the parents of Jesus as they were bringing the child for presentation, according to the legal customs. Seeing the child, Simeon was impressed with the truth that this was none other than the promised Messiah and Deliverer of his people, and so uttered the words of his hymn of praise.

Will you please explain John 5:4: "An angel went down at a certain season and troubled the water"? Inquirer.

The pool at which the lame man lay was apparently an intermittent pool whose waters came at certain intervals and at other times were quiet. Such is the character of the Virgin's Fountain on the east of Jerusalem at the present time. The popular tradition accounting of this phenomenon was that the waters were stirred by an angel, but this is no part of the biblical record. The reader will notice that the latter part of Verse 3 and the whole of Verse 4 are omitted from the revised text.

Why did Jesus always tell those he healed not to tell it, and then not rebuke them for doing so? H. J. M.

It was not always the case that Jesus forbade the beneficiaries of his healing power to proclaim the fact. At first indeed he seems to have encouraged them to publish the news that there was One who could heal the afflicted. Later, however, when his way began to be thronged by the curious and the hostile, he laid urgent requests upon those to whom he ministered that they should not make the matter known. It only added to the crowds already thronging him and it actually hindered the accomplishment of his work. Yet it was natural for Jesus to pardon that enthusiasm which could not resist the impulse to make known his kindness. Perhaps he hardly expected the man and woman whom he had helped to refrain from proclaiming the good news. It only shows that he felt the need of repressing, as far as possible, the popular and morbid curiosity which his works of power awakened. He wished to appeal by more definite and direct methods to the heart and conscience of the nation.

Why do Matthew and Luke give the genealogy of Joseph, if Joseph was not in fact the father of Jesus? Des Moines, Ia. Reader.

Joseph's relation to Jesus was not a point of any moment in the thought of those who set down the genealogy. It was the place of the father, foster father, or protector which counted in a family and not the mother's position. Jesus was counted, therefore, to the tribe of Judah, which was Joseph's tribe, without reference to his personal relations, rather than to his mother's tribe, which seems to have been that of Levi, as her relation to Elizabeth of that tribe would indicate. It will be seen, therefore, that the reference to Joseph has no bearing whatever upon the birth of Jesus, but only upon the question of his legal status in the nation.

In Matthew 11:19 occur the words "The Son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. But wisdom is justified of her children." Please explain this last sentence. B. W. F.

Chicago.

In the conversation of which this is a part, Jesus was speaking of the wayward and volatile character of the people. They were satisfied with nothing; they complained because John the Baptist was austere and joined in none of the common social joys of the time; they complained of Jesus because, on the contrary, he seemed to take deep interest in all the occupations and enjoyments of the people. The one they accused of being a fanatic, the other of being too little regardful of the conventions and proprieties of life. How could such people as these be suited by any one? And, yet, says Jesus, wisdom is justified by her works. The wisdom here specified is no doubt the divine wisdom. God had commissioned both John and Jesus, and the divine wisdom was justified by the work which each accomplished in spite of the frivolous comment of the people.

Can you name to me a book which furnishes in the best form a defense of the resurrection of Christ? W. M. S.

Bloomington Texas.

Probably the best work on this theme is the recently published volume on the resurrection by James Orr (Charles Scribner's Sons, 1909. $1.50 net.) The material of this volume originally appeared in the "Expositor." It covers the entire ground of the discussion in reference to the resurrection of Jesus, considering the various views which have been presented and summing up the positive conclusions in a constructive and admirable manner.

In a recent issue of the Century, in speaking of Darwin, it is said that some people, in accepting his theory of evolution, had thought it necessary to eliminate the first cause, and that Darwin himself had not been led to this conclusion. I am moved to ask if either the first cause or the want of it is thinkable? If unthinkable, can the first cause query hold any value for the religious thought of this age? J. A. E.

Indianapolis.

The statement of the article referred to relates simply to Darwin's attitude toward all theological questions. He was not concerned with the philosophical or theoretical results of his inquiries. He was only interested to ascertain the facts as nature disclosed them to him. These facts were taken by others, some of them his contemporaries and some his followers, and interpreted in various ways. Some of these interpreters, such as Huxley and Tindall, passed over from the realm of science into that of philosophy and theology and attempted to show that the facts discredited the view that creation was the work of a divine Creator, and maintaining that it was a sufficient explanation that all things had been evolved from inorganic to organic, from animal to man, without the presence of God. The unwarranted nature of these assumptions was referred to as a proof of the fact that a given set of facts may be variously interpreted, but that Darwin himself had confined his researches to the domain of pure science and had never dogmatized about the causes of things. I am not just sure what the questioner means by the "thinkable" or "unthinkable" character of the doctrine of a first cause. To most men, whether of scientific mind or not, the question regarding the origin of things is not only thinkable but imperative. The Christian view of God as the Creator, whether by instantaneous activity, as was once believed, or by gradual processes, as the doctrine of evolution teaches, is essential to any adequate explanation of the phenomena of nature. With the metaphysical inquiries regarding the first cause this department is but little concerned.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

In the Light of Death

A Boy's Quarrel.

Once I knew two boys, splendid fellows they were. Side by side they grew, played and studied till they had reached the high school. Most sympathetic were they in all their common life. All who knew them were heartened by their mingled laughter. We were proud of them. Gladly did we mark the shaping of their manly ideals. They were the joy of their homes. The mothers felt less careworn and the fathers became rested in their presence. Each was the son of both homes. Their plans, ambitions, lessons, friends, were alike to both. Their boy-souls seemed to be but one. Alas, one day they quarreled.

I know not the particular cause of their disagreement; but certainly selfishness must have gained a place in their hearts. Days grew into weeks, but still the breach was not healed. They said mean things to their companions about each other. Their enmity grew more pronounced. Each came to think he hated the other. Neither sought reconciliation. Suddenly the fairer and the stronger of the two lay dead, felled by a fever.

His erstwhile companion was prodigal with his tears and flowers and kindly words. Even in the day of his hatred death surprising, had pointed out to him the way of health and life; it lies in the highway of forgiveness.

Estrangement of Men.

Once I knew two farmers, splendid men they were. On adjoining farms for many years thriftily had they tilled their fields and garnered their harvest. Often while resting their horses did these worthy toilers lean upon their plows and hold kindly converse over the fence with each other. The peace of the quiet fields was theirs. During threshing or other extra work they would "exchange hands." Thus did they labor to their mutual advantage. When they had liberty from toil, often did they come together with their families in happy holiday enjoyment. The repeated gibe, the rollicking merriment, and the frank and hearty joking constantly indulged in testified as to their mutual appreciation.

Alas! One day they quarreled. The trouble was over the new line fence. The dispute involved but a few dollars; but in the end it cost the friendship of these two men for the rest of their days.

They did not whistle at their work as formerly. They avoided each other. When they met on the road they turned their faces away. Neighbors noticed that neither was his old care-free self. The church people noticed that the old time joy in the religious meetings had gone from them. But still each nursed in his own heart the scorpion of hatred.

One day the poorer of the two lay dead; struck suddenly to the earth by an accident.

His erstwhile friend acted the man. He gathered some of the honeysuckles and red roses from his garden and carried them to the bier of his dead enemy. Hesitatingly he said to the bereaved widow, "If in your deep sorrow I can help you in the least, I will be glad."

That day and all the rest of the days of his life this farmer heard with convicting power many preachers bearing to his conscience the message of repentance.

The dead face, the line fence, the family of his dead friend, yes, the very flocks of his neighbor's field and the blades of the grass in his meadow exhorted him again and again to use other measurements than the material, whereby to get the true values.

So even in the day of his hatred death, surprising, had pointed out to him the way of health and life; it lies in the highway of forgiveness.

Two Ministers' Alienated.

Once a decade of years ago I knew two preachers, they were splendid earnest men. They met frequently at conventions and were friends. Their ideals of the ministry were much alike. Both were warm-hearted and democratic. They loved to preach to ful houses. With a great congregation before them they were supremely happy. Necessary to their ministerial life was the sympathy and commendation of the audience. They had preserved their child souls; so that they demanded a large place in the hearts of their people. They loved, and to live, must be loved in return.

So attracted to each other were they that they kept up intimate correspondence, and at times visited each other, though they lived far apart.

In the course of time it happened that they came to be pastors in the same city, and so near to each other that their pastorates over-lapped. This was a new experience to both; for each up to this time had held pastorates in places in which there was only one church of his denomination. He was thus entitled to the first place in the affections of his people, which they ungrudgingly granted. They were not prepared to compete for the good wishes of the people. Neither had yet learned that the hearts of the common people are large enough to admit to their affections more than one preacher, even at the same time.

They did not quarrel. Their profession would not allow that. But they became envious and jealous. Secretly they harbored evil wishes for each other. When either heard the other praised he was disturbed in his happiness for a whole day.

But time is no respecter of preachers. One of the twain lay dead amid the tears of his flock.

His fellow pastor proved himself a permanent saint, though a temporary sinner.

From that day onward he read his Bible anew. When he prayed "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors," and as he read "Father forgive them for they know not what they do," he wondered how he could have so forgotten the essential spirit of the faith he was preaching from week to week as to have given jealousy so large a place in his heart.

Even in the days of his evil enemy death had pointed out to him the way of health and life; it lies in the highway of love.

Friends in Religion; Enemies in Theology.

Once I knew two church members; they both loved and hoped. Workers together were they in the various activities of the church. Long had they been in her counsels together. They were considered as two of the strongest pillars in their local zion.

An evil day came. They became arrayed on different sides of a heated controversy. Some one had spread a suspicion of unsoundness. All stopped their religious work for theological combat. The two brothers had been friends in religion, but were made enemies in theology. They could pray together and work together; but, human-like, they could not dispute together. Both came to breathe the atmosphere of discord. For the love of God they hated each other. They had not learned that religion is the business of the church, not criticism, not science, not philosophy.

Beautifully did they work together as long as they sought to save and bless; but when they began to give attention to their opinions they ruthlessly broke their friendship.

Trifling With One's Soul.

One left the church; one stayed in it. The one removed from the community to escape the sorrow of the disruption. The other never worked again with the old-time heart. He had trifled with his soul. He had enthused over that which was not worth enthusing over. Ever afterwards there was, consequently, with him, some suspicion concerning all zeal. Selfish heat puts out the fires of God.

Long after the one remaining at home had died, the one from a distance returned to visit and to pray. He stood over the grave of his religious friend, and his theological enemy. With pleasure he remembered the friendship, with deepest regret he recalled the enmity. The one gained glory with the accumulating years; the other seemed less and less worthy of God's men.

Amid the growing shadows of his declining day death had pointed out to him the way of health and life; it lies in the highway of love.

CHAPTER VIII.

Winston Comes to Silverdale.

There was warmth and brightness in the cedar-boarded general room of Silverdale Grange, and most of the company gathered there basked in it contentedly after their drive through the bitter night. Those who came from the homesteads lying farthest out had risked frost-nipped hands and feet, for when Colonel Barrington held a levee at the Grange nobody felt equal to refusing his invitation. Neither scorching heat nor utter cold might excuse compliance with the wishes of the founder of Silverdale, and it was not until Dane, the big middle-aged bachelor, had spoken very plainly, that he consented to receive his guests in time of biting frost dressed otherwise than as they would have appeared in England.

Dane was the one man in the settlement who dare remonstrate with its ruler, but it was a painful astonishment to the latter when he said in answer to one invitation, "I have never been frost-bitten, sir, and I stand the cold well, but one or two of the lads are weak in the chest, and this climate was never intended for bare-shouldered women. Hence, if I come, I shall dress myself to suit it."

Colonel Barrington stared at him for almost a minute, and then shook his head. "Have it your own way," he said. "Understand that in itself I care very little for dress, but it is only by holding fast to every traditional nicety we can prevent ourselves sinking into Western barbarism, and I am horribly afraid of the thin end of the wedge."

Dane having gained his point said nothing further, for he was one of the wise and silent men who know when to stop, and that evening he sat in a corner watching his leader thoughtfully, for there was anxiety in the Colonel's face. Barrington sat silent near the ample hearth whose heat would scarcely have kept water from freezing but for the big stove, and disdaining the dispensation made his guests, he was clad conventionally, though the smooth black fabric clung about him more tightly than it had once been intended to do. His sister stood, with the stamp of a not wholly vanished beauty still clinging to her gentle face, talking to one or two matrons from outlying farms, and his niece by a little table turning over Eastern photographs with a few young girls. She, too, wore black in deference to the Colonel's taste, which was somber, and the garment she had laughed at as a compromise left uncovered a narrow strip of ivory shoulder and enhanced the polished whiteness of her neck. A slender string of pearls gleamed softly on the satiny skin, but Maud Barrington wore no other adornment, and did not need it. She had inherited the Courthorne comeliness, and the Barringtons she sprang from on her father's side had always borne the stamp of distinction.

A young girl sat at the piano singing in a thin reedy voice, while an English lad waited with the ill-concealed jealousy of a too officious companion to turn over the music by her side. Other men, mostly young, with weather-bronzed faces, picturesque in embroidered deer-skin or velvet lounge jackets, were scattered about the room, and all were waiting for the eight o'clock dinner. They were growers of wheat who combined a good deal of amusement with a little, not very profitable, farming, and most of them possessed a large share of insular English pride and a somewhat depleted exchequer.

Presently Dane crossed over, and sat down by Colonel Barrington. "You are silent, sir, and not looking very well tonight," he said.

Barrington nodded gravely, for he had a respect for the one man who occasionally spoke plain truth to him. "The fact is, I am growing old," he said, and then added, with what was only an apparent lack of connection. "Wheat is down three cents ,and money tighter than ever."

Dane looked thoughtful, and noticed the older man's glance in his niece's direction, as he said, "I am afraid there are difficult times before us."

"I have no doubt we shall weather them as I can't help admitting that just now I feel —a little tired—and am commencing to think we should have been better prepared for the struggle had we worked a trifle harder during the recent era of prosperity. I could wish there were older heads on the shoulders of those who will come after me."

Just then Maud Barrington glanced at them, and Dane, who could not remember having heard his leader talk in that fashion before, and could guess his anxieties, was a little touched as he noticed his attempt at sprightliness. As it happened, one of the lads at the piano commenced a song of dogs and horses that had little to recommend it but the brave young voice.

"They have the right spirit, sir," he said.

"Of course!" said Barrington. "They are English lads, but I think a little more is required. Thank God we have not rated the dollar too high, but it is possible we have undervalued its utility, and I fear I have only taught them to be gentlemen."

"That is a good deal, sir," Dane said quietly.

"It is. Still, a gentleman, in the restricted sense, is somewhat of an anachronism on the prairie, and it is too late to begin again. In the usual course of nature I must lay down my charge presently, and that is why I feel the want of a more capable successor, whom they would follow because of his connection with mine and me."

Dane looked thoughtful. "If I am not taking a liberty—you still consider the one apparently born to fill the place quite unsuitable?"

"Yes," said Barrington quietly, "I fear there is not a redeeming feature in Courthorne's character."

Neither said anything further, until there was a tapping at the door, and, though this was a most unusual spectacle on the prairie, a trim English maid in white-banded dress stood in the opening.

"Mr. Courthorne, Miss Barrington," she said.

Now Silverdale had adopted one Western custom in that no chance guest was ever kept waiting, and the music ceased suddenly, while the stillness was very suggestive, when a man appeared in the doorway. He wore one of the Scandinavian leather jackets which are not uncommon in that country, and when his eyes had become accustomed to the light, moved forward with a quiet deliberation that was characterized neither by graceful ease nor the restraint of embarrassment. His face was almost the color of a Blackfeet's, his eyes steady and gray, but those of the men who watched him were turned the next moment upon the Colonel's sister, who rose to receive him, slight, silver-haired, and faded, but still stamped with a simple dignity that her ancient silks and laces curiously enhanced. Then there was a silence that could be felt, for all realized that a good deal depended on the stranger's first words and the fashion of his reception by Miss Barrington and the Colonel.

Winston, as it happened, felt this too, and something more. It was eight years since he had stood before an English lady, and he surmised that there could not be many to compare with this one, while after his grim lonely life an intangible something that seemed to emanate from her gracious serenity compelled his homage. Then as she smiled at him and held out her hand, he was for a moment sensible of an almost overwhelming confusion. It passed as suddenly, for this was a man of quick perceptions, and remembering that Courthorne had now and then displayed some of the grace of by-gone days he yielded to a curious impulse, and, stooping, kissed the withered fingers.

"I have," he said, "to thank you for a welcome that does not match my poor deserts, madam."

Then Dane, standing beside his leader, saw the grimness grow a trifle less marked in his eyes. "It is in the blood," he said half-aloud, but Dane heard and afterwards remembered it.

In the meanwhile Miss Barrington had turned from the stranger to her niece. "It is a very long time since you have seen Lance, Maud, and, though I knew his mother well, I am less fortunate, because this is our first meeting," she said. "I wonder if you still remember my niece?"

Now, Winston had been gratified by his first success, and was about to venture on the answer that it was impossible to forget; but when he turned towards the very stately young woman in the long black dress whose eyes had a sardonic gleam, and wondered whether he had ever seen anybody so comely or less inclined to be companionable, it was borne in upon him that any speech of the kind would be distinctly out of place. Accordingly, and because there was no hand held out in this case, he contented himself with a little bend of his head. Then he was presented to the Colonel, who was distantly cordial, and Winston was thankful when the maid appeared in the doorway again, to announce that dinner was ready. Miss Barrington laid her hand upon his arm.

"You will put up with an old woman's company tonight?" she said.

Winston glanced down deprecatingly at his attire. "I must explain that I had no intention of trespassing on your hospitality," he said. "I purposed going on to my own homestead, and only called to acquaint Colonel Barrington with my arrival."

Miss Barrington laughed pleasantly. "That," she said, "was neither dutiful nor friendly. I should have fancied you would also have desired to pay your respects to my niece and me."

Winston was not quite sure what he answered, but he drew in a deep breath, for he had made the plunge and felt that the worst was over. His companion evidently noticed the gasp of relief.

"It was something of an ordeal?" she said.

Winston looked down upon her gravely, and Miss Barrington noticed a steadiness in his eyes she had not expected to see. "It was, and I feel guilty because I was horribly afraid," he said. "Now I only wonder if you will always be equally kind to me."

Miss Barrington smiled a little, but the man fancied there was a just perceptible tightening of the hand upon his arm. "I would like to be, for your mother's sake," she said.

Winston understood that while Courthorne's iniquities were not to be brought up against him, the little gentle-voiced lady had but taken him on trial; but, perhaps because it was so long since any woman had spoken kindly words to him, his heart went out towards her, and he felt a curious desire to compel her good opinion. Then he found himself seated near the head of the long table, with Maud Barrington on his other hand, and had an uncomfortable feeling that most of the faces were turned somewhat frequently in his direction. It is also possible that he would have betrayed himself, had he been burdened with self-consciousness, but the long, bitter struggle he had fought alone, had purged him of petty weaknesses and left him the closer grasp of essential things, with the strength of character which is one and same in all men who possess it, whatever may be their upbringing.

During a lull in the voices, Maud Barrington, who may have felt it incumbent on her to show him some scant civility, turned towards him as she said, "I am afraid our conversation will not appeal to you. Partly because there is so little else to interest us, we talk wheat throughout the year at Silverdale."

"Well," said Winston with a c ious little smile, "wheat as a topic is not quite new to me. In fact, I know almost more about cereals than some folks would care to."

"In the shape of elevator warrants or Winnipeg market margins, presumably?"

Winston's eyes twinkled though he understood the implication. "No," he said. "The wheat I handled was in 250-pound bags, and I occasionally grew somewhat tired of pitching them into a wagon, while my speculations usually consisted in committing it to the prairie soil, in the hope of reaping forty bushels to the acre and then endeavoring to be content with ten. It is conceivable that operations on the Winnipeg market are less laborious as well as more profitable, but I have had no opportunity of trying them."

Miss Barrington looked at him steadily, and Winston felt the blood surge to his forehead as he remembered having heard of a certain venture made by Courthorne which brought discredit on one or two men connected with the affairs of a grain elevator. It was evident that Miss Barrington had also heard of it, and no man cares to stand convicted of falsification in the eyes of a very pretty girl. Still, he roused himself with an effort.

"It is neither wise nor charitable to believe all one hears," he said.

The girl smiled a little, but the man still winced inwardly under her clear brown eyes, that would, he fancied, have been very scornful had they been less indifferent.

"I do not remember mentioning having heard anything," she said. "Were you not a trifle premature, in face of the proverb?"

Winston's face was a trifle grim, though he laughed. "I'm afraid I was; but I am warned," he said. "Excuses are, after all, not worth much, and when I make my defense it will be before a more merciful judge."

Maud Barrington's curiosity was piqued. Lance Courthorne, outcast and gambler, was at least a different stamp of man from the type she had been used to, and, being a woman, the romance that was interwoven with his career was not without its attractions for her.

"I did not know that you included farming among your talents, and should have fancied you would have found it—monotonous," she said.

"I did," and the provoking smile still flickered in Winston's eyes. "Are not all strictly virtuous occupations usually so?"

"It is probably a question of temperament. I have, of course, heard sardonic speeches of the kind before, and felt inclined to wonder whether those who made them were qualified to form an opinion."

Winston nodded, but there was a little ring in his voice. "Perhaps I laid myself open to the thrust; but have you any right to assume that I have never followed a commendable profession?"

No answer was immediately forthcoming, but Winston did wisely when, in place of waiting, he turned to Miss Barrington. He had left her niece irritated, but the trace of anger she felt was likely to enhance her interest. The meal, however, was a trial to him, for he had during eight long years lived for the most apart from all his kind, a lonely toiler, and now was constrained to personate a man known to be almost dangerously skillful with his tongue. At first sight the task appeared almost insuperably difficult, but Winston was a clever man, and felt all the thrill of one playing a risky game just then. Perhaps it was due to excitement that a readiness he had never fancied himself capable of came to him in his need, and, when at last the ladies rose, he felt that he had not slipped perilously. Then he became sensible that Colonel Barrington, who had apparently been delivering a lengthy monologue, was addressing him.

"The outlook is sufficient to cause us some anxiety," he said. "We are holding large stocks, and I can see no prospect of anything but a steady fall in wheat. It is, however, presumably a little to soon to ask your opinion."

"Well," said Winston, "while I am prepared to act upon it, I would recommend it to others with some difficulty. No money can be made at present by farming, but I see no reason why we should not endeavor to cut our losses by selling forward down. If caught by a sudden rally, we could fall back on the grain we hold."

There was a sudden silence, until Dane said softly, "That is exactly what one of the cleverest brokers in Winnipeg recommended."

"I think," said Colonel Barrington, "you heard my answer. I am inclined to fancy that such a measure would not be advisable or fitting, Mr. Courthorne. You, however, presumably know very little about the practical aspect of the wheat question."

Winston smiled. "On the contrary, I know a great deal."

"You do?" said Barrington sharply, and while a blunderer would have endeavored to qualify his statement, Winston stood by it.

"You are evidently not aware, sir, that I have tried my hand at farming, though not very successfully."

"That at least," said Barrington dryly, as he rose, "is quite creditable."

When they went into the smaller room, Winston crossed over to where Maud Barrington sat alone, and looked down upon her gravely. "One discovers that frankness is usually best," he said. "Now, I would not like to feel that you had determined to be unfriendly with me."

Maud Barrington fixed a pair of clear brown eyes upon his face, and the faintest trace of astonishment crept into them. She was a woman with high principles, but neither a fool nor a prude, and she saw no sign of dissolute living there. The man's gaze was curiously steady, his skin clear and brown, and his sinewy form suggested a capacity for, and she almost fancied an acquaintance with, physical toil. Yet he had already denied the truth to her. Winston, on his part, saw a very fair face with wholesome pride in it, and felt that the eyes which were coldly contemptuous now could, if there was a warrant for it, grow very gentle.

"Would it be of any moment if I were?" she said.

"Yes," said Winston quietly. "There are two people here it is desirable for me to stand well with, and the first of them, your your aunt has, I fancy, already decided to give me a fair trial. She told me it was for my mother's sake. Now, I can deal with your, uncle, I think."

The girl smiled a little. "Are you quite sure? Everybody does not find it easy to get on with Colonel Barrington. His code is somewhat Draconic, and he is rather determined in his ways."

Winston nodded. "He is a man, and I hope to convince him I have at least a right to toleration. That leaves only you. The rest don't count. They will come round by and by, you see."

The little forceful gesture, with which he concluded, pleased Maud Barrington. It was free from vanity, but conveyed an assurance that he knew his own value.

"No friendship that is lightly given is worth very much," she said. "I could decide better in another six months."

The farmer, as soon as he conveniently could, bade Miss Barrington good-night.

"But we expected you would stay here a day or two. Your place is not ready," she said.

Winston smiled at her. "I think I am wise. I must feel my way."

Miss Barrington was won, and making no further protest, signed to Dane. "You will take Mr. Courthorne home with you," she said. "I would have kept him here, but he is evidently anxious to talk over affairs with some one more of his age than my brother is."

Dane appeared quite willing, and, an hour later, Winston sat in a room of his outlying farm. It was furnished simply, but there were signs of taste, and the farmer who occupied it had already formed a good opinion of the man whose knowledge of his own profession astonished him.

"So you are actually going to sell wheat in the face of the Colonel's views?" he said.

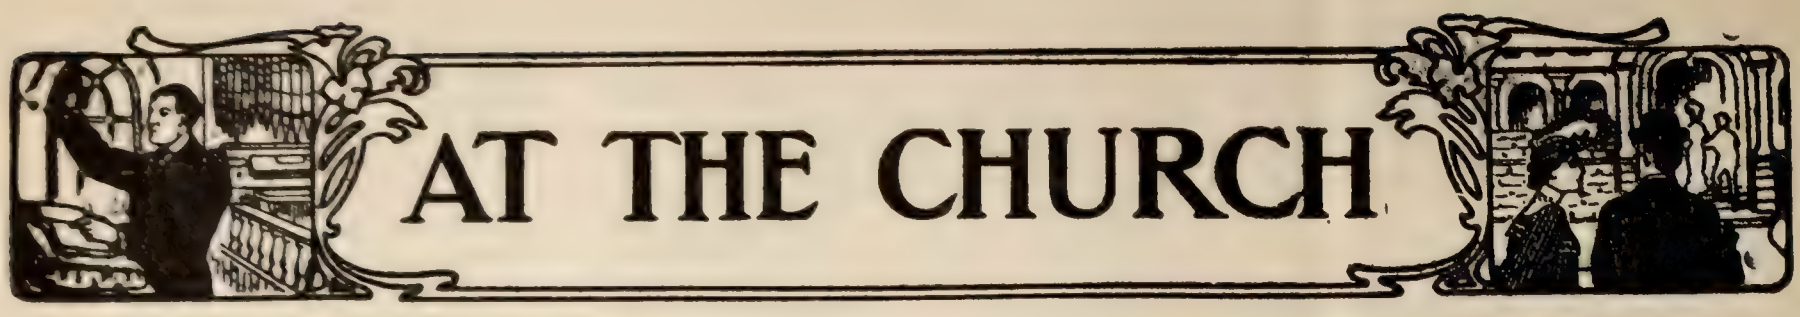
"Of course!" said Winston simply. "I don't like unpleasantness, but I can allow no man to dictate my affairs to me."

Dane grinned. "Well," he said, "the Colonel can be nasty, and he has no great reason for being fond of you already."

"No?" said Winston. "Now, of course, my accession will make a difference at Silverdale, but I would consider it a friendly act if you will let me know the views of the colony."

Dane looked thoughtful. "The trouble is that your taking up the land leaves less for Maud Barrington than there would have been. Barrington, who is fond of the girl, was trustee for the property, and after your—estrangement from your father—everybody expected she would get it all."

"So I have deprived Miss Barrington of part of her income?"



"Of course," said Dane. "Didn't you know?"

Winston found it difficult to answer. "I never quite realized it before. Are there more accounts against me?"

"That," said Dane slowly, "is rather a facer. We are all more or less friends of the dominant family, you see."

Winston stood up. "Now," he said, "I generally talk straight, and you have held out a hand to me. Can you believe in the apparent improbability of such a man as I am in the opinion of the folks at Silverdale getting tired of a wasted life and trying to walk straight again? I want your answer, yes or no, before I head across the prairie for my own place."

The First Gentile Converts*

The time had come when the gospel needed to be preached beyond the limits of Judaism. The first disciples seem to have interpreted the commission in terms of Jewish evangelism, but the impulse to preach in wider circles came in a two-fold way; first, by the experience of Peter in Caesarea, and secondly, through the preaching of Christian refugees from Jerusalem who, in the enthusiasm of gospel evangelism, ceased to restrict themselves to Jewish hearers alone but passed over into Gentile circles with the message (Acts 11:19-20.) Whether this second event was earlier or later than Peter's interview with Cornelius is uncertain. If it happened before that event it shows that the divine Spirit was leading the church into regions beyond without formal announcement of any change of policy. Logically, however, the preaching of Peter in Caesarea stands first because it helps us to understand the steps by which the conservative Jew was led to open the door of faith and obedience to the heathen world.

Peter in Joppa.

It will be remembered that after Peter's experience at Lydda and Joppa he remained in the latter city, the guest of a certain Simon whose occupation was that of tanner. Already is this acceptance of the hospitality of one whose work in life must have rendered him often ceremonially unclean, a trade which was regarded as objectionable from the standpoint of Jewish ritualism, Peter manifests something of the broader spirit which was already breaking away from Jewish observances into the liberty of Christian life. He was soon to be shown that this first step of his was but short in comparison with the distance he was to travel at the divine summons.

The city of Caesarea was located some twenty miles north of Joppa on the coast. It was a Roman city, built and named by representatives of Caesar's government, and contained only a very small Jewish population. Here the Roman procurator resided and here was the headquarters of the Roman garrison which represented Rome's authority in the provinces of Palestine.

Cornelius the Roman.

One of the captains of this garrison was named Cornelius. He was apparently a resident of Italy but was stationed with his company in Caesarea at this time. He was a religious man who had perhaps been attracted by the religious customs of the Jews whom he had met in Palestine, and had been led to inquire for further light than his heathen experience had given him. He had prayed for knowledge of his duty. Perhaps his prayers at first were addressed to his own Roman gods, but it is one of the truths which religion teaches us that the devout mind comes evermore to companionship with the Father of spirits, by whatever name he may be known. Probably Jewish ideas had led Cornelius to the acceptance of monotheism. He had progressed beyond the worship of the many gods of Rome to the one God of whom the law and the prophets had spoken.

The Centurion's Need.

In this man's heart there arose a desire for further knowledge of his duty. He could not rest satisfied with the meagre truth he possessed. No doubt he had heard something of the recent events at Jerusalem and the spread of that faith which proclaimed Jesus as the son of God and the Saviour of men. The preaching of Peter in towns on the plain of Sharon might well have come to his ears. He received the intimation, by means set down as distinctly divine and providential, that he might secure further knowledge of the truth by summoning the preacher from the neighboring town of Joppa. The importance of meeting this man's need with the human message of Jesus' work was sufficiently great to justify even so strange and unusual a method of divine communication as the angelic visitation to the household in Caesarea.

Peter's Vision.

In the meantime Peter had been passing through an experience which was to prepare him for his part in this enterprise. With his Jewish training it would have been the last of all possibilities for him to partake of food forbidden by the law. Even his wider experiences in his missionary journeys had not absolved him from his Jewish conservatism and prejudices. Resting at noon-time on the roof of the house at Joppa, he saw a vision which brought him disquietude and concern. Before him there appeared a vision of many kinds of living creatures, as if they had been placed in the awning stretched above his head and let down for his inspection. He was commanded in the hunger of the moment to slay and use them for food. But his whole nature rose up in revolt against even a divine demand to forget the habits of years, and he refused abruptly the summons to partake of such food. This episode was renewed again and again with the same results. When Peter had come fully to himself, he could only be astonished at what had transpired and wonder what its meaning might be as bearing on his mission.

The Call to Caesarea.

He was not to remain long in doubt. Almost at that moment he was summoned from the roof with the news that three men waited to see him at the gate. These men were the messengers of Cornelius, the centurion of Caesarea. They told their story and besought Peter to go with them and bring their master whatever truth he had to impart. Already the meaning of the vision began to dawn upon the apostle's mind as he talked with these men. He saw that his duty was clear. In spite of his Jewish prejudices against foreigners, he accepted their invitation. But he took the precaution of taking along with him some of the Jewish Christians of Joppa. The journey of twenty miles along the level sea coast was quickly accomplished, and they arrived the next day at the Roman city where Cornelius lived.

Preaching to Gentiles.

Here occurred the supreme scene in the apostle's life up to this time. Cornelius received him hospitably. It must have taken a good deal of courage on the part of Peter and his Jewish companions to accept the hospitality of a Gentile, which was contrary to all Jewish custom and prejudice. Still Peter felt that his path was clear since he was following the Spirit's own intimation in all this affair. When Cornelius had told what led him to send for the preacher, the last doubts as to the meaning of his vision on the house-top passed from Peter's mind and he spoke those great words which have been the foundation of all brotherhood and the doom of all race prejudices and animosities from that day to this. "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation, he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted with him." From that point he preaches Jesus just as he might have done to a Jewish audience. As yet the question had not arisen what he should do in case these Gentiles should accept his message and request entrance into the brotherhood of believers. Perhaps he felt that that was not a matter requiring his decision unless it should actually occur. At any rate, he had the support of the five or six Jewish brethren whom he had brought from Joppa as a kind of jury whose witness would vindicate him against the prejudiced criticism of the conservative brethren at Jerusalem and elsewhere, who might charge him with wantonly transgressing the customs of his people in associating with Gentiles.

Coming of the Spirit.

But while Peter was proceeding with his discourse suddenly the same strange phenomena occurred as on the day of Pentecost. The enthusiasm of the assembly broke forth in unwonted and ecstatic speech. The Spirit came upon them with overwhelming power. There could be no doubt in the mind of the apostle that this set the seal of divine approval upon his conduct and the entire transaction. Turning at once to the brethren from Joppa, who had accompanied him, he said, "Who can forbid water that these should not be baptized who have received the Holy Spirit as well as we?" There could be but one response to this challegne. It was clearly the mind of the Lord that the door of faith should be opened to the Gentiles. The scene closes appropriately with the obedience in baptism of the household of Cornelius who had heard the word and believed, and with the acceptance of their hospitality by the apostle and his friends.

Consequences to Peter.

Thus the way was opened for world-wide preaching among the non-Jewish people. Stephen had insisted that this was right but he had paid for his temerity with his life.

*International Sunday-school lesson for April 4, 1909: Peter and Cornelius, Acts 10:1-48. Golden Text: "In every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him," Acts 10:35. Memory Verses, 13-15.

Now providential events had clearly demonstrated the same. There could be no further question by those who wished to face the facts. It was true that in the Jerusalem church these events were heard with astonishment and indignation. When Peter returned he was sternly taken to task by some of the Jerusalem circle of Christians for his audacity in acepting Gentile hospitality and receiving Gentiles into the church. To his clear statement of the facts there could be no answer. It was evident that he had done only what the divine will had approved, and yet it is significant that from that day forth Peter practically lost his position of leadership in the Jerusalem church. It was no longer himself but James, the brother of the Lord, who was recognized as the head of the Christian community. Of this there are abundant proofs in the book of Acts and in the Epistles of Paul. We ought never to forget that among the sacrifices which Simon Peter made for the liberty which we have in Christ was this of the loss of that which he must have considered as more precious to him than any other earthly possession—the good will and love of that circle of his brethren who could not share in the joy of the broadening vision of the kingdom, and would not allow him the fellowship and approval which he would so much have prized. Such sacrifices are the common experience of those who follow the leadings of the divine Spirit as interpreters of the larger truth.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

LIFE LESSONS FOR ME FROM THE BOOK OF PROVERBS.

Topic April 4. Prov. 8:1-17.

Chapter 8 of the Book of Proverbs belongs to what is called the Wisdom Literature of the Hebrews. The Hebrew people were not philosophers. The wisdom literature is their nearest approach to philosophy, but it even is practical rather than theoretical. It consists of pithy sayings, cast in the form of a half-poetical, half-philosophical, observation of nature. In much of this wisdom literature the word "Wisdom" is personified, and such is the case in our proverb for study.

The Call of Wisdom.

As we picture our own Uncle Sam and Columbia, so we can almost see a tall figure, clad in sweeping robes, standing on some high place and calling to the "sons of man." "She standeth in the top of high places, by the way in the places of paths. She crieth at the gates, at the entry of the city, at the coming in at the doors."

The ancient Hebrew had a very different idea of wisdom from that of the priests of Mediaeval times. They hid the Bible from the people and kept knowledge from their understanding. But the Hebrew idea is that God has placed wisdom in the main gateway of life, and that it may be any man's for the asking.

The Character of Wisdom.

Even the simple could possess to some extent the wisdom of our proverb: For it was a wisdom of the heart as well as of the head. It meant to be things as well as to know things. Hence the simple, even if he could not work problems and remember dates, could understand truth and righteousness. After all, this is the only true wisdom is it not, in which a man does not only know things, but is things? Let us make Wisdom, as she stood in the gateway and spoke, our double ideal. For she claimed at the same time these two great things, "For my mouth shall speak truth; and wickedness is an abomination to my lips," and "Council is mine, and sound wisdom: I am understanding."

The Power of Wisdom.

This combination of character and knowledge, this highest wisdom, is what makes for greatness. And we all want to be great, do we not? To be thus wise is to be powerful and strong, to hold loving dominion over our fellow men. "By me kings reign and princes decree justice." O, young men and women, such wisdom as this is ours for the seeking. On a hill top she standeth and crieth to you and to me " . . . those that seek me early shall find me."

PRAYER MEETING

Silas Jones

THE WAY HOME TO THE FATHER.

Topic, March 31. Psa. 16:11; 23:6; 73:24; John 14:2,3.

"This is the true nature of home—it is the place of peace; the shelter, not only from all injury, but from all terror, doubt, and division. In so far as it is not this, it is not home; so far as the anxieties of the outer life penetrate into it, and the inconsistently-minded, unknown, unloved, or hostile society of the outer world is allowed to cross the threshold, it ceases to be home; it is then only a part of that outer world which you have roofed over, and lighted fire in. But so far as it is a sacred place, a vestal temple, a temple of the hearth watched over by Household Gods, before whose faces none may come but those whom they can receive with love—so far as it is this, and roof and fire are types only of a nobler shade and light—shade as of a rock in a weary land, and light as of the Pharos in the stormy sea; so far it vindicates the name, and fulfils the praise of home."

The Cry of the Soul.

"Oh that I knew where I might find him!" Whether we seek vindication against cruel enemies and false friends or relief from the terror, doubt and division within, the cry of the soul is for God. We may not understand ourselves. We may make the mistake of some who think masons, carpenters, painters, and grocers can make a home. The heart is not deceived by material environment. It avenges itself upon those who give it the stone of outward possessions without the bread of affection. What may we expect if we banish God and his grace from the universe? Will love remain on earth if it be not in heaven? Is the universe a home for man or is it a whirlpool that tosses him about like foam on the water? "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will we not fear, though the earth do change, and though the mountains be shaken into the heart of the seas."

A Present Refuge.

Did you ever hear a group of healthy young people singing "I am only waiting here to hear the summons, Child, come home?" What did you think of their performance? You must have thought they were saying what they did not feel or that they had strange notions of life and duty. There is so much work in this old world for young people to do that they ought to be ashamed to sing songs like this. They should be ambitious to walk with God in paths of service. God is their refuge now if they will only believe it. The home of God is wherever his children live. He "dwelleth not in temples made with hands." Let us not go back to the old heathenism that confined God to holy places and made him inaccessible to the weak and needy. Is there wickedness in your life? The way home to God is to fight that wickedness. If you sit down like a coward and acknowledge that you have been beaten by a bad habit and that you are now its abject slave, you are not finding God very fast. You are going in the wrong direction. But if you make a brave fight, you will find God is near. You will also find that the way home to God leads through the battle-field of right against wrong in society. It is not a deserted field on which stand here and there monuments to the famous fighters of other days. The battle is raging now. You have been drafted. You cannot be a spectator. You must fight or desert. The deserter never reaches the hearth of God.

The Guide.

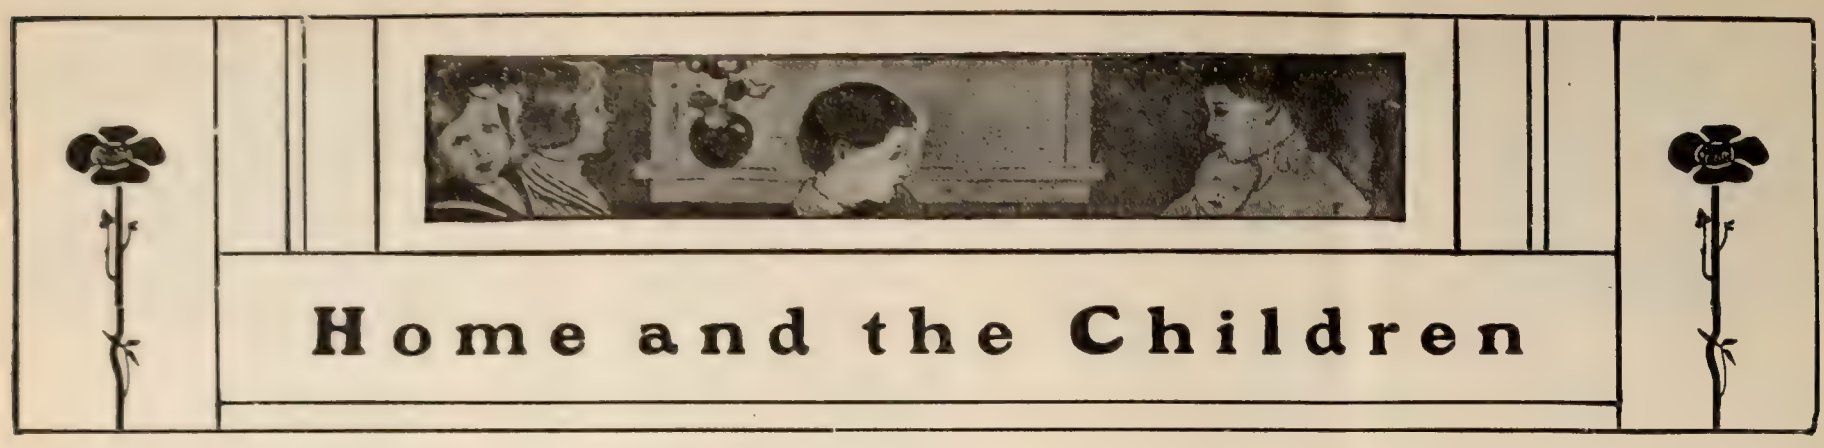
Loving persons and they alone can teach love. If we ever come to God and live with him, we shall have to be taught by persons in whom the love of God dwells. The pathfinders in religion are those who go before the rest of men in exploring the divine love. They are also prophets of righteousness. They see first the inconsistencies of human conduct and point out the way of reconciliation. For the Christian there is one guide to whom there is no rival. This guide brushes aside the rubbish put in the way by time-serving priests and legalists and points out the plain road of friendship between man and man and God and man. He opens the door for the outcast. He is "the way, and the truth, and the life." He is the way because he is the truth and the life. To know him is to know God. His friends comprise the household of God. In their company we journey along the road to that "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." He is Immanuel, God with us.

As Many as I Love

By Jasper Seaton Hughes.

Wish not the worldling's pleasure hire,
Gold have I that's tried in fire.
Love's chast'ning rod thy best keeper.
Look deeper—look—look deeper.

Grudge not the rich or proud or great:
Lost to self and owned by state,
Speaks thy praise the highest speaker.
Look deeper—look—look deeper.



I counsel thee to buy of me
Ointment that thine eyes may see
Thy nude self clothe completer.
Look deeper—look—look deeper.

Thy door once open unto me,
I'll come in and sup with thee,
Thus speaks the white angel reaper.
Look deeper—look—look deeper.

WONDERFUL POWER.

Home and the Children

A Polar Expedition

When I'm a man I shall just start forth
And always keep a-going north,
And, of course, by keeping on this way
I'll have to come to the Pole some day.

It seems so strange, and I can't think why
The men don't get there when they try!
For surely, if you just keep on A-going north, the thing is done!

—St. Nicholas.

The Puppy-Dog's Tail

BY RICHARD W. GENTRY.

(To be Interpreted.)

Once there was a little yellow dog who had backed up into a lawn-mower and had no tail. It made him feel awfully bad. And one day, when he couldn't remember where he had buried his bone and was blue anyway, he just sat down on the stump and cried. The puppy-dog tears ran down his face and splashed on his toes.

Then all the other animals came along and asked him what the trouble was. And, still sobbing, he barked out bitterly, "I am tailless!" But they, instead of comforting him, went on to tell how they would miss their tails. Says the horse:

"My tail I throw across the line,
Thus making much trouble for farmer Bryan."

Says the peacock:

"I spread the blue of mine to the breeze,
And that I'm a fine bird each agrees."

Says the snake:

"Around the hunter mine I run,
Till his bones they pop as loud as his gun."

Says the lion:

"With a great bang mine strikes on the floor
As I shake the tent with my terrible roar."

Says the elephant:

"With a teasing look in my eye
To make my tail like my trunk I try,
And the passer-by is filled with the fear
He'll mistake the front end for the rear."

Now when the little yellow dog heard these things he knew that tailless though he was, he was a better animal than they. He forgot all about the ugly stump, he forgot the thorn in his left hind foot, and rising up in his dignity on all four legs, he said:

"Of these tails of yours you each should be
So ashamed that you would drag it.
For I am sure, O, very sure!
That if I had a tail I would—wag it."

The New School

By Frank H. Sweet.

Such a breaking-off it was, such a rending of ties, when Nannie who had lived for three years in the old seaport town on the Sound, went back to the great city which had once been her home but was no more familiar. Little girls came, by twos and threes, to say good-by the day she left, keepsakes were given, and promises of letters were exacted. Nannie held herself serenely through it all, as one who should say: "I go to a bigger world than the one you live in, but I will not forget you, my dears!" And at first it did seem like a big, beautiful world, where there were old friends to be hunted up, parks and museums to be visited, and gay, crowded stores where a little girl could find wonderful bargains for a very few cents. But time was precious, and as soon as the household was settled, Nannie must go to school.

This was the beginning of woe. In the dear old town she had gone to a school close by, with all the boys and girls of the neighborhood. There she had worked her way tremulously but faithfully with fractions, had stood high in spelling matches, and had drawn a map of Maine. Her little friends had called for her in the morning, and attended her home again, usually rounding off the afternoon with an hour in the apple-tree, sitting about on the boughs. But a new school, a city school, with its many grades, its crowded ranks, its different books, its strange teachers! Nannie's heart sank as the hour drew near; she begged to be allowed to study at home, to recite to her papa, her aunts, to do anything but go to that terrible new school. "They will ask me questions I don't understand," she urged, "out of books I never saw, and when I can't answer they will put me away down in the lowest class! O mamma, I can't bear it, I can't bear it! I wish I was back in Miss Bingham's school again." Mamma felt sorry, and it was a sober pair that made their way to school No. 25, a huge brick building with a tower.

There they were passed from teacher to teacher, and then Nannie was led away to a distant room, after which her mother had nothing better to do than to go home and await results.

Twelve o'clock came and a quarter-past twelve, but no Nannie.

At half-past twelve she dashed into the house, and with tears in her eyes exclaimed: "I lost my way coming home, and it is just a dreadful school! I can't bear it! The children don't look nice, they sit all crowded up together, and it's close there! I had to sit in a draught, and I sneezed half a dozen times or more!"

"How about the lessons?" asked mamma.

"Oh, I can't bear it!" Nannie broke forth again. "They used a different arithmetic, and the weights and measures come before fractions! They are going to be examined tomorrow, and I never studied grammar at dear Miss Bingham's. Can't I go back to Miss Bingham's?"

"But you studied language lessons," said mamma, "so maybe you can answer the questions. I'll give you a little review after lunch."

So by-and-by, mamma, with an anxious face, and Nannie, with an utterly despondent one, sat down to the review lesson.

After a few simple questions, mamma began on the parts of speech, and presently asked, "What is an article?"

"Three little words we often see Are articles, a, an or the."

repeated Nannie with fresh tears, for this was something she had learned at Miss Bingham's school and it made her homesick. "What is an interjection?" asked mamma, hurrying on. But Nannie's grief increased.

"An interjection shows surpise,
As ah! how pretty! Oh! how wise!"

"Form a sentence with an adjective in it," said mamma. "Miss Bingham is beautiful!" exclaimed Nannie. And so the interview went on, Nannie catching at every chance to state that she wanted to be with those dear girls again, and that she would be happy now with even those she didn't like there. Even up to bed-time, with some intervals, the strain was continued for Nannie did not omit a single phase of feeling. Now it was: "There isn't a girl in this school that begins to be so pretty as May Lynch!"

And next it was, "I wouldn't change my Edith Hall for all the girls in this school put together." Then the final touch, which wound up the evening was: "Oh! I want to be running down the hill again with Edith Hall, and feeling the wind in my face!" The next morning she started for school, with shrinking and protestation, and her mother thought of her anxiety all the forenoon. But at twelve, home came Nannie, and this time without tears.

She laid down her books in a capable manner, and said, "They had examination in grammar, and the questions were easy. I guess I answered most all of them. Then the teacher read to us about some place down South, where Sir Walter Raleigh once went and she told us to write a composition about it. So I put in all I knew about Sir Walter Raleigh, what I remembered from 'Kenilworth,' mamma! I told how he flung his cloak down over a mud-puddle, so Queen Elizabeth could cross it without wetting her feet. And I said Queen Elizabeth was very fond of receiving attentions from young gentlemen, but she sometimes spoke very roughly to them, and once when Sir Walter Raleigh displeased her, she said to him, 'Go to the devil!'" "Did you put that in?" exclaimed mamma. "Yes," said Nannie, "and the teacher looked pleased. I like the new school better than I did yesterday, and two girls walked all the way home with me. They are not as nice as Edie Hall or May Lynch, but still they are pretty nice. I think I will keep on going there."

And so there was peace.—The Advance.

"Sit down," said Dane with a little smile. "Do you think I would have brought you here if I hadn't believed it? And, if I have my way, the first man who flings a stone will be sorry for it. Still, I don't think any of them will—or could afford it. If we all had been saints, some of us would never have come out from the old country."

After that they talked wheat-growing and horses, and when his guest retired Dane still sat thoughtfully beside the stove. "We want a man with nerve and brains," he said. "I fancy the one who has been sent us will make a difference at Silverdale."

A Telling Testimony to a Tender Ministry

The eloquent appeal of the strong men of the church for Christian love and care for the helpless orphan in all lands is a most beautiful and convincing testimony to Her divine origin. Do not fail to have a part in this holy ministry. If you have not ordered Easter supplies send at once to Miss Mattie Pounds, 152 E. Market St., Indianapolis, Ind., or James H. Mohorter, 903 Aubert Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

A matter on which the Scriptures speak so plainly and frequently is not a matter concerning which we may be silent. "As you have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, you have done it unto me." Does that include neglect as well as care? B. J. Radford.

The logical place to begin to teach any nation any truth is with its children. The most Scriptural, and at the same time the most reasonable, of all our mission work is the maintenance of orphanages and schools in heathen lands. Every man, woman and child should have some part at Easter in this the greatest of all our enterprises.

Stanley R. Grubbs.

No appeal to Christian benevolence accords more fully with the spirit of the apostolic church than that of the "Helping Hand." With no discount of other causes such giving touches the very heart of the Christian life. It is twice blest. It enriches both given and receiver. W. P. Aylsworth.

The call for orphanage work in foreign lands will inspire every child to great endeavor. The Easter time, with its sublime lesson of the new life, can in no way be better observed than to inspire young life with a vision of service for heathen lands. Let the children of the Bible School and Junior Society have a chance and the gifts will be large. Then help with your own gifts. O. L. Smith.

"Whoso hath the world's goods, and beholdeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his compassion frim him, how doth the love of God abide in him?"

This quotation by itself shows ample scriptural authority for the work of The National Benevolent Association. May heaven's blessing rest upon the work of this association and may our great brotherhood show a proper interest in it, in this our Centennial year. I am with you, heart, hand, and pocketbook. Hall Laurie Calhoun.

I consider the taking of children from the debasing surroundings of heathen life and all its dark iniquities and placing them in Christian Orphanages and Schools to be the most blessed thing that can possibly be done on this earth. It is par excellence missionary work. Happy should be the man, woman or child, Sunday-school, mission band or church that can by so easy and simple a method as giving money have part of this Christ-like work. Give largely at Easter for this enterprise. Allen B. Philputt.
Indianapolis.

Some Christians do not contribute to the Home and Foreign Missionary societies because they do not find a "Thus saith the Lord" in the New Testament, but they can find no such excuse for not giving to the Benevolent Association. That the offerings may be larger this Centennial year than ever before, is the ardent wish of Carl Johann.

A heathen child in India said, "I learned to be good in a Christian school." It is blessed to help some of these little ones just to be good, when we thing that even childhood in India is not allowed to be innocent. Our Woman's Board by its orphanage work is helping the childhood of India to be both innocent and good. M. D. Adams.

I believe in Missions, Home and Foreign. I believe in Church Extension. I believe in College Endowment. But I believe just as firmly in the work being done by our National Benevolent Association. I believe that every church among us ought to contribute liberally to this Christ-like labor of love, whether it supports the other great enterprise of the Brotherhood or not. E. Jay Teagarden.

All lines of missionary endeavor are important. Among the most effective methods schools and orphanages for heathen children rank high. The hope of the Kingdom in heathen lands is in caring for and training heathen children. The C. W. B. M., with the instinct of a mother, has grasped the principle and is making the most of it with its limited resources. These resources should be greatly increased by the Easter offering. J. N. Jessup.

Easter time is drawing near, and our National Benevolent Association is planning to make the offering the greatest in our history. Through preacher and pulpit they are carrying on a great educational campaign, hoping that our Centennial year will fulfill the aims not only of our other great enterprises, but of this also. Why should they have to plead for a work like this? I do not believe that any Christianity without great, well organized benevolent work, covering all the fields of modern benevolences, is truly Christian. Certainly it is not the Christianity of the New Testament times.

Alfred M. Haggard.

One of the solutions of the problem of evangelizing heathen nations lies in the taking of boys and girls of heathen parents, bringing them up under Christian influences and sending them back to their own people to teach the Christ. It is imperative that we should plant schools and orphanages in heathen lands. Aside from being humanitarian and Christlike this is the surest economy in world-wide evangelization. Help the C. W. B. M. to do this by a large offering at Easter.

There is no one agent in our midst that will do more toward the answering of the Savior's prayer for the oneness of his people than The National Benevolent Association.

For its success let us Pray and Push.

H. M. Gillmore.

Our plea is for return to the Christianity of Christ—its creed, its ordinances, its life. We are more than satisfied with the creed, we scrupulously observe the ordinances, and it is a matter of transcendent importance that we produce the Christ-life in all our churches and mission stations. The orphanage work of the Young People's Department is helping to do this. Let us help it. B. B. Tyler.

Too much emphasis cannot be placed upon the work of our National Benevolent Association. It is scriptural; it is needed; it is in harmony with the spirit of the times. In the past the church has had too little regard for the orphans, the widows and the aged. P. J. Rice.

Beyond all doubt the Christian Orphanage, combining the influence of the Christian home and Christian school, constitutes a most valuable method of Christianizing a heathen people. The C. W. B. M. has set a magnificent example in the importance it has given orphanage work in foreign lands. It is our privilege to help this work at Easter.

Claude E. Jones.

The National Benevolent Association in its ministry of helpfulness represents much of the spirit and purpose of Jesus. He blessed the children and the poor, healed the sick and instilled the principles of sympathy and help for those who need it. Let us do something worthy at this Easter season and prove ourselves something more than well wishers. Change our well-wishing into well-doing, our benevolence into beneficence, our thoughts of the helpless into gifts to help them. Bernard P. Smith.

The key to the situation in any land is the child. The training that the children receive in the orphanages supported by the C. W. B. M. in heathen lands means much for the future. These children so trained will become light bearers among their benighted people. The children in the home land should every one help this work. Easter will afford a special opportunity for helping. Let every church do its duty on that day. William Oeschger.

Suppose you and I should be laid aside by some lingering disease, or suppose death should suddenly remove us from the joy and privilege of earning bread for our loved ones, what would become of our children? In many instances, they would be taken care of by The National Benevolent Association. Therefore, as you and I look into the faces of those whom we love dearer than life, let us read in their eyes an irresistable appeal for support of this worthy cause. Though your child and mine may never need its aid, hundreds of other children will. Let this Easter be the Resurrection Morn of great possibility to many a helpless child.

Cecil J. Armstrong.

There are no heathen babies. Every infant born in India is as near the heart of God as any child that is cradled by American Christianity. But among the first impressions made upon its plastic mind are the marks of degrading and demoralizing influences that are not only ungodly but diabolic. The extent of the deliverance wrought by a mission orphanage in making a Christian man or woman out of a child of heathen parents staggers the imagination of people who are secure in Christian environment. And the new life is a most important force in evangelizing its native land. No wonder the missionaries who are assigned to orphanage work carry forward their labor with such enthusiastic devotion! Wise and blessed is the American Christian who will enter into fellowship with them at Easter. W. R. Warren.

Home Missionary Rallies

Secretary H. A. Denton of Cincinnati and Missionary Nelson H. Trimble of Baltimore, Md., will make the following dates mentioned in connection with the spring home missionary rallies.

In the afternoon a missionary rally will be held and at night a stereopticon lecture on The Christian Conquest of America wili be delivered. The views were shown in several of our Covington and Cincinnati churches simultaneously on the night of March 14, and were pronounced the best set of views ever used on missions in the city. Over 150 views will be shown.

Shall We Be Less Than Apostolic?

Too much emphasis cannot be placed upon the work of our National Benevolent Association. It is scriptural; it is needed; it is in harmony with the spirit of the times. In the past the church has had too little regard for the orphans, the widows and the aged. Aside from the preaching of the gospel the first distinguished service of the primitive church was in the care of its dependent classes. No church can be Apostolic which neglects it. And in view of the emphasis that is now being placed upon the church's social duty it cannot be modern and disregard this feature of service. We rejoice in the rapid progress that has been made among our people in this regard, and surely we now see what a great and effectual door is opened before us. Give the children a chance in the Easter festival and they will not only respond but will stimulate interest and sacrifice in others. P. J. Rice.

An Elder in the Poor House

Experience is the most efficient teacher. It is a most successful pleader. The name of a certain church has appeared on the books of the Benevolent Association for years. It was kept there not because it was doing anything to support the precious ministry of the Association, for it was not doing a thing, but because one member was deeply interested and kept striving to convince his brethren that it is the will of the Lord that the strong should bear the infirmities of the weak. Year after year this faithful disciple wrote for literature with which to interest and awaken the church. The years passed without results. This year he wrote, saying: "At last our church will take an offering for the comfort of the Lord's poor. One of our elders has been taken to the poor house. The church feels ashamed. It now sees the value and beauty of the work of Christ in our Benevolent Association. It would be a good thing for the cause of Christ if a few more elders should be taken to the poor-house. Out of this shame the church might be led to rise to her glory in Christian brotherhood.

H. O. Breeden in Fresno, Calif.

Some noted evangelists have held meetings at Fresno, and among them the celebrated Dr. Torrey, who held a month's mission just a year ago supported by seventeen denominations. The results were not satisfactory to the churches, but the writer is sure that Fresno was greatly profited by Dr. Torrey's visit.

Just one year from the beginning of Dr. Torrey's meeting, Dr. Breeden began a meeting in the First Christian Church, H. H. Wilson and the North Side Church co-operating with the First Church and its pastor. Some predicted failure; Fresno generally, was dubious for Fresno has seen many failures. But some of the city's best people came—came perhaps curiously and remained to—think. For he who follows Dr. Breeden through a series of sermons must think—will think. And the thoughtfulness of the man, coupled with a charming and almost irresistable personality, combined to draw large and attentive audiences from the first. Prof. Saxton, who was ill the first week, nevertheless, came unto his own the second week, and led and sang with power. His wife a violinist of merit, assisted at times to the delight of all.

Any attempt at analysis of Dr. Breeden's style, type of thought, or methods would result unsatisfactorily. Sufficient to say—his type is not stereotyped. There is an utter absence of dogmatism; a commendable lack of stilted phrases; an absolute freedom from mere shibboleths. To the people of Fresno he preached a sane, normal message. The homely old integrities of the soul were emphasized over and over again. He was original and at times original to the startling point. But there was no freak thinking; no freak anything in connection with the entire campaign. There is none of the swagger about Dr. Breeden. No taint of professional evangelism. His entrance into the field of evangelism is epochal. No, he does not belong to the so-called new school; he is a school unto himself. He impressed the Fresno church that he had taken his cue from no particular set of brethren whether contemporary or past.

Dr. Breeden is never legalistic. He was a pastor too long for that. His great experience; his breadth of learning; and his humility and force of character saves him from mere professional evangelistic bluster. Withal, he reached certain heights without descending to certain depths.

The meeting lasted five weeks and 226 were added. The present resident membership of the First Church at Fresno is 936—making it the largest church of the Disciples on the Pacific Coast. A thousand dollars was raised for missions. The church is now a living link in home, foreign, and state missions. The problem of a new building confronts us.

March 8. J. R. Perkins Pastor.

Dedication Day at Hutchinson, Kansas

March 7 will long be remembered by the Church of Christ at Hutchinson. It was a happy, glorious day, and best of all a prophecy of greater days to come.

This congregation was organized August, 1876 with seventeen charter members. The little band was subject to all the discouragements and vicissitudes of pioneer work. They were driven about and compelled to worship in various uninviting places. Finally they succeeded in erecting their first building and for twenty-four years occupied this, until it was sold and removed to make room for the present imposing structure.

The cornerstone of this new building was laid September 6, 1908. Never did work move forward with greater precision and dispatch. No church was ever blessed with a better building committee, every member of which deserves special praise. The day of dedication dawned beautiful and bright. It seemed that a good providence gave it to us by special order.

Brother F. M. Rains was master of ceremonies. He was at his best and this could mean nothing less than a magnificent victory. There was a debt of $20,000 to be provided for. When all the pledges of the day were in, the amount was more than raised. In one of the most beautiful and impressive services ever used, Brother Rains dedicated the temple of our hands to God. Many of us who have heard and worked with Brother Rains in other dedications felt that on this particular occasion he far surpassed all records. He lifted the vast audiences to the mountain peaks of vision and all hearts thrilled with a world consciousness. We are proud of Rains. The new building cost thirty-eight thousand dollars. It is of pressed brick trimmed artistically with buff Bedford store. It is modern in every way. Basement under entire structure, containing dining room, kitchen, social room, kindergarten apartment, reception rooms, lavatories, and furnace plant. There are many separate class rooms, two balconies, two large auditoriums and reception rooms, these are all arranged so they can be thrown together forming a large compact room, from every point of which the speakers platform is visible. The windows are of beautiful art glass containing many beautiful biblical pictures, including "The Good Samaritan," "Christ Knocking at the Door," "The Good Shepherd," and "Christ in Gethsemane." Altogether it is declared by Rains, Huckley, Corey and others of our prominent men to be one of the most complete, best arranged and beautiful buildings in the entire brotherhood. The massive Corinthian columns in front give classic adornment to the entrance which is very imposing. The interior decorations are purely ecclesiastical and strictly in harmony with the architecture of the building. The baptistery is one most conveniently located and is in plain view of the entire audience. We have already had occasion to use it and many have remarked concerning the impressiveness of the service, especially to its splendid arrangement. The music for the day under the direction of Charles M. Bliss was grand and inspiring and in keeping with the thought of the occasion. Brother Bliss has the high ideals and a keen sense of the place and power of music in the church. He led a large chorus and orchestra in the rendition of the most beautiful anthems of praise ever heard in this city. He remains with the pastor and home forces in a revival. We have no purer, sweeter, more efficient song leader in all the brotherhood than Charles M. Bliss of Oklahoma City. We are expecting a great harvest of souls during these special meetings. The church is a unit. Love and complete harmony prevail. Thus may it ever be.

O. L. Cook, Minister.

The Bible College of Missouri and Ministerial Supply

The Bible College of Missouri is anxious to render service to the fullest extent of its opportunity and power. It wants to serve the churches of Missouri; and it wants to serve the young men who seek to prepare themselves for the largest usefulness in the Christian ministry. Columbia is exceptionally well located with reference to the churches of central Missouri, many of which are accustomed to employ non-resident ministers. We would be glad to correspond with such churches with a view to assisting them to secure acceptable preaching. The Bible College is seeking to solve the problem of the rural and village church and we believe that our students have here unusual facilities for such studies as will contribute to that end.

On the other hand we want to correspond with young men who are ambitious to secure a better educational equipment and who are prepared to do some preaching. At present we are not able to supply the demand we have had for ministers, and the compensation is quite good for this kind of work. Our students have been uniformly successful in their ministrations and there is a growing demand for their services.

This book contains the report of the Toronto Convention held in 1905. But incidentally it presents the story of the Sunday-school in its development through the past one hundred years and a survey of the prominent figures now identified with the work. It has been prepared for wide distribution and for this reason the price has been made very low. It is a source of information regarding the Sunday-school movement.

Obituary

MULLINS—Benjamin Gatewood Mullins, born in Kentucky, May 24, 1844, died in Los Angeles, Cal., February 2, 1909. Was married in early life to Betty Kennedy in Garrard county, Ky. Their children are Professor William A. Mullins, Mrs. O. V. Curtis, Mrs. Mary L. Beasley and Mrs. J. W. Earnhardt, at whose home he died, and with whom his wife will continue to make her home. The funeral services were conducted by Harvey Hazel, Los Angeles.

ELKIN—Mrs. Susie Darst Elkin, wife of Arthur Elkin, died at their home in Eureka, Ill., February 6, 1909. She was the only daughter of John and Ruhama Darst and was in her fifty-third year. She was born and lived all her life in Eureka, where her father was long the best and most generous supporter Eureka College had. Her aged mother, in her eighty-sixth year, and eight brothers, besides her husband, survive her. She went to greet her three little ones who are in the better land. She was a woman of rare beauty of character, serene in her faith, never complained during her long illness, and was never known to speak illy of any one. The church and college received her best affection and unceasing devotion. She is mourned by a great company of friends.

South California and Arizona

GRANT K. LEWIS, SECRETARY, Long Branch.

The Boyle Heights Church on last Wednesday evening celebrated its anniversary by burning a $1,200 mortgage. It was quite an event in the history of this church. $1,000 remains yet of their indebtedness. I. H. Hazel is the successful minister recently elected. There were nineteen additions during his first month at regular services.

Mrs. Oscar Sweeny, the wife of our minister at Oceanside, during the absence of the Methodist preacher, and upon his invitation, supplied his pulpit. This is another straw which indicates the direction of the wind in these times of closer Christian fellowship.

There is great interest among our Christian churches in the March offering for foreign missions. The tours, among our churches by such return missionaries as Dr. Dye, W. G. Manzies and F. E. Hagin have sowed much good seed, and the active interest of our splendid ministers in the state is sure to reap a splendid harvest during March.

The recent district conventions of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, held in various sections of the state, have given evidence of unusual interest in the women's work. Mrs. Reba B. Smith has been in attendance at every convention, and the splendid interest everywhere manifest, has greatly elated the spirit of this good woman. About $7,500 has been raised in pledges for the Japanese Home in Los Angeles.

G. T. Purves is leading the little church at Tucson, Ariz., in a good work. There is much interest in their Sunday-school.

E. D. Chapin has resigned his work at Burbank, and begun what is expected to be a successful pastorate with the church at South Figueroo boulevard, Los Angeles. Here a great opportunity presents itself in the way of a Sunday-school, where the children come from many homes not members of the church.

F. H. Bentley of Kansas, the brother of C. C. Bentley, our minister at Orange, is with the South Main Street Church, Los Angeles, as pastor for a few months.

F. E. Hagin, one of our missionaries in Japan, has been compelled to locate his family in southern California on account of his daughter's health. Their home is established at Glendora. He has been supplying pulpits in and around Los Angeles, and it is probable that he will locate with one of our churches as pastor for a time.

A. P. Frost and wife have endeared themselves to a wide fellowship in southern California by their sojourn here this winter. Their earnest message to the churches has developed much interest in our general work. They are now in Long Beach for a few weeks.

W. G. Menzies and wife, of India, who fought a strenuous campaign in behalf of missions among the churches, are taking a brief rest at Long Beach.

The interest in the work of our Sunday-school specialist, E. W. Thornton, grows apace as the nature of his work becomes known. He is now in his third series of meetings with the church at Whittier.

Pastor W. H. Martin is most enthusiastic over this Sunday-school campaign. We hear it suggested that Mr. Thornton is to deliver a course of lectures on Sunday-school work in our Berkeley Bible Seminary, to young ministers. The up coast conventions for the coming summer are also taking steps to secure him at their sessions.

The Naomi Avenue Christian Church is doing a great work among its young people. Recently the adult Bible class of this Sunday-school took up the movement to introduce more or less institutional work. They have raised $750, which insures the building of "Berean Hall" on the unoccupied margin of their church property. This building is to be fitted up for use of the young people and will be open every day and night in the year. Equipment for a gymnasium and library are among the features of the enterprise. Many churches would be proud if they had one young man or woman volunteer to the ministry or the foreign field. This year twelve young people from this one church have already volunteered for such service.

Fred M. Lee of the Naomi Avenue Church, has dedicated his life to the ministry and the church at San Jacinto, Cal., has extended him a call. Mr. Lee preached the first sermon of his ministry at this church yesterday.

Zwinglius Moore of Fort Morgan, Colo., has been invited to visit the church at Homet for a few months with the hope that the climate and field will appeal to him in such a way as to lead him to cast his lot with this work for the future.

W. H. Hanna of the Philippine Islands, will spend the month of March and possibly April in southern California, and can be had either to supply pulpits or to lead the singing of an evangelistic campaign. Brother Hanna has conducted the singing for some of our best evangelists and his presence is an opportunity some good pastor should avail himself of.

L. C. Haulman has been called to take the pastorate of our young church at Porterville. He began his services February 21.

John C. Hay, who has been actively engaged in the ministry in Colorado for the past year is about to return to California. Brother Hay has a great place in the hearts of our California Brotherhood, and his return to this fellowship will bring joy to their hearts.

We are glad to report that A. K. Crawford, one of the pillars of the church in southern California, and who has been quite ill at his home in Glendale is convalescing. His many friends entertain the hope that he will soon be seen and heard among us.

Mrs. Princess C. Long is leading the singing for George Ringo in a short meeting at the West Side Church, Los Angeles.

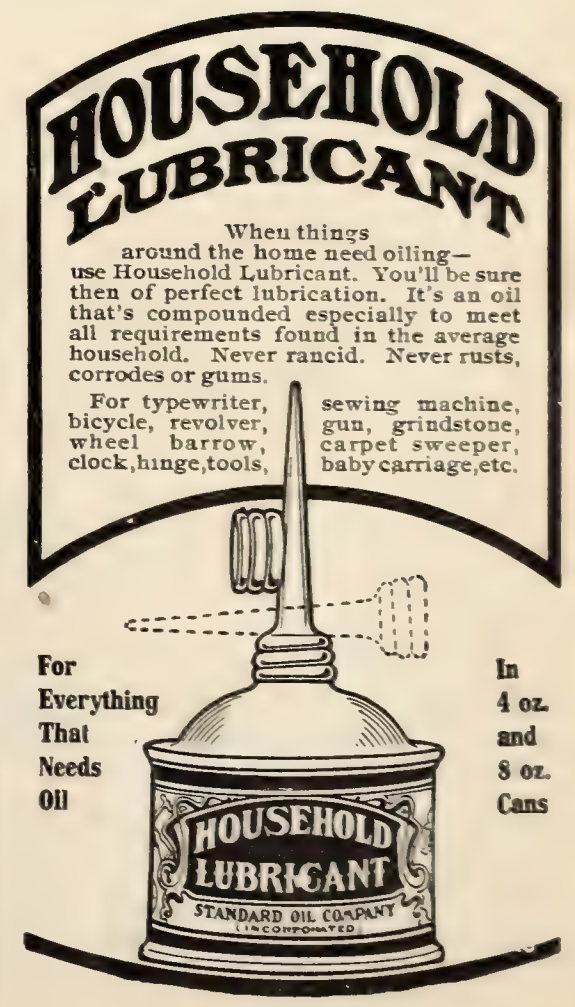
Albert Buxton, minister at Salt Lake City, and dean-elect of the Bible College of Christian University, Canton, Mo., will be passing through our state next month. He plans to spend March 28 in Los Angeles. His presence will present a good opportunity for some local preacher to rest while the visitor keeps his heart hinges and voice reeds from rusting.

Evangelist Stivers began a meeting last Sunday with the church at Monrovia and splendid hearing, taxing the capacity of the house is reported, and they will hold their service next Sunday in Odd Fellows Hall. Great interest is manifested.

Following the work of E. W. Thornton, the Sunday-school specialist, with the church at Magnolia avenue, a great rally was held. Although the rains interfered with the working plans, an effort was made for an attendance of "one thousand and one." They reached nine hundred and twenty-nine in spite of the difficulty. It was a great victory. S. J. Chapman, the superintendent, and Pastor McKnight both have a right to feel proud over the splendid response made to their leadership. This school has grown so that measures have lately been taken for enlargement.

"Fifty days, fifty sermons, fifty additions, with no two successive opportunities for good audiences," is the laconic report of Evangelist Spiegel for the Broadway Church meeting, in which he was assisted by Mrs. Princess Long. Brother Spiegel leaves on a short tour to Old Mexico soon, after which he has engagements with churches in the southern states, which will occupy his time until the Centennial Convention. He has many friends in southern California who confidently expect his return to some prominent work here.

Kentucky and the Centennial



In addition to preparing for the greatest state convention of a century, Kentucky is planning through its general centennial committee to rejoice in this glad year in some special ways. The regular state meeting will convene in Lexington, September 20-23. Friday the 24th, will be known as Centennial Day and the exercises will open with a memorial service to be held in the Lexington cemetery at the graves of John T. Johnson and Raccoon John Smith that are side by side in this beautiful city of the dead. There are also buried here the bodies of Robert Milligan, Dr. L. L. Pinkerton, Robert Graham, John I. Rogers, and Richard C. Ricketts—all heroes of the faith. President J. W. McGarvey has consented to make the address on this occasion. Later in the day, the hosts will gather in the large auditorium at Woodland Park. George H. Coombs, one of Kentucky's most gifted sons, has consented to make the chief address at this service, which will be followed by the introduction of as many veterans and descendants of the pioneers as can be brought to the convention. Beneath bluegrass soil there rest the bodies of a large majority of those whom we are seeking to honor this year. Between the time of the State Convention in September and the National Convention in October, it has been thought wise to hold memorial services at the graves of as many of these as possible. These shall include Barton Stone at Caneridge, Walter Scott at Mayslick, Samuel Rogers at Cynthiana, John Rogers at Carlisle, John Allen Gano at Georgetown, John Augustus Williams at Harrodsburg, F. G. Allen at Mt. Byrd, William Logan Williams at Hustonville, Aylette Rains at Eminence, Jacom Creath, Sr., at Nicholasville and several others the location of whose graves we are at present not prepared to state with confidence. It will be of service to the committee if those who know of other graves will send the desired information to the writer.

Of course Kentucky is joining heartily in all the great centennial tasks of the brotherhood, and in addition thereto is committed to the successful achievement of a special enterprise of her own, the endowment of a Bible-school Chair in the College of the Bible. About $10,000 of the necessary $25,000 for this endowment has been paid in cash and the remainder is assuredly expected by the close of the campaign. The first Sunday in April will be Pioneer Day in all the Bible-schools of the state, looking toward the advancement of this enterprise.

Kentucky invites her scattered sons and daughters and her brethren everywhere to join with her in this glad season of rejoicing to honor the pioneers.

The church at State Line, Neb., W. R. Burbridge, pastor, is being assisted in a meeting by Harry Mitchell.

W. T. Hilton is assisting C. M. Schoonover, of Bonham, Texas, in a meeting. The prospects are for a good meeting.

The Young Women's class of the Sunday-school at Lincoln, Neb., is planning to give a comedy entitled, "Sunbonnets."

I. J. Spencer was the evangelist in a twenty days' meeting at Bellaire, Ohio, in which there were 105 additions to the church.

The First Church, Kansas City, Mo., is being assisted in a meeting by C. M. Chilton, pastor of the First Church, St. Joseph, Mo.

W. T. Matlock, C. C. Curtis and wife, and Mrs. Ethel Curtis have formed an evangelistic company and will begin meetings in June.

The pulpit of the church at Walla Walla, Wash., was supplied February 21 by L. P. Schooling, pastor of the church at Pullman, Wash.

The First Church, Youngstown, Ohio, has entered the Living Link class. J. R. Ewers, the pastor, has done excellent work with this church.

The twenty-seventh annual session of the Central Illinois Ministerial Institute will be held at the Central Church, Decatur, Ill., April 8 and 9.

Living Link evangelist, F. A. Sword, J. F. Smith and the church at Loraine, Ill., in a meeting, in which there were sixty-six additions to the church.

The church at Guthrie, Okla., under the leadership of T. L. Noblitt, has just raised $899 to pay some floating debts. This places them entirely out of debt.

The Hemmet Place Church, St. Louis, Mo., is forced to face the proposition of enlarging their building. The audience crowd the present chapel. C. C. Garrigues is pastor.

"Church and School" is the name of an interesting, and neatly printed paper being published by the Eugene Bible University, Eugene, Ore. Harry Benton is the editor.

Du Quoin, Ill., March 15: Meeting of four weeks with W. E. Harlow and F. F. Dowdy and wife, evangelists, closed. There were forty-six additions.—Geo. W. Wise, pastor.

J. P. Lucas, pastor of the church at Trigley, Iowa, is preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons on character building. The series began March 7, and continues ten weeks.

Brazil, Ind., March 15: There were forty-seven accessions in meeting here. J. P. Myers of Shelbyville, assisted in exchange meeting. Bible-school booming. 365 yesterday. $17.35 collection. —E. L. Day.

Berkeley, Cal.: The offering at the First Church here yesterday totals $247.50, and exceeds our apportionment. This congregation is only three years from missionary support and is growing in missionary zeal.—I. N. McCash.

The Central Mexican Congregation is in the midst of a revival. The pastor, E. T. Westrup, is doing the preaching. The special services began Sunday, the 28th. There have been fifty-two confessions to date.—J. H. Fuller.

Arkansas City, Kan., March 11: Three additions Sunday. Large audiences and $42 for Foreign Missions. Sunday-school still booming. 257 present with $8.10 collections and sixty-five in boys' class (my class).—Thos. H. Papplewell.

Fulton, Mo., March 16: Fulton remains for the third year among the Living Link churches. Total amount of offering thus far $627.91. Of this amount $280 was contributed by William Woods College. Miss Rose Johnson of Akita, Japan, is our missionary. —W. H. Fite.

Fairmount, Ind., March 15: Meeting opening nicely. One week old and fourteen additions. Large chorus. House crowded at men's meeting Sunday afternoon. The church here has been organized less than a year. W. A. M. Kowan is the efficient pastor.—Austin Hunter.

Kansas City, March 12: J. A. Brown who has been evangelizing in California for several years, and has just concluded a meeting at Apache, Okla., with sixty additions and is now in a meeting at Waukomis, is at liberty to hold one or two meetings in Illinois and Missouri. He does good, sound work and has succeeded in some very difficult fields.

McMinnville, Ore., March 11: The greatest meeting ever held in the town. Seventy-five took their stand for Christ and his church. Brother Kendall, the pastor was a most willing and efficient worker from before the meeting started until the close. New families in the church, homes united in the faith, give the work a fresh impetus. Current expense account raised from $650 to over $1300. The new members came up grandly. We go to Lewiston, Idaho, next, followed by Amity and Dallas, Ore.—Whiston and Longman, evangelists.

Robert Lord Cave, pastor of the West Side Church, San Francisco, delivered an address upon "Abraham Lincoln," at a centenary celebration in the church under the auspices of the "Americans." The address is published in "The Americans," a local paper.

H. L. Lobdell, pastor of the church at Chico, Cal., who had received and accepted a call from the church at Trinidad, Colo., was so earnestly entreated by his congregation at Chico to remain with them that he feels compelled to ask the Trinidad church to release him.

Dean W. J. Lhamon, of the Bible College, Columbia, Mo., has engaged Byron L. Burditt as leader of song to assist him in evangelistic meetings. In addition to his evangelistic work Prof. Lhamon will accept invitations to deliver lectures singly or in series. He announces a course of ten lectures on "Evidential Studies in the Character of Christ." A series of ten lectures on "Comparative Religion," and a series on "New Testament Book Studies." Prof. Lhamon's experience as preacher and teacher of preachers has eminently fitted him for this important service.

W. S. Lockhart, Fayetteville, Ark., announces a Centennial series of sermons:

"First Century Christianity and Attempts at its Restoration."

"The Church in America at the Close of the 18th Century and Thomas Campbell."

"The Union of all Christians or Alexander Campbell."

"Seeking the Truth or Walter Scott."

"Casting off the Old or Barton W. Stone."

"The Spirit of this Movement."

"Its Doctrinal Program."

"Recent Theological Thought Concerning Christian Union."

"The Social Significance of a United Church."

L. R. Hotaling reports one addition to the church at Hoopeston, Ill., February 7.

The Memorial Church, Rock Island, Ill., closed a three weeks' meeting, the pastor, W. B. Clemmer, preaching, C. H. Altheide, singing evangelist, assisting, with twenty-five additions, fifteen by confession. The official board voted to continue in the livink-link line in both Home and Foreign Missions this year.

St. Louis, March 10: Following the Gipsy meetings in this city, the Hammett Place Christian Church held evangelistic services nightly for over three weeks, the pastor, C. C. Garrignes, doing the preaching. The immediate results were a quickening of the spiritual life of the whole church, and the accession of fifty-two to the membership. Among the accessions were two estimable Catholic ladies, who when they learned "the way of the Lord more perfectly," gladly embraced it. A strong influence for good in the meetings was the loyal support and faithful attendance of a portion of the society of Christian Endeavor, under the leadership of their president, Mrs. W. T. W. Byrum.—W. W. Dowling.

The Gloversville, N. Y., church closed a successful series of special meetings on Sunday, February 21. Joseph A. Serena, pastor of the Central Church of Syracuse was the evangelist. His clear-cut, forceful messages were an inspiration to the church membership and during his stay sixteen were added to the church, ten by confession and baptism and six by letter or statement. Through his preaching and pleasing personality, Mr. Serena won many friends. Pastor Cushing and his people feel very grateful to him for leaving his busy charge at Syracuse and coming to them for these meetings. One of the features of these special meetings was a Sunday afternoon and evening service in the leading theater of the city. When the present pastor, H. H. Cushing, came to Gloversville two years ago the actual membership was eighty-four. The present membership is 146. The building debt has been reduced from $1,400 to $900, and all interest paid to January 1. An active campaign is about to be inaugurated to wipe out during this our centennial year, the outstanding building debt.

LESS MEAT
Advice of Family Physician.

Formerly people thought meat necessary for strength and muscular vigor.

The man who worked hard was supposed to require meat two or three times a day. Science has found out differently.

It is now a common thing for the family physician to order less meat, as in the following letter from a N. Y. man:

"I had suffered for years with dyspepsia and nervousness. My physician advised me to eat less meat and greasy foods generally. I tried several things to take the place of my usual breakfast of chops, fried potatoes, etc., but got no relief until I tried Grape-Nuts food.

"After using Grape-Nuts for the cereal part of my meals for two years, I am now a well man. Grape-Nuts benefited my health far more than the $500.00 worth of medicine I had taken before.

"My wife and children are healthier than they had been for years, and we are a very happy family, largely due to Grape-Nuts.

"We have been so much benefited by Grape-Nuts that it would be ungrateful not to acknowledge it."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek., Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WITH THE WORKRS

The Gains Continue

The gain in the offering for Foreign Missions continues in an encouraging way. The receipts from the churches as churches for the week ending March 17, amounted to $8,084, a gain of $1,088. The total receipts for the same time were $9,935, a gain over the corresponding time one year ago of $2,410.

The total gain from the churches as churches since the March offering is $2,263. The gain in the total receipts from all sources for the same time amounted to $4,399.

The number of new Living-link churches already reported is seventeen, with a number more to hear from.

One of the most gratifying features of this Centennial campaign is the joy and enthusiasm with which the churches are making their gifts. They are giving out of the experience of a larger and holier life.

We must keep up a united and an aggressive movement until every missionary church is enrolled.

Please send your offerings promptly to the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Cincinnati, O.

Adult Bible Class Work in Missouri

Missouri falls into line for the nation-wide campaign for organized adult classes which has been set by our National Superintendent, Marion Stevenson. The special day set aside for this work is March 28, and we are hopeful that at that time every preacher in Missouri will present to his people the advantages of Bible study in the Bible school, and organize every adult Bible class which is not organized at that time. There are many classes which are already organized up to the International Standard, but have not yet secured their Certificate of Recognition. These should send at once to this office for application blanks and suggestions as to how to build up the class. There are other clases which are partially organized, these should be brought up to the International Standard at the earliest date posible. Let Missourians march in the front rank!

J. H. Hardin, State Supt.
J. H. Bryan, Supt. Adult Dept.

The Pacific Christian, published in San Francisco, has changed its editorship. W. B. Berry gives place to D. N. Russell. The paper will be published every week instead of biweekly as heretofore.

W. B. Harter has resigned the church at Rocky Ford, Colo., after a two years' pastorate. He will supply for three months at Sterling, Colo.

Indiana Harbor, Ind., March 13: A successful revival meeting of nineteen days was closed here last night, resulting in twenty confessions. C. A. Doolittle and G. A. Reinhardt were the efficient evangelists. C. J. Sharp greatly assisted us one evening with his church orchestra from Hammond. The town had been thoroughly canvassed beforehand. Indiana Harbor has a population of nearly 10,000, the men almost entirely employed in the steel mills. There are over 100 saloons and only three small American Protestant churches. It is a hard but needy field. Our church now owns two fine lots in a nice residence section of the town. A building fund has been started, and our motto is to build by August 1, 1909.—Mark S. Peckham, Minister.

Telegrams

Houston, Texas, March 22.—Closed Fresno, Calif., meeting March 7 with 226 additions. —H. O. Breeden.

Houston, Texas, March 22.—Central meeting forty-one yesterday, fifty-two in seven days. Breeden, Evangelist; Allheide, singer; Sanderson, minister.

Wichita, Kas., Marcn 21.—Central Church continues support of Dr. Jaggard. Also Brethren Butts and Schollenberger support another living link, and Mr. Hyde, a Presbyterian and our Brother Gill give one thousand dollars each—total three thousand two hundred dollars. Dr. Dye with us. Glorious day.—E. W. Allen.

Blackwell, Okla., March 22.—Greatest meeting in our history. Two hundred and fifty added, nearly all adults. Richard Martin and family, skilled, lofty, scriptural, strong on plea. City stirred. Whole families of business men and students baptized. Membership doubled and more. Bible school 324; Bro. Weimer's class 101, Dr. Wallace's 28, Mrs. Carson's 28.—G. M. Weimer, pastor.

Kansas City, Mo., March 22.—Nine added yesterday's regular services. Revivals in city aggregate report: First Church, Bro. Chilton, seventy-three; Ivanhoe, Fife and Sons, ninety-five; West side, thirty-one; Forrest Ave., twenty-five; Sheffield, eighteen; other additions, twenty-five. Three thousand five hundred in Sunday-schools. Denton and Trimble here in interest Home Missions. Optimistic note throughout.—James Small.

Des Moines, Ia., March 22.—Victorious day at the University Church yesterday. Crowning day of Brother Medbury's pastorate, and Brother Scoville's great campaign. Dr. Scoville conducted the dedicatory services for our new $75,000 auditorium, which seats 3,000 people and is the largest building built by the Disciples of Christ in a century. We asked for $30,000 and raised $35,000. As pastor and people, we are happy beyond expression. Brother Scoville proved himself a past master in dedications and in the Scoville meetings in our church. Has reached 680 converts with 1,544 in his Des Moines campaign to date. We are reaching many of the best citizens. One of the new converts of this week pledged $1,000 for the new church and another one $500 and many $100 or more. We are devoutly thankful for our consecrated pastor and the great victories granted us these days under the leadership of such men as Bro. Medbury and Bro. Scoville.—Hill M. Bell.

Valparaiso, Ind.: Closed short three weeks' campaign with 186 confessions. Forty-two today. Mostly adults. Large number men and young men. Regret exceedingly that we cannot continue, but haste due a month at Connersville already. Ellsworth Rogers doing fine work as singer. Few men could have made good in this university musical center. My plan of short quick meetings of three weeks instead of the long protracted efforts is succeeding beyond my fondest expectations. They have averaged over 200 confessions a meeting. I have had 2,534 confessions during the past year, much of the time without a singer, and over a thousand men. I am not emphasizing numbers to the sacrifice of real conversion but because our anti-evangelistic friends always ask us how many, same as others. When we preach we always expect conversions. Start Connersville, Ind., next.—Herbert Yeuell.

Church Debt Paid

A week ago Sunday night I was at the Augusta Church on the occasion of their burning the note against the church, amounting to $2,200. It was a time of rejoicing as the last vestige of church indebtedness went up in smoke. The debt had hung on for several years, and by special effort the Faithful made a canvass and succeeded in throwing off the incubus. The church treasurer reported that for the last twelve months the church, through its varied channels, had given more than $4,000. That certainly is a fine record. Brother W. A. Dawson, the pastor, has done splendid work, and begins his second year with the hearty sympathy and co-operation of the whole church. He has some most choice spirits to aid him in every good word and work.

Wichita, Kan., March 8. E. W. Allen.

Is This Fair?

Certain Proof Will Be Made That Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets Cure Stomach Trouble.

THIS EXPERIMENT FREE.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are made to give to the system, through the digestive tract and the stomach, the necessary chemicals not only to digest food, but to enrich the fluids of the body so that it may no longer suffer from dyspepsia or other stomach trouble.

We will send you a quantity of these tablets free, so that their power to cure may be proven to you.

Thousands upon thousands of people are using these tablets for the aid and cure of every known stomach disease. Know what you put into your stomach, and use discretion in doing so.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets contain fruit and vegetable essences, the pure concentrated tincture of Hydrastis (Golden Seal), which tone up and strengthen the mucous lining of the stomach, and increase the flow of gastric and other digestive juices; Lactose (extracted from milk); Nux, to strengthen the nerves controlling the action of the stomach and to cure nervous dyspepsia; pure Aseptic Pepsin of the highest digestive power and approved by the United States Pharmacopoeia.

One of the ablest professors of the University of Michigan recently stated that this Pepsin was the only aseptic pepsin he had found that was absolutely pure.—free from all animal impurities; Bismuth, to absorb gases and prevent fermentation. They are deliciously flavored with concentrated Jamaica Ginger—in itself a well known stomach tonic.

Liquid chemicals lose their strength the longer they are kept, through evaporation, fermentation and chemical changes, hence Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are recognized as the only true and logical manner of preserving the ingredients given above in their fullest strength.

If you really doubt the power of these tablets, take this advertisement to a druggist and ask his opinion of the formula.

It is due your stomach to give it the ingredients necessary to stop its trouble. It costs nothing to try. You know what you are taking, and the fame of these tablets prove their value. All druggists sell them. Price 50 cents. Send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 150 Stuart Building, Marshall, Mich.

Centennial Bulletin

By W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

Centennial Tithers.

Eugene, Ore., goes to the head of the list at the close of S. M. Martin's great meeting there with 120 tithers enrolled. Let Bethany, Neb. and East Dallas, Texas, look to their laurels! Let every church in the brotherhood that experiences financial troubles investigate the "Christian Use of the Tithing System." Send postage, fifteen cents per hundred, for this sixteen-page tract, the work of our pioneer missionary, G. L. Wharton.

Centennial Evangelism.

Glorious news of the soul-saving success comes from every quarter of the globe. We need to be reminded that it is time not only for evangelistic campaigns, but for the swarming of many of the old hives.

The glorious old church at Warren, Ohio, adopted at the beginning of the Centennial campaign the establishment of a second church in that city as one of its aims. The new church is now two years old, has doubled the two hundred members with which the mother church started it, and the old church is stronger than ever. The handsome house of the new congregation will be clear of debt before the end of the year. The Central Bible School runs above 500 in attendance, and the Second over 300. Let every preacher throughout the land follow the example of J. E. Lynn and C. O. Reynard. Ask for Scoville's "Every Christian an Evangelist." Centennial Leaflet No. 2, and send eight cents per hundred postage.

New Centennial Edition of the Declaration and Address.

The twenty-fifth thousand of the immortal document which fixed the date of our Centennial is coming off the press, and will be supplied at the established rate of ten cents per copy, $1 per dozen, $6 per hundred, prepaid. It is a handsome pamphlet of sixty-four pages and cover with portrait of the author. The price scarcely covers the cost of production and distribution. It is a pamphlet not only to read and to induce your neighbor to read, but to preserve as an heirloom in your home.

The Lord is Risen Indeed!

Say it! Sing it! Let the church bells ring it! If you believe it, wing it with the deeds of your risen life! Among these a high place belongs to the Centennial Easter Joint-offering for at home and abroad under the C. W. B. M. and the National Benevolent Association. Whether the Easter Offering is taken under the auspices of your church, Bible-school or Junior Endeavor Society, or all three, see that it is magnified. The salvation of individual lives depends upon it. The demonstration of Christ's divinity is in Rolling out the Roll Books.

Every mail bring in orders for the Centennial Roll Books from all parts of America. Every one who has looked into the matter is enthusiastic in his appreciation of the vast possibilities of this simple device as: First, an evangelistic lever. Second, a memorial monument. Third, a financial stimulas. Fourth, a spiritual anchor.

Roll Books for Australia.

Last week a Centennial Roll Book was sent to every church in Australia, New Zealand and Tasmania. The brethren on the other side of the world will celebrate the centennial in April. All their roll books are to be gathered in Sydney for exhibition during the Centennial. Thus every member of every widely scattered church can be present in name as well as in spirit, and so testifying for the faith once for all delivered unto the saints. After the Sydney celebration the books will be shipped to Pittsburg to form a part of the great roll of a million and a half.

Centennial Roll Books for England, Scandinavia, and All the Foreign Mission Fields.

This week a Centennial Roll Book is being sent to every church in Great Britain and Scandinavia, and to every mission station under foreign skies. When all these are returned properly filled out, it will be the most wonderful collection of personal names ever exhibited in America. Moreover, the quality of Christianity in foreign lands as exhibited by the crosses that follow the names on the roll, will give a new standard of excellence to many an American church. For instance, over there the Centennial aim, "All the church and as many more in the Bible-school" and "Not less than my income's tithe to God" are not ahead of the churches but behind them!

Roll Books on Approval.

To encourage the introduction of the Centennial Roll Books immediately in every church, they will be sent out on approval as requested. Let us know how large you hope to have the membership of your church before the Centennial, and we will send you immediately a roll book with capacity for 160, 320, 640, 960, or whatever the situation demands, with a price list that will let you know whether you are to remit 10, 15, 20, 25 cents or more in case you decide to keep the book, as of course you will.

Pittsburg and Round About

Soldiers' Memorial Hall will be completed in July. This makes it certain that the Centennial will have use of this magnificent building. Later good cuts will be available, and the brotherhood at large will be able to see how splendidly the Centennial can be housed in the Oakland district. The Soldiers' Memorial Hall, Carnegie Music Hall and the splendid stadium being erected for outdoor games will make a trinity of buildings of unsurpassed worth for this great convention.

Ministers of Pittsburg and vicinity met Monday, March 15, 1909, at 10:30 in the Book Room, 203 Bissell Block. There were twenty-seven present. Reports excellent. Thirty-five confessions and thirteen otherwise for the week. E. B. Quick of Dravosburg closed a short meeting at Bryn Mawr, a suburb of McKeesport with twenty-one added. G. W. Knepper not satisfied with eighty-six additions in his own church is helping Lawson Campbell at Squirrel Hill. In the upper Monongahela Valley a new Ministerial Association has been formed with H. E. Beckler, the vigorous minister at Monongahela, as president, and Norman W. Philips as secretary. C. L. Thurgood hears a brotherhood marching, tramp, tramp, tramp, right up to the Central's door. D. R. Moss is luring his men into a pleasant Sunday afternoon service of one hour. Good! M. J. Grable, W. H. Pinkerton and F. A. Wight took up the morning hour in inspirational talks. Brother Grable was present Lord's Day morning, March 14, at Salem, Ohio, and helped them to pay off $1,555.00 debt. The occasion was the celebration of their semi-centennial. W. R. Warren, centennial secretary, the busiest man in the city made a hasty trip to Warren, Ohio, Lord's Day, March 14, and visited both of the growing churches there. W. C. Crerie of Observatory Hill, Northside, will read the paper March 22, 1909. The subject will be "A Critical Study of Isaiah."

A very delightful reception was accorded Holly M. Hale, the new minister at Cragton, Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. Rev. Mr. Bruce of the Presbyterian Church made the welcome address in behalf of the ministers of this beautiful suburb of Pittsburg. Rev. Wallace Tharp of the First Church, Pittsburg, Northside, made the welcome address in behalf of the Christian Churches of Western Pennsylvania. The congregation there seems to be very happy in their new minister, and there promises to be some great things done in that splendid young church.

The Easter Offering

What a wonderful thing, this first Easter Day, the fulfillment of the glorious promise of Jesus to His disciples that he would come to them again and would not leave them orphans. This was the comfort He gave to their sorrowing hearts, and upon this first Easter Day of so long ago, he arose and returned to His disciples and they received Him with joy as He was as a dear father returned from the blessed other land.

For the love of our master shall we not ask all who attend our Bible Schools to hear the cry of the orphan? This is the meaning of the great call sent out by our two great organizations, the C. W. B. M. and the National Christian Benevolent Association. The C. W. B. M. has taken care of the helpless orphans under its shelter, and the special work that it has planned for the Centennial is the erection of the girls' orphanage building in Porto Rico; and besides this in the six orphanages it is caring for 500 of God's little ones, and is mothering one Babies' Home in India. These homes are in India and Porto Rico. The great, generous hearts of these glorious women are appealing to the friends and children on Easter Day for their assistance in carrying on this great work, in which the Benevolent Association is sharing. The great work of this association is the care of the orphan and the aged and sick. In the six orphan homes and the three homes for the aged and the two hospitals are gathered nearly 500 little ones besides those who are nearing the end of their life's journey and those who are sick.

It is a reproach to our Brotherhood that we have not done more for the help of these organizations and awakened to the great importance of such help. Shall we not on this beautiful Easter Day show our love for the dependent by bringing joy and help to them. Every Bible School in the Brotherhood and every organization of children and young people should respond freely and heartily to this call. Such a call belongs to the teaching and training of the great Bible School work. Will all interested in the great Bible School interests in the various states lay this matter on the hearts of all and urge universal observance of this day so that there may flow bountifully into the treasury of the C. W. B. M. and the Benevolent Association a great liberality?

SPRY AT 64
Keeps Well and Active on Postum.

Postum does one good because it is made of clean hard wheat and contains no drug or other harmful substance.

"My husband always had his coffee twice a day—thought he could not do without it," writes a N. Y. woman. "About twelve years ago he began to have bad spells.

"His head felt queer, was dizzy and sick at his stomach. The doctor would come, and prescribe for biliousness but medicines gave no permanent relief.

"In a short time the same old spells would return. This went on for years, until we dreaded these spells and feared he would become an invalid.

A friend to whom we told this experience said it was coffee. He had been the same way and stopped drinking coffee and got well by change to well-made Postum.

"He told us to be sure to make it right, according to directions on pkg. Now we like Postum as well as coffee, and I can't remember when my husband has had a sick day.

"Those bad spells are a thing of the past. He is 64, works every day and is as spry as a boy. We have been using Postum a year and a half and are glad to have a delicious drink which does not injure us as coffee did."

Chilton in Kansas City

Editor Christian Century:—C. M. Chilton, pastor of the First Christian Church, of St. Joseph, has just closed a series of meetings, of three weeks' duration, with the First Christian Church of this city. His strong, logical, scriptural sermons made a profound impression upon all who heard him. The church is edified in the faith of the gospel, and seventy-three were added to its membership, about half of them by confession and baptism. The spirit and zeal of Bro. Chilton communicated themselves to his auditors, and impressions were made upon multitudes of souls that only eternity can reveal. Our congregation is greatly strengthened by his coming, and heartened for its great task in the heart of this great and growing city.

Macfarlane at Decatur April 9

Illinois brotherhood banquet to have National Secretary as Chief Speaker.

April ninth the laymen composing the Brotherhoods of Disciples of Christ of Central Illinois, will gather at Decatur for their annual banquet. The affair will occur in the great Christian Temple of Decatur, which can accomodate somewhere between six and seven hundred banqueters in the main portion of the building, and several hundred additional on the auditorium platform. The banquet will be preceded by two days session of the Central Illinois Ministerial Institute, which is to have some National lights as the platform orators. Especially is this true of the closing day, which is also the date of the banquet. T. W. Grafton speaks in the afternoon on Practical Methods of Boy Culture, and again in the evening on "Finding the Boy." Other speakers of the Institute are W. F. Richardson, Kansas City, Prof. A. C. Gray and Alva W. Taylor of Eureka, T. T. Holton and J. H. Gilliland of Bloomington, N. S. Haynes, Decatur, Russell F. Thrapp, Jacksonville, W. W. Sniff, Paris and Harold E. Monser, Champaign. The banquet will be the crowning feature of the meeting, and will occur promptly at six o'clock. General Secretary Peter C. Macfarlane, of the National Brotherhood, will address the banquet on the brotherhood theme. After adjournment which is set for 7:45 o'clock, the Institute will take up its closing session in the Central Christian Church, which is to be addressed by T. W. Grafton of Anderson, Indiana. Decatur is the hot bed of the Illinois Brotherhoods, being adjacent to Springfield, Jacksonville, Peoria, Bloomington, Champaign, and Danville, from all of which the banqueters will come. Special cars on the Illinois Traction System will be engaged and many of the brotherhoods will come in a body, returning the same night. Plans are already well laid for a state organization, and a committee composed of R. F. Thrapp, F. W. Burnham, and Edgar De Witt Jones will report on permanent organization. Officers of the Institute are Louis O. Lehman, of Gibson City, President, and Wm. G. McColley of Normal, Secretary. It is decreed that the State Brotherhood shall banquet each year at the time and place of the State convention. Affiliation with the National Organization is assumed and the magazine "Christian Men" endorsed.

The Temptation and the Vision of Sin

At this season of the year when the memory of our Savior's temptation in the wilderness comes to us again and again in the quiet hours of meditation over his work "for us men and our salvation," it is natural that we should recall the manner in which the great teachers and prophets of our faith have tried to set forth the essential truths of religion for human instruction. Augustine's "City of God" is such a book. Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living and Dying" is another signal aid to the devout life. Bunyan's great allegories, "The Pilgrim's Progress" and "The Holy War" have been the means of quickening thousands to a new sense of divine things. The noble poems of Milton, the "Paradise Lost" and "Paradise Regained" shaped the thought and molded the speech of more than one generation of the godly.

But probably no single work of the religious imagination ever produced such profound effects upon the minds and consciences of men as Dante's immortal Vision. The women of Verona, who shrunk from him as he passed along their streets, saying that he went to and fro between earth and hell at his will, caused the great singer to smile a little to himself as he went his way. But they had spoken more truly than they knew, for to him the secrets of the heart of man were open, and in the heart of man lie heaven, purgatory and hell.

In reading over again the "Inferno" one is struck with the resemblance to the three temptations of Jesus. The sins which are punished in that terrible cavern, which was hollowed in the earth when Satan came plunging to his ruin from the heights of heaven, are those of which the temptations of Jesus forever speak. In the higher ranges of hell, with lighter torments, are punished those whom the flesh has led astray. Here are the victims of passion, of gluttony, of avarice and of anger. These sins Dante and the men of his time conceived to be the results of unrestrained desire. If their punishments are not so harsh as those of other sins it is because they have already met their retribution in part in the loathing and scorn of mankind. On such offenders Jesus looked always with a measure of compassion. They had already suffered. They were under constant condemnation. They bore the fruits of their sins in their faces and their bodies. He needed not to condemn them; something could be taken for granted in the laws of justice.

The second range corresponds in character with the second temptation of our Lord. Here no longer do we find the carnal sinners, but those whom pride has betrayed into violence. Outrages against self or neighbor or God, the fruits of presumption and arrogance, are revealed in their true character by the penalties to which they lead. Here is the terrible wood of the suicides, whose trees are the souls of the self-destroyers on whose branches the harpies come to nest. Here are the tortured spirits of the violent against society, against nature and against God, who wander evermore on the burning sand, smitten by the fearful rain of fire.

But lower still, and separated from the violent, as those were from the carnal sinners, are the malicious and false, who were no mere victims of impulse, nor even hurried into violence by pride and self-will. They are those who by deliberate fraud have wrought ruin in the world. Their sin is far blacker because it was premeditated and wilful. Here, chastised with frightful tortures in the trenches of Malebolge, are the seducers, the flatterers, the Simonists, the fortune-tellers, the barterers of offices, the hypocrites, the thieves, the evil counsellors, the sowers of scandal and the falsifiers. Only one deeper hell could be conceived, and that was the black hole of treachery, where the basest of mankind keep company with Judas Iscariot and Satan in the pit of the Inferno. All these crimes are the results of that selfishness and ambition which made its deadly attack upon our Lord in his wide-sweeping glance at "all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them," by whose allurement the tempter sought to win him to compliance.

These three temptations so profoundly seductive to human nature, the lust of the flesh, the lust of vanity and the lust of ambition, are the very ones portrayed both in the wilderness vigil of Jesus and in the vivid pages of the "Divine Comedy" on the slopes of the Inferno. Nor are we to lose sight of the profounder teachings of Dante's great Vision concerning sin. He would have us know that it pulls the soul down by powerful and ceaseless gravitation. It was easy for the poet and Virgil, his guide, to descend from level to level of the underworld. But it was only by the most toilsome of climbing that they again regained the sweet air with its vision of the stars.

Moreover, while Dante's pictures of the torments of the damned were no doubt true to the theological beliefs of his day, yet it was less with the future than the present that he was concerned. If any one had asked him whether he really believed that gluttons would wallow in the mire forever, Simonists would be tortured by the play of flickering fire upon their naked soles, and traitors would be congealed in ice, he would no doubt have affirmed this creed, true to the teachings of St. Thomas Aquinas and the church. But far more would he have insisted that these torments are the best picture of the soul here and now, living in and loving sin. The men he met in Florence, Verona, Padua and Paris were many of them already in hell, and their lives could not be more truly pictured than in such scenes of horror. This grim truth of the spiritual life Dante had learned from One who spoke the tenderest, yet most warning and blasting words that ever fell upon human ears.

But Dante knew of no hope for these sinners in hell. There was no upward passage which the evil spirits would seek. No guards were needed on duty at the gates of the Inferno to drive back those who sought escape, for none sought it. In this he was both right and wrong. The name of Jesus is never once pronounced in the lonely regions of Dante's hell. But he had to recognize the redemptive feature in all the ways of God, and true to the Catholic doctrine of which he was a loyal son, he wrought out his vision of purgatory to satisfy the sense of justice in the Scriptures and the soul of man. The poets of later days have omitted this feature of the dread Vision, and have seen everywhere that long-suffering mercy of God which yearns and follows and waits in hope that the lost may return. It is that glowing hope which our faith makes clear. As long as character still develops, the hope is not gone. The prospect may seem dreary, the soul may seem quite hardened in sin, but the "love of God is broader than the measure of man's mind."

Nowhere is this quenchless sense of awakening good in even the vilest souls more vividly set forth than in Tennyson's "Vision of Sin," whose closing words of promise write themselves across even the gloomiest tragedies of human failure:

> "At last I heard a voice upon the slope,
> Peal to the summit. 'Is there any hope?'
> To which an answer came from that high land,
> But in a tongue no man could understand;
> And on the glimmering limit far withdrawn
> God made Himself an awful rose of Dawn."

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

WIRELESS ON MOVING TRAINS

Whatever will reduce the possibility of collision on the railroad tracks is a national mercy. Soon law will compel the use of the block signal universally and interlocking devices are well nigh perfected already. The Lake Shore has been experimenting recently with wireless telegraphy on moving trains and the experiments have met with success. The Hertzian wave is used and the messages received at any one of various stations. If it proves practicable it will enable the dispatcher to correct mistaken orders, the engineer to be warned of impending dangers, the trainmen to give immediate news of accidents on the way. The latter was demonstrated in these experiments. A truck broke on a train some miles out of Chicago and a wireless called a repair train from Elkhart immediately, thus saving hours of time and the busy tracks from impeding traffic.

WIRELESS AND THE TERRIBLE BOMB

Another achievement of wireless that threatens to create a most terrible engine of destruction in warfare has recently been successfully demonstrated. A small dirigible balloon was sent up, such as could be loaded with deadly bombs. The operator sent it whither he wished by manipulating a transmitting device on the ground, and released pseudo-bombs at will. The Germans have attached cameras to carrier pigeons and obtained very good landscape photographs. The "snap" is taken by a time attachment, set so as to take the photograph at the time it would be calculated the bird would be flying over the enemies camp or fortification. Compared with the wireless balloon, for even this purpose, the pigeon is a bird of mere chance. It would put the best fortified city at the mercy of an approaching enemy, enable a warship to greatly increase its battle effectiveness against coast fortifications, threaten sadly a fleet of ships, and do terrible havoc to an army camp.

NON-POLITICAL JUDGES

The party system may be necessary to democratic government, but no system is all inclusive. Its virtues may lie in its exceptions. Certainly it has been demonstrated that the party system is ruinous to good city government. The cities that are cleaning up are doing so by grace of the independent voters and in spite of the party ballot. When the balance of power is held by the clean and intelligent citizenship of a city or state the parties will nominate tickets that meet their approval and our cities will cease to be the shame and the menace of our democracy.

Montana leads us into a new realm of nonpartisan action and one that ought instantly to commend itself to the thoughtful consideration of the country and to be followed with interest as an experiment that promises to perform a most needed service. A law has been passed in this new commonwealth that forbids party nomination of judges and attempts to take their election out of party consideration. There will be but one printed ballot and the names of the nominees are determined by petition without reference to party affiliation. Doubtless, for a time, men will be put forward as party men though not so denominated on the ticket, but it will release the voter from the party ticket and thus the temptation to "vote 'er straight." It may confine the election also more to those who can cast an intelligent vote. It will enable able and independent men to be nominated. It will educate the people to the fact that the judiciary ought to be nonpartisan.

The one pitfall to be avoided is that of giving precedence to any one candidate by giving him a monopoly of first place on the ballots. This is a weakness in many primary systems. Unless the voter has a personal choice he tends to vote for the first name. Had Senator Hopkins been last instead of first on the primary ballot in Illinois there is little doubt that he would have been defeated. A candidate for one of the larger court offices in the same state appeared first at the office of the Secretary of State and supposed of course that he would thereby win first place on the ballot. To his surprise the present incumbant, an old party warhorse, a long time office holder and a badly soaked victim of whisky was given the precedence. This being an office that comes little into public view, yet withal one of some importance, the majority of the voters took little interest and it was a foregone conclusion that the first name on the ticket would win by the universal default of intelligence regarding either the candidates or the office.

It is to be hoped that Montana will provide that the order of the names on the ballots will be changed on every batch of ballots printed and that each man will have as many first places as lasts. This will not change informed voting and it will give even chances among the uninformed.

THE EXPRESS GOLCONDA

Charges have been filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission against the great express companies. It is charged that they are a monopoly, arbitrarily make rates, discriminate according to pleasure, and control legislation. There is no express competition. The rate is always the same no difference which company makes it. The directors sit on various of the directorates. It is charged that they make each year 100% on actual investment. They pay less wages and require longer hours of their employees than does the postoffice department. They charge excessive rates and are not nearly so expeditious as is the postoffice department. Senator Platt has long been known as their official representative in the United States Senate. They have been able thus far to defeat all efforts to get a government parcels post. They are strong enough to make their own rate with the public and, it is believed, with the railroads as well.

GOVERNMENT PARTNERSHIP WITH PRIVATE BUSINESS

Those who protest very vigorously and cry "socialism" when government ownership of a natural monopoly is advocated, quite as ardently will advocate the subsidizing of private business if it can be shown to be of general public benefit. They have great confidence in the integrity of men who receive the people's money in conducting a public business for private profit, but none in the same men should they become the agents of this same government in the conduct of the people's business.

A perennial proposal is that to subsidize merchant vessels. It comes up in one way or another at every session of congress and has been habitually defeated because congressmen know that the American people are opposed to the old world policy of government partnership with private business, the private business taking the profits, the nation furnishing the margin of chance and receiving certain very elusive general benefits.

The last bill was one to subsidize merchant ships for the carrying of mail between our own and certain South American and Australasian ports. A careful scrutiny of the bills reveals the fact that the ships would be comparatively slow and of practically no use in the merchant marine. Yet it would enable vessels flying the American flag to make these ports and give us a mail service to them. It would also expedite the opening of a direct line of trade with South America. But by the arguments of the same school, private business and free competition would best do all such work and we will have a direct trading line with any place as soon as the natural laws of trade demand it.

This bill was defeated in the House by but two votes. Its passage would have been the signal for a general policy of subsidization to building up a ship flying the American flag. That is, we will make it impossible to build ships on our native soil by putting a high tariff on steel and lumber and forbidding the flag to fly on any vessel not made at home. Then we will pay a rich subsidy in order to get the ships built at home under these forbidding laws. A tariff may be a good thing if properly laid and it is certainly very desirable that we have an American merchant marine, but would it not be more sensible to both let Americans build their own vessels in open competition with the world and put the American flag on any ship that will fly it under our laws? This is the kind of a bill that calls the corruptionists to congress. A powerful lobby worked for the measure.

THE BIG GIFTS

The reports for the big gifts during 1908 are out; $120,000,000 is accounted for. More than one half, or $61,000,000, went to education. Galleries and museums received $22,000,000. One of the most sensible gifts of the year was that of Mrs. Sage's $10,000,000 for the investigation of causes and remedies for social distress. Rockefeller gave more than one-third of the total. Much of his money goes to help the smaller schools and $2,000,000 goes for medical research. Carnegie is fifth in the list with but about $9,000,000 to his credit.

The immense sums are usually given to art galleries, museums, libraries and to the great universities. The tendency of the last year has been quite markedly toward a wider distribution among the masses and for their more vital needs. It is questionable whether it is wisest to bestow millions on a few great schools instead of helping the many smaller ones that reach the multitudes. The masses are helped most in the public schools and libraries. The great giver who can find a way to diffuse his benefactions to the greatest number and where is the greatest need will be the greatest benefactor. There is yet to arise the man who will bestow millions upon the greatest and most far reaching philanthropy of the age—that of foreign missions.

EDITORIAL

Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, one of the oldest and best known of American preachers and pastors, died a week ago, leaving a record of more than half a century of effective pulpit and pastoral service. He has been an honored member of the New York ministerial body for probably a longer time than any other man, and his writings have made him a familiar counsellor and guide to hosts of younger ministers throughout America and the world.

Rev. Charles Stelzle, who is the Secretary of the Church and Labor Department of the Presbyterian Board, is now in Europe and has recently addressed several large audiences in England on his special theme of "The Church and the Working People." He has met an enthusiastic reception for his message wherever he has gone. We need a Stelzle among the Disciples of Christ as an interpreter of the great social movement of our time. We have some such men. Arthur Holmes, of Philadelphia, has opened to us something of the richness of this field of Christian service. Perhaps Secretary Macfarlane of the Christian Brotherhood will emphasize this feature in a manner justified by its importance.

The attention of the churches is now being called to the offering for Home Missions. Lord's Day, May 2, is the time set for this simultaneous participation in American Evangelization. The Centennial Celebration will be a notable success in proportion as the number of churches contributing to the missionary enterprises exceeds the number of contributing churches last year. We are informed by the Secretaries of the Home Board that the signs are good for a great offering this year. Churches that have never ordered supplies have sent in their orders early in the year. A number have volunteered to increase their apportionment. A number of individuals have begun to inquire into the Living Link plan. Several have addressed inquiries concerning the Annuity Plan of work. Unless all signs fail, the Home Board will go up to Pittsburg with its coveted $200,000.

One of the greatly needed improvements in the transportation facilities of this city is a subway, plans for which are now being prepared by leading engineers. The congestion of traffic, especially at the rush hours of the day, has long made necessary some scheme of relief. It now seems probable that within two or three years a subway connecting the three sides of the city will be in operation. Another feature of great importance to the social and particularly the artistic life of Chicago will be the construction of a boulevard connecting the north and south sides of the city in the extension of Michigan avenue across the river to connect with the North Shore Drive. Chicago has a water frontage not surpassed for beauty of effect by any city in the world. With the finishing of Grant Park by the filling now going forward east of the Illinois Central tracks, the erection of the Field Columbian Museum, and other buildings, of which the Art Institute is the beginning, there will be created near the heart of the city a complex of beautiful and artistic features which will not only emphasize the æsthetic but will increase the business value of Chicago.

It is a matter of congratulation that some of the most reputable daily newspapers, such as the Boston Herald, have decided to discontinue the pictorial supplement for chidren, which, under the guise of a comic addition to the Sunday paper, is in reality the vehicle of the most inartistic, senseless, and even vicious ideas and impressions. A child's mind is easily influenced by the stories and still more by the pictures which come under his eye. Certainly few favorable characteristics could be found in the average colored supplement of the Sunday papers. They are chiefly devoted to the antics and exploits of smart and unspeakable youths whose language and deportment are intended to be humorous, but are, as a matter of fact, degrading to the taste and moral ideals of a child. Even where the elements of artistic taste are not brutally ignored or violated, the effect of most of the comic illustrations is either inane or questionable. When children are taught to find satisfaction in pictures which have artistic merit and at least the additional value of being measurably humorous, we may expect a generation whose interest in true art will be higher than that which is possible under the reign of the noxious and vulgar Sunday comic supplement.

Mr. Roosevelt's retirement from public life does not promise for him that seclusion into which most of our ex-presidents withdraw. As one of the editors of the Outlook he will have constant opportunity to declare in his vigorous and forthright fashion his views upon public questions. An illustration of this opportunity is given in his introductory editorial in the Outlook of March 6 where, in commenting upon that type of journalism from which the Outlook is removed by wide diameters, he says of his colleagues on the editorial staff: "They are as far removed as the poles from the apostles of that hideous yellow journalism which deifies the cult of the mendacious, the sensational, and the inane, and which, throughout its wide but vapid field, does as much to vulgarize and degrade the popular taste, to weaken the popular character, and to dull the edge of the popular conscience, as any influence under which the country can suffer. These men sneer at the very idea of paying heed to the dictates of a sound morality; as one of their number has cynically put it, they are concerned merely with selling the public whatever the public will buy—a theory of conduct which would justify the existence of every keeper of an opium den, of every foul creature who ministers to the vices of mankind."

Bible students who have any acquaintance with the work of archaeological research in Palestine during recent years will be pained to learn of the death of Dr. Selah Merrill on January 22, at the home of his sister in Fruitdale, California. Dr. Merrill was for sixteen years United States consul at Jerusalem and did a large amount of work through a period covering more than thirty-five years for the American Palestine Exploration Society, especially on the site of ancient Jerusalem. His writings on Palestine geography and archaeology have made him exceedingly well known. His recently published work on "Ancient Jerusalem" was issued very near the date of the appearance of George Adam Smith's monumental two volume work on that city. Dr. Merrill was an enthusiast in labors of this kind. A man of very positive convictions regarding the correctness of his views, he was at the same time a genial companion and friend to those who availed themselves of his suggestions. He would leave the duties of his consular office in Jerusalem to go about with visitors exploring the interesting sites of the ancient city. During the last years of his life he was afflicted with a disease of the throat which deprived him entirely of the power of speech and made it necessary for him to resort wholly to writing in conversation. This was especially trying to one of his vigorous and active temperament. Dr. Merrill's views on some points of Palestine topography, such as the defense of the traditional site of Mount Zion, have not seemed convincing to students of the question, but the services he rendered to his country and to scholars through long labors have been abundant and appreciated.

A Letter From Jerusalem.

Mr. Edward A. Henry, who has been a graduate student at the University of Chicago for the past three years, is spending the winter in Palestine as one of the members of the American School of Archaeological Study and Research, whose director for this year is Professor Robert Francis Harper of the University of Chicago. Mr. Henry, who is an earnest Disciple, writes enthusiastically of his experiences in Palestine. In a former letter he described his journey to Petra, the great rock city of the region south of the Dead Sea. The following is a portion of a letter recently received from him. His friends and others who are interested in Palestine will read it with interest.

"Jerusalem, February 13, 1909.—My dear Dr. Willett: We are having great times here since our return from Petra. We have attended the Greek and Latin Christmas exercises and the Greeek Epiphany exercises at the Jordan. I have spent over a week in Bethlehem. Dr. Harper and our other men here and myself have made two trips since the opening of the new year, one by carriage to Ramleh, Ekron, Ashdod, Jamnia and back. We expected to go further but rain and heavy mud prevented. The second trip was on horseback with full camp outfit. We visited Hebron, Carmel of Judah, Beersheba, Gaza, Askalon, Tell-el-Hesy and other interesting sites where excavations have been made in that vicinity, and then came back to Jerusalem by way of Philip's Well and Ain Karim. We were eleven days in the saddle and had a most delightful time. We found the so-called Horite dwellings in the regions about Beit Jibrin most interesting. Great rock caves they are. One appreciates them when he has roamed through them, climbed up and down the stairways from one bell-chamber to another for hours at a time. I have more than a dozen flash light pictures of these interiors.

"As winter is really here now, I do not think that I shall be out of the city much for the next few weeks, but there is much to see in the city and its environs. Fraternally yours, Edward A. Henry."

George Adam Smith on the Brotherhood Movement.

It is perhaps not sufficiently appreciated that many of the men who are foremost in the world of scholarship are also enthusiastic workers in the practical ministries of the church and social service. In the charitable and redemptive work of the city of Glasgow no man is better known that Professor G. A. Smith, president of the local association for social service, and an untiring worker not only in church activities, but in the broader work of interdenominational effort in behalf of the poor and dependent. He spends much of his time also in labors promotive of such Christian work as the Pleasant Sunday Afternoon movement, and the work of the Christian brotherhoods throughout Great Britain. Recently he wrote to the secretary of one of these organizations a letter which states admirably his attitude toward efforts of this kind. The letter in part is as follows:

"I hope you will have a large gathering, and that by prayer and the counsel of wise men both inspiration and guidance may be obtained for one of the most potential movements of our time. The more I have to do with men's Sunday meetings in the great centers of our population, the more I am impressed with the possibilities of their separate organizations and of their federation. They mean a very great deal already, and if wisely conducted in dependence on God they are undoubtedly to mean much more. I would emphasize three points, (1) Loyalty to Christ and His Gospel. (2) Loyalty to the organized Christianity of our time. (3) Loyalty to the social service, which in the example of Christ and under the power of His redeeming love we owe to our generation. With regard to these three, I am struck with the fact that no addresses are more welcome at men's Sunday meetings than the directly religious; there is no real hostility to religion among the men of our land even when they are outside the churches. Certainly the most successful meetings here are those in which we have insisted on the vital connection between the two—each necessary and helpful to the other. A man's religion cannot be complete till it is shared, as it can alone be, on the floor of the church with his wife and children. I feel strongly that every Sunday meeting for men should devote five or six or more meetings in the year to the study of the Bible. It could easily be done, and I feel certain it would be welcomed universally."

The King Weeping in His Triumph

A PALM SUNDAY SERMON

By Charles Clayton Morrison

There is something surprising and at first puzzling in the event of the first Palm Sunday long ago. What Jesus does and allows others to do in the beginning of that last week of his life seems hardly consistent with the attitude that he had taken hitherto in his ministry. Time and again Jesus had suppressed popular enthusiasm for Him, and if it could not be suppressed He escaped from the multitude which offered Him worldly tribute and honor.

Once, certainly, and probably many times, He had refused to be called the people's king, but on this first day of His last week the people come in throngs with singing and shouting and exultation, and call Him "the king who cometh in the name of the Lord," and wave their garments as he advances, shouting, "Hosanna, Hosanna, in the highest!" Instead of quieting the multitudes, Jesus rebukes the critical pharisees who suggest to Him to abate the tumult, with the indignant reply, "If these should hold their peace the very stones of the ground would cry out." He seems not only to have allowed His disciples and the people to exult in His entrance into the city, but to have planned the entrance Himself even with some detail.

The City Given over to Holiday.

Jerusalem was packed and overflowing with visitors. The scattered fragments of Israel had gathered in numbers of more than a million from all parts of the world, as their custom was, to keep the Feast of the Passover. They filled all the houses and taverns of the city and the streets thereof. They dwelt in little camps outside the walls along the roadsides leading to the city. They filled and overflowed the surrounding villages and hamlets. They were a great crowd—eager, expectant, suggestible. Throughout this vast concourse stories had been passed from lip to lip concerning Jesus, the prophet of Galilee, His wonderous works of healing and His teaching and His gracious ministry. Just now imagination had been inflamed with the news of the raising of Lazarus from the dead; and with the announcement that Jesus was in Bethany the ardor of the people reached fever heat. Everyone was asking whether the Prophet would come up to the feast. Interest in Him was about to eclipse interest in the feast itself.

For many days past Jesus' movements had been conducted with a high degree of secrecy. The cloud of hatred had been lowering over Him for the past half year, so that although he had carried on his ministry in the vicinity of Jerusalem, he had kept well away from the authorities who were only waiting for some fair pretext by which they might apprehend him. It seemed clear to Jesus' own soul that the hour of his death was drawing nigh. He saw that it could hardly be postponed beyond the Passover Feast, and it was evidently His desire to remain with His disciples at least until that time. But it was his purpose to keep the Feast. Coming with His little company of followers, He found entertainment in that beloved home of Lazarus and his sisters in Bethany, where, no doubt, He found quiet and rest for His weary body and mind. Rising early in the morning before the residents had left their houses or the visitors their tents, Jesus had gone apart to pray, and, returning to the home of Mary and Martha, undoubtedly heard the comments and felt the thrill of enthusiasm which His passing evoked.

The Gathering of the Procession.

After the morning meal he set out with His disciples toward the city and to His surprise was met by a throng of people coming from the city to meet Him. They had heard of His presence in Bethany, and had gathered together in a company to escort Him from the quiet hamlet into the midst of the city's thronging excitement. Seeing the procession and knowing the purpose of it, conscious also of the universal excitement in and around Jerusalem on account of his presence there, he perceived that it would be impossible for him to escape some tribute at their hands. He therefore proceeded to offer himself to them, but in such a manner that his action might be at once a rebuke to their worldly conception of his kingdom, and an object-lesson setting forth the true character of his reign. So, turning to his disciples, he bade two of them go back into the village which they had just left and fetch the young ass which they had seen tied, likely at the door of one of Jesus' own friends. By the time the procession from the city had come up, the two disciples had returned with the colt and upon it Jesus sat. The multitude together moved toward the city, those from Jerusalem leading the procession and those from Bethany and the countryside following Jesus.

If the people had had their way, they would have placed Jesus upon a fiery horse, the symbol of war and military victory. But Jesus precluded such an embarrassment to his cause by quickly conceiving the plan of riding upon the ass which was the symbol of peace and service. "The enthusiasm suggested the riding, not the riding the enthusiasm." In contrast to his treatment of the enthusiasm of the people when he fed the 5,000 from five loaves and two fishes, escaping from their presence at the offer of the crown, Jesus now seems to feel that his hour is come, that events are of equal significance or insignificance in the presence of august death. So, the important thing for him is to teach the lesson of true kingship while he is submitting to the tribute of mere worldly kingship. He has been a prophet. All his ministry up to date has been the ministry of a prophet. A teacher and leader of the people he has been. He fore-sees that in his dying he will be the priest offering himself as the sacrifice upon the cross, and in this moment when the multitude calls him king, he means not to disown the title, but, accepting it, to give it the interpretation it carries in his own thought. The riding to Jerusalem, therefore, amid the Hosannas and the songs of the people, riding over their garments and the palms and flowers they spread in his way, was a parable in action, a dramatization of the whole purpose and mission of Jesus.

The Perfect Poise of Christ.

It is significant how perfectly poised Jesus carried himself all the way to his death. He moved toward his cross with great dignity. Never for a moment do you have the impression that he went scourged like a slave to his dungeon. Facing the inevitable and the horrible, he maintains his perfect self-command. Even now, in the midst of this wild demonstration of the people, we do not find any signs of fanaticism or hysteria or weakness. He is not taken off his feet by the adulation of the populace. He submits with utter passivity to their demonstration while in the depths of his soul pathos, not ecstasy, reigns. He penetrates the depths of the enthusiasm, he knows how shallow it is and how crass the motives which actuate it, and so, not for a moment deceived by its apparent scope and power, he weeps as he approaches the great city of his love.

As King, Jesus' thought of himself, illustrated in the drama of his riding to the city, is in striking contrast to the thought of the shouting clamant people. First of all, his kingdom is within; it is a silent rule of God in the hearts of men. He has no thought of storming the world. The terms in which he states his purpose and method are not military terms. He has no dream that Jerusalem is really represented in the excitement of this hour. The work of the spirit is not done amid tumult and tempest and excitement and clamor, be it ever so favorable, but in the quiet of the soul where choices are made with clear perception of their full significance. So Jesus thinks of the quiet imperceptible process of leavening the lump of the world by placing his truth like yeast at the center of it. No man knew better than Jesus that there may be much sound and fury signifying nothing.

"My Kingdom Not of This World."

And secondly, Jesus' scepter by which he rules the world is not the scepter which this shouting throng would place in his hand. They saw Rome melt away; they saw the glory of David and Solomon reinstated; they saw the armies of Israel led by Jesus set in battle array against the Roman legions; they saw a throne set up and the son of David ruling all the world from out the holy city. But quite another vision filled the soul of Jesus. From that hour in the wilderness when he had refused the offer of the kingdoms of this world and the power of them, even to the present, there had been no moment of weakness in Jesus' mind as to the kind of a rule he was to exercise over mankind. He was to reign from within out, not from without in. His was to be a reign of the heart, not of the mailed hand. The rulers of this world exercised lordship over men, but this king riding in lowly state conceives his rule in terms of service. Thus in the very hour of his supreme self-consciousness as the Son of God, possessed of all authority in heaven and in earth, he takes the world's feet in his hands and washes them. O, there has never been seen anything like it—ruling the world with tears, winning Jerusalem and the whole world by weeping over it! His love was his scepter. His power was in his heart.

Christ's Right to Command Men.

And the third point of disparity between Jesus' mind at this moment and that of the crowd was in respect to the ground of his authority over them. They hailed him as the Son of David. Possessing David's office they assumed that he would exercise David's authority, that he would assert his will and by virtue of his superior office see that it was executed. But Christ knew himself to be no such king as this. His will he does not intrude upon the consciences of men. What he comes to do is to evoke and realize the possibilities of each human life over which he reigns. Each man will find in his own soul the best testimony to Christ's authority. "Judge not ye yourselves what is right?" he asked of those who sought for a sign and certificate of his right to teach. The best in man responds to Jesus with its, "Even so, what thou sayest is true." The right of Jesus to command men depends upon no certificate from the sky, upon no marvelous wonder, upon no metaphysical demonstration of his official status. His best credentials are in the soul of every honest hearer of his voice.

The source of Jesus' power was believed by the throng to be might, and his right to exercise it they expected to be guaranteed by some sign from heaven which should startle and nonplus and overwhelm all his objectors and all doubts. His miracle of healing the sick of the palsy afforded no adequate guarantee to the critics that he could also forgive his sins. But to the man himself the right to forgive was proved by the fact that he had forgiven. His proof that he has the right to lay down the golden rule is the fact that it meets the highest judgment of our moral nature. Christ and his truth are his greatest miracle. Christ is greater than reason and carries reason up to heights it never could attain without his self-revelation. When a man has looked once fairly into the face of Jesus Christ, he says, "There is my best self; there is what I ought to be and by God's grace I will be."

Challenge Our Own Attitude Toward Christ.

Now, as we stand this morning in the presence of the kingly Christ, singing his praises today, shouting our enthusiasm for him, hailing the power of Jesus' name, and calling even angels to bow prostrate before him, are we ourselves acclaiming him with the mere admiration of the shallows of our life, or do we own allegience to him in the depths whence our motives spring? It is one thing to admire Jesus, and a very different thing to give him loving obedience; and it is important for everyone who names his name to search his heart and see if his devotion to Jesus is the frothy, superficial admiration of Jerusalem on the Palm Sunday, or the resolute, quiet, deep conviction of loyalty to him which stirs in the roots of our conscience? Are we simply following in Christ's triumphal procession? Are we moving with the crowd? Are our Hosannas simply the expression of wrought up emotions? Or do they reflect the satisfaction and gladness that we feel in the center of our life at the approach of the Christ who will deliver us from our sin and our selfishness and our materialism, and make us priests and kings in the world of spirit and light? How much does Jesus mean to us, not for some abstract sin from which we make ourselves think he has delivered us, but for these actual sins that we find ourselves committing every day and that we take pleasure in, even while we hate them, and these temptations of ours that we face in the morning and at noon and at evening? These sins of temper and of cynicism and of covetousness and all forms of self-seeking—does he mean something to us with reference to these sins so real, so persistent, so blighting in our lives?

There are three attitudes that we may take toward Jesus.

There is the attitude of admiration, and

The attitude of explanation, and

The attitude of obedience.

There is ever danger that we shall satisfy our hearts with reference to Jesus Christ's claim upon us if we yield him admiration or subscribe to some creedal explanation of his person. The whole world is today casting palm branches before the feet of Jesus. He is the most admired of all mankind. He is entering into literature as never before. His praises are sounded in song and in sermon with exultation such as our world has never known. But to admire Jesus is not to be his disciple. To compliment Jesus is to bring him to tears.

Christ Standing in the Gate.

Christ stands in the gate today. He is approaching our Jerusalem, our city, the city of our home, of our privileges and our obligation. In all those ideals for a purer government Christ is standing in the gate. It is he who brings the ideals of better things to our great municipalities. It is he who is suggesting to our consciences that we cannot save the community by merely rescuing those who have fallen into vice, but only by setting up such conditions in the community as will prevent the downfall of men and women. To this new ideal the best in people responds with enthusiasm. Again and again veritable Palm Sundays of acclaim are experienced in one city and in another. For a time it looks as if Christ is going to reign in city government and the devil be cast out. But back of the people who are shouting, back of the people who are praying, are the office holders, the self-seekers, the men who make a business of looting the public treasury and debauching the public conscience.

Back of the clamant church, and enthusiastic, religious people, are the Judases, and the Pilates and the Annases entrenched in their ill-gotten possessions. These men were not out shouting for Jesus on that Palm Sunday; they were back in the quiet places manipulating the forces which kept them in control of the situation and at last sent the Master with his ideal of a better world and a better city to the cross. How often in the history of our modern cities have the people been won away from their ideals of pure government by the machinations and promises of politicians. How impossible is it to win out against calculating, sagacious, persistent, interested graft by mere explosion of the emotions. Here is our weakness today. We admire Christ's ideals, we admire Christ Himself, but we do not want Christ to reign over us in such way that we will be constrained to make costly sacrifices on behalf of his ideal social order. We do not like to have the smooth comfort of the church service disturbed by a sermon on these themes.

Christ's Ideals Command Us.

But these ideals, my brethren, are not given us to praise, to make perorations out of, to put into poetry and song and picture, and to express in the waving palms and the shouting of Hosannas. These ideals are to command us, to be lived up to. Jesus is not to be praised merely, nor admired, but to be followed—even unto death. Christ comes to us today in our visions of better things for our city, for ourselves. We sing and pray to him, we form vast processions in his honor. Think of the thousands of people in this city who are doing him honor at this very hour, and yet in how much of all this acclaim does the Master, our King, ride weeping? "They know not what they do," he is saying. "They are praising me, but they will not have me to rule over them." "While they shout my praises they are countenancing and participating in conditions which send womanhood and childhood and manhood to hell. While they tread the temple steps the politicians capture the caucus; while they sing of the kingdom of heaven that is to be they consent to the unheavenly state of the kingdom that is here and now. And Christ is weeping because we seem to let him into our cities and yet do not let him in.

Christ Weeping Today.

I can see him today marching through his world, this vast Jerusalem, and weeping while he hears men's shouts of praise, weeping because the millionaire who gives his millions as the tribute of his admiration for Christ, never dreams of bringing his methods of making money to the test of Christ's character. Weeping because the business man takes one-seventh of his week for singing his praises, and the other six-sevenths of his week for rendering his rule impossible in the world. Weeping because the motherhood of the nation wears his cross as an ornament and shames him with its follies and vulgarities. Weeping because the church itself, organized in his name, can work itself into such frenzies of religious passion called revivals, and change not one whit the moral attitude of the community in which the wondrous work has been wrought. Oh, our Master is not misled by our shouts and singing. Our noise and ecstasy are not the sacrifices he wants.

"The tumult and the shouting dies;
The captains and the kings depart;
Still stands thine ancient sacrifice,
A broken and a contrite heart."

He wants our will, our daily life, our common service. He wants to reign in our hearts that he may cleanse our desires and motives and so rule in all we do. May we today have grace to yield to him!

The Call to the Christian Ministry

By John P. Sala

Minister at Elyria, Ohio.

In writing on this theme one is naturally driven back into the experiences of his own life, when he began to prepare to preach the Gospel of Christ. Indeed, one cannot help going farther back, that he may discover the early influences that moulded his life and brought it into harmony with the thought of the Christian ministry. That was a humble home into which I had the good fortune to be born. The supply of food and clothing was not always more than was absolutely necessary for the support of life and health. Father was a worker in wood. Mother was a worker at home. They each had a common school education, and each had a desire for their children that they might have a better preparation. Father had a trustful, easy-going temperament. He was a mechanic of ability. Three times in partnership with other men and three times the other fellows beat him out of all he had. Mother was of a nervous, perceptive temperament. Her push and enthusiasm was the life of the home. Father loved literature and read much. Mother was busy with the practical things of life. This is the parentage that started four boys in life. Two are successful Christian business men. Two are ministers of the Gospel.

Home Life Organized for the Church.

Our home was a Christian home. Rain or shine, if the church bell rang, we were soon making our way to the church house. I never knew any differently than to go in when the church door was open. Did company come on the Lord's day, they were invited to accompany us to church. If they declined, they were given the privileges of the home until we returned. Mother was always more fearful of offending the Lord than her Sunday callers. Father taught an adult Bible class in the school; mother a young ladies' class. They both do to this day. We boys were early drafted into service. Around the dining table and at the fireside, the family entered into enthusiastic discussions on religion. What arguments we had as to whether the creation took place in seven natural days or in periods of time! And this: did Jesus come to His consciousness of His deity at His baptism gradually, or did He have that consciousness from His birth? These questions and many more like them afforded fruitful discussion and prepared us to dissect the theories and reasonings of men. More than that, it kept constantly before us boys that which builds character, which is neglected in many homes. The Scripture study, the prayers of mother at our bedside every night, no difference how wearied she was from work, are sacred memories.

Just "Grew Up" Into the Ministry.

I guess it is no surprise that I am a minister of the gospel. The surprise would be that I should be anything else, when reared under such home influences. I was never urged to enter the ministry. I never entered it, just "grew up" into it. I once decided to enter a business career, but by a chain of most unusual circumstances I was disappointed. After graduation from the high school, a year was spent in a furniture factory, and although there was something pleasant and fascinating about the work, I began to weary of it and feel that factory work was too narrow in its sphere to satisfy me. I began to talk college. My parents evidently heard it with joy, and arrangements were completed for my entering Bethany College in the fall of 1893. I had not yet decided to preach, nor did I ever feel a distinctive "call" to preach. At college I found the atmosphere charged heavily with the spirit of "working for Christ." Young men were there preparing for every profession, but whether it was law, medicine, teaching or preaching, the ideal of service to men and God seemed richly held before the view of the student. This was a congenial atmosphere. I had been reared in such. My roommate was preparing for the ministry, and I began to prepare sermons too. Being hard pressed for money, I thought it might be well for me to preach in my senior year in college. Accordingly I began to substitute Biblical work in the classical course. I supplied the pulpit for our pastor in Steubenville two Sundays just at the beginning of my senior year. A young business man who heard me said to his pastor later, "If I thought I could ever preach like that young fellow I would go and prepare at once." This encouraged me. He went, and is pastor of a large church in the East. The pastor then sent me to a country church that had been in a quarrel for three years to preach each alternate Sunday during my senior year. The Lord richly blessed my labors. Souls were saved. Harmony came about in the church. As I came near graduation, it looked to me as I faced life that God had put His stamp of approval upon me for His ministry, and I laid aside all aspirations other than to become a useful and powerful minister for God. During my senior year four times I was called upon to fill the college pulpit on Sundays. My professors urged that by all means I should enter the ministry. This had no small influence on my ultimate decision, as I felt they should know.

The Question of a "Call" to Preach.

This, then, is all the "call" I ever had to the Ministry of the Word. I have also had experience in sending others, three, to prepare for the ministry. Two of them are succeeding splendidly, the third rather indifferently, though he is not a failure. As well I have been connected with the Ohio Christian Missionary Society as one of its managing board for ten years. We employ many preachers each year. Out of these experiences I am glad to give my observations on the qualifications for entering the ministry.

He must be consecrated. No man can do a great uplifting work for God or humanity who is not thoroughly consecrated to his work. To use Paul's expression, a "slave" of Christ. A great desire for bringing men to Christ must dominate his soul. Spirituality and consecration must go hand in hand. The right relationship to God will determine largely a preacher's work for humanity. But some are spiritual and consecrated, and yet lack the practical. A combative nature must manifest itself along with the spiritual in this sacred warfare against sin. From one of our churches a young man, bright in books, consecrated, spiritual, was sent to prepare for the ministry. He prepared, tried, but was a failure. He lacked entirely the combative nature.

A reasonably good voice is essential. I am conscious that some men become great preachers with voices that would do credit to a donkey or a screech-owl, but it is their weakness and not their strength. To hear a mellow, well-rounded voice from the man on the platform immediately secures our attention to his thought.

The Minister As Student.

A studious temperament is essential to the growing minister. Books, newspapers and people must be studied. In a conference of ministers I heard an old gray-haired minister yet active in service say, "A man crosses the dead line in the ministry when he quits studying." He must keep up with the times. He must become a student of human nature. We make some dreadful failures in trying to lead men to Christ, because we do not know men—the men we deal with every day. An evangelist was told by the pastor not to talk with a certain young lady about coming to Christ. The evangelist asked why. "You will drive her farther away." The evangelist discovered the nature of the girl that very night and next day found her clerking in a store. He said to her: "I came to see if you were not going to confess Christ at the church tonight." It apparently took the girl's breath. No one ever had approached her that way before. Before she could recover from the shock, he was saying, "You know Pearl without Christ you are lost, and how much better it will be for you to be a Christian girl letting your life count for Jesus and the church in the store here among these other girls." He had read her aright and while she did not promise to make the public confession that night she gave him to understand that she would soon. When the invitation was given that night she never moved. After the service she hastened to the front, saying to the Evangelist, "You are disappointed?" "Well, several of the girls in the store with whom I talked after you left, told me they thought they would come with me to accept Christ if I would wait until tomorrow night. The next night she came and fourteen young ladies followed her to the front seat to make the good confession of Jesus Christ. He could read human nature and knew where best to approach men to win their natures with the greatest favor.

The Preacher for Modern Times.

The present times are making other demands on the preacher. The preacher needs either a business sense or a pretty good business training. The preacher today, if he is a success, either in the country districts or in the city, is at the head of a great business enterprise. He finds his men occupied on the farm or in the stores or other places of business and the preacher becomes the man who must not only preach and call, but be the superintendent of a great life-giving institution that reaches out into every department of life and activity in the community.

The preacher must have a love for mingling with men. I find many preachers apparently afraid of business men and lawyers, and only approach them when soliciting money for the church. This is neither tactful nor business like. I met a business man one day. We were talking about another minister. Said the merchant, "Do you know, I felt as though I had known that man always when I shook hands with him." No wonder that preacher is a success. The preacher must draw people to himself that he may lead them to Christ.

A Centennial Call for Consecration of Life

By Royal J. Dye

Not only is this the year for great giving, it is also the year for great consecration of life to the Master's service.

Our Centennial would not be perfect if we did not have an unprecedented number of our brightest and best young men and women giving themselves to His service in this and foreign lands. What better report could a pastor make than that this Centennial year saw the sending out of some of his own best young people into the great world vineyard, and the supporting of them by their own home church? Why should the church at Bolenge, so recently carved from that fearful heathenism, do more than those of Christian America with their generations of Christian ancestry and noble ideals?

The opening up of the new Centennial stations in equatorial Africa as the noble pledges of the Californians demands that new men and women be sent at once to those fields. They should be on the field as soon as possible learning the language so that when the grants of land have been given they may be able to go at once and open these great needy fields.

The call is made in the Congo Christian for a doctor to open up the new station at Monyeka. This is imperative. We have practically promised the government that we will place a doctor on every station they grant us. We are the only mission now receiving grants of land in the Congo state.

Here lies a nation waiting for their news of the Master, three to five million of people lying in the awful darkness of their pagan cannibalism. The need is tragic. They have no adequate medical relief. The treatment of the witch-doctors is worse than neglect, for it is brutally cruel. They maltreat and deceive their misguided believers and mulct them for all they can get. The poor are deserted and cast out to starve as are the aged and slaves. Kindness hardly enters their minds. It is "graft" pure and simple. The horrible agony of their victims is fearful, too fearful to relate. For witchcraft stops at nothing to slay its victims. Their simple remedies are aborted in their beneficial effects by the dancing the "patient" must undergo, or the superstitions he is compelled to follow out, or the wild and continuous beating of drums "to drive away the evil spirits."

Are you just graduating from your chosen school of life's preparation and do you wish to make your life count for all it possibly can for "God and humanity"? Then look to the mission field for your field of life's service of your generation. Nowhere else can your talents have so great a scope. Nowhere else can you be sure you are not crowding another man out of a job. Nowhere else can you have the satisfaction of reaching those who, were it not for you, could not have the comforts and relief you can bring them in the name of the Master. Here your whole life will count for Him.

Preferably, a married man under thirty years of age, thoroughly qualified in every respect, physically, mentally and spiritually. Where is the man? Who will be the man to leave in this great Centennial year for "darkest Africa" to take by his going the light of the world to the great sin-sick needy souls? To follow the example of and bring the message of "The Great Physician" to those who sit in darkness that they may see a great light?

We who voice this appeal are those who have seen and felt the need of this service, who have offered ourselves as a partial answer to this great need and call for workers. Will you not join us that Ethiopia may not stretch out her hands unto God in vain? Were it not the happiest service in the world we would not call you to it. This is not a call to a "snap." There are things that try the mettle in a man. There are hard things that the manly fellow likes to face. There are days of pioneering before you. The building up of a great station from the raw heathenism and rough material at your hand into a Christian civilization. There is the lonely work of the frontier, the firing line. There is hardship and deprivation. But there are hundreds of thousands waiting for you to break to them the bread of life and give them healing for the multitudinous ills in the name of the great physician. There is a "well done" also at the end of the road. Where is the man who is ready to go now?

Influence of Orphanage Work on Native Population

As the natives of India in all their heathen sin see but the faces of our orphanage boys and girls, we fancy they can but wonder what has given them the pure, happy look they wear. And do you not believe there is a secret longing there to know the God who makes them so? Again we look back at the orphanages twenty years ago and we see the little faces, then learning of Jesus, to-day in Christian homes, as Bible readers and evangelists. We have learned of the conditions of the heathen homes. Think what it would mean to have in the little hut beside the heathen one, a man and woman married from our orphanages, who had from childhood known Christ. In this home there would be cleanliness and order. There would be no altars for idol worship. There would be loving care for baby girl and boy alike. There would be Christian prayers, hymns, and the Bible read in this house. It is not hard to see how this would influence the homes near. The Christian homes made by these orphanage young people as they leave are indeed lights that cannot be hid.

As children and then as men and women they learn to tell their own people, going back perhaps to their own village with the Christ story. And how much more readily do the people listen to one of their own, to one who has believed their heathen beliefs, one whose every word they can understand. We cannot hope to win these people for Christ until we can send out from our orphanages and schools enough of their own people to reach them as Bible readers, evangelists and neighbors living among them.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

Is the Church Becoming Obsolete?

The Correspondent: "Some Christian people are greatly discouraged because the church is having a hard time to maintain its prestige and influence. They seem to think that the coming of the kingdom is dependent upon the prosperity of the church. The truth is quite otherwise. The church decays; but Christianity increases. The kingdom today is coming with might outside the churches and independent of them. Faith and love are not confined to the institutional side of Christianity. They overleap all bounds. Is not the day approaching of which the seer of Patmos dreamed, the day of no temple, because no man had need to teach his brother. The history of the church is bad. The great social movements are largely outside of the churches. Is not the church antiquated? It does not readily adjust itself to new conditions. It is easier to accomplish your object independent of the church than to seek to to reform the church that you can be effective in your efforts within it. The church meetings are wrongly called services. Service is a great deal more than going to church. Other organizations are doing more philanthropy than the church. It is time we had a just revelation of the church. In that revelation its importance will be greatly minimized. If the church should entirely cease to be, the loss would not be irreparable.

"We must come to know that a true courageous soul outside the church is just as good as one in. Indeed, he may be truer and more courageous. It is Christianity, not churchianity that we need."

I take strong and square issue with The Correspondent. While doing so, I will accord all that is due to every true man outside of the church, and will not subtract one iota of honor from any institution that is in the least serving mankind. If I understand what narrowness means, I am not narrow. If I understand what old fogyism means, I am not an old fogy. If I understand what radicalism means, I am not a radical. But if I understand what Christianity means, I am a Christian, at least in desire. And to be a Christian is to honor the history of the church and to believe in its continual efficiency.

The Kingdom and the Church.

For a good while we have been contrasting the kingdom and the church. I believe in the contrast. We have been saying that Jesus placed emphasis upon the kingdom. I so believe. We have been wondering if he used the term church at all. We have been loud in our praise of many splendid movements that are independent of the church. We have been extending the sacred till it embraced all the secular. Some have been making God all and all God. It takes no particular courage to stand for these things. Courage is needed when a man is blazing his own path. There are no wild animals in the well-beaten highway. It is half truths that endanger us today. To exalt the kingdom at the expense of the church is one of these dangerous half truths. Be as sympathetic as we may with all present-day movements which seem the out-breathing of God's spirit upon us. The fact remains that the church will continue to be the most needed and the most effectual agency to redeem and save this world. To depreciate it is to hinder the progress of the world.

Every church man, every discerning man should exalt the mission of the church. It should not be condemned by any misleading phrase such as, "It is Christianity, not Churchianity, that we need." Churchianity is Christianity as we have been able to live it. As soon as abstract Christianity takes on flesh and blood it is Churchianity. To despise the church is to despise the men who constitute it.

"The history of the church is bad" is one of the cheap charges that we hear constantly reiterated. It is easy to make light of the men who toiled and wrought to bring us to this day. It is easy to laugh at their contentions and their superstitions. It is easy to hurl anathemas at their formulations of faith, and the niceties of their creedal distinctions. To me the history of the church is appealing, grand and triumphantly sublime. Their were giants of intellect and spirit in every century of its history. We are lean today because through our prejudice the throb of the glorious past does not reach us as mightily as it should. The history of the church is the march of the inimitable Christ going forth conquering and to conquer. The conversions of the church are the big things of the universe. The martyrs give us the measure of man who has fellowshipped with the glorified Christ. The creeds are monuments recording man's power to tabulate, and God's dexterity, in his immensity, to elude tabulation. How one can exalt the Word and despise the church is not easy for me to grasp. The Word came through the church. God giving the Word must have certainly determined to watch over the church in the protection of that word. The church is the living word. To doubt that God is in his church is to take a big step in scepticism. The church in its long history throbs with the spirit of the Divine. At every turn of the corner it was saved from wreckage. In every controversy the truth came to clearer light. In every iniquitous imprisonment an angel song was liberated.

The Church a Perennial Necessity.

We are not approaching a time when the church shall not be needed. The child born today is as ignorant as a child born seven milleniums ago. There is something in heredity; but the Christian parent cannot place a deposit of its experience and faith in the mind of his child. Each generation must start with a zero of information. The opportunity is increasingly greater, perhaps so also is the danger. At any rate the children must be taught. Who will teach them? The church must teach them. It must do more. It must reclaim the adult child who has lost his way. The lost is legion still. It is hard for men to look up and hope. The church is needed to put a believing heart in men. The believing heart is the courageous heart that is fitted for difficult tasks.

It is urged that institutions other than the church are promulgating Christianity. Just here it may be well to ask, What is Christianity? In answer I would say Christianity is prayer, faith, love and obedience. Prayer is communion with God, often agonizing communion. It is the assertion of man's capacity for the mind of The Eternal. It is the practice of the presence of God. Without it there have been no victories in the church. What other institution is standing for prayer relationship between man and God? The best of lodges have not begun to rise to this height of spirituality. The church understands the Christ in his nights of prayer, the lodge does not.

Christianity is faith. It is the loud assertion of God's goodness. It is the enlightened heart that sees beyond all perplexity. What institution stands for faith? None shout it from the housetops but the church. Christianity is love; but love is the daughter of faith. It is far from clear that separated from its mother it can long endure. Many institutions today are claiming to do much philanthropic work. Their claims are true. I honor them. Every man and every institution that dries a tear will be applauded by me. I am allied with several extra-church organizations. They are good; but they are not the best. Their inspiration comes from the church; but they cannot even love as the church loves; for before there can be the strongest love there must be the clearest spiritual appreciation. No other society has the spiritual appreciation of the church. The soul must be known before man can be well loved. To give man a crust of bread is not sufficient. When we understand him well enough to love him as he ought to be loved we shall know that he will not be satisfied with less than God. The church stands for the philanthropy that ministers not merely to the body, but to the man, the soul. It stands, too, for cleanness of life—exalted obedience to the pure will of God.

Jesus and the Church.

The book fresh from the press may revel in the fact that Jesus did not make much of the church. He made everything of it. It was he who said that He would bless even two or three gathered together in his name. That was the incipient church. It was he who gathered disciples around him. That was the church learning to be a church. It was he who told his disciples to tarry for a longer vision. Then with the vision and enduement the church burst into fulness. It was He who called Paul to the church. It was He who talked so much of love. What is love? It is that which joins hands. It is that which melts hearts into one. It is that which stills discordant sounds and gives all a common gospel voice. It is that which binds man to man in the church of the living God. The very nature of Christ's message builds the church. True, he did not say, go to now, we will organize a church. He was to give life, the spirit. It is the task of his followers to give His spirit a body. Paul was not mistaken when he said Christ loved the church and is laboring to present Himself with a glorious church.

It is wide of the mark to say that if the church were to pass away the kingdom is assured. True, the kingdom is assured; but the church cannot pass away. If it were to cease to be today, it would be born anew tomorrow. It rests upon the eternalness of brotherhood and the quenchless thirst for God. It supplies the spiritual need of man. Do not too harshly criticize this body of Christ. Exalt the church glorious! Mark in it the ways of God! Gather the wayward to its altar! Teach the babes the sublime lines of its saints! Bring the unconverted to the healing fountains of its life! Do not allow familiarity with its terms or offices to breed contempt! Never feel that you are an owner of the church; rather regard yourself as a child saved by the mystery of its grace! Get people to join the church! Exhort them with all long suffering! Build your conduit as far as Calvary! Connect with it the fountains that are upspringing from the graves of the saints. Be nourished by the Word. Know that fighting with the church you are fighting with God and the gates of hell opposing shall not prevail.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

The Essence of Sectarianism

The church has learned through her divisions, first of all, that the most fruitful cause of division is pride.

We have come to associate pride with the inordinate esteem of one's moral or spiritual attainments; but it belongs just as truly to the conceit one has of his doctrinal correctness. There is a pride of orthodoxy just as there is a pride of righteousness. The orthodox defender of the faith prays to God in the spirit, if not the language of the Pharisee: I thank thee, that I am not as the rest of my brethren, heretical, unscriptural, disloyal, even as this editor and this professor. Why should not pride of doctrinal inerrancy be just as offensive as pride of moral inerrancy? Why should not judgment of one disciple of Christ by another for supposed doctrinal short-coming be regarded as just as meanly censorious as judgment of one by another for moral short-coming?

Motes and Beams.

Why should Jesus have warned his disciples against indulgence of the spirit of censure, and fault-finding, if it was not for this very reason that it aroused hatred and destroyed the unity and peace of brotherly fellowship. Does the indulgence of the spirit of doctrinal fault-finding produce anything but bad feeling among brethren, and destroy the love that they should have one for another?

Judge not that ye be not judged. For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged; and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured unto you. And why beholdest thou the error that is in thy brother's doctrine, but considerest not the error that is in thine own doctrine? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me cast out the error out of thy doctrine; and lo, an error is in thine own doctrine? Thou hypocrite, cast out the error of thine own doctrine; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the error out of thy brother's doctrine.

The implication of this saying of Jesus which has been paraphrased above is that no judgment of one brother by another will take place, if each one will qualify himself for the office of judge by the complete purification of himself. The same principle is enunciated by Jesus in that telling rebuke of the Scribes and Pharisees who brought the sinful woman to be stoned. "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her," said Jesus. There can be but one result when this principle is followed. There is a touch of humor as well as a triumph of moral sanity and self-judgment in the description of what happened with that company of Scribes and Pharisees. "And they, when they heard it, went out one by one, beginning from the eldest, even unto the last; and Jesus was left alone and the woman, where she was, in the midst." That is a marvelous picture of the gradual dissolution—"one by one"—of self-righteousness under the influence of moral self-inspection.

Stoning the Heretic.

Why isn't this a good principle for the present distress in the brotherhood of the Disciples. Here is a heretic brought before the brotherhood to be stoned. Let the editor or professor who is without intellectual error cast the first stone. I wonder how many stones will be cast? Is a man any more likely to be doctrinally faultless, than morally faultless? It is no longer respectable among good men for one to set himself up as an infallible moral example to all others, and require, on pain of condemnation, the homage of imitation. The time is coming when doctrinal infallibility and judgment will be just as disreputable among good men.

Religious Prize-Fighting.

It is a hateful and monstrous thing for one follower of Jesus Christ to decide that another follower is disloyal to him, and to call upon all other followers to join in a sentence of debarment, from the fellowship of his people, just for intellectual fault. Men of discerning and sensitive spirits do not do it. They shrink from such vaunting self-assertion—such vast, personal, presumption. How grotesque for one human being to assume such lordship, over another human being! It is painful enough to fine spirits to see an elder command a younger in display of oracular wisdom. How much greater violence must it do to the spirit of humility to see one who is no more than an equal proclaim the unworthiness of another, and fix his standing in the fellowship of heaven. Such violence of one person against the faith of another is a survival of the grosser forms of personal violence which hatred and envy assumed in an age of savagery. I can not now, in an age of civilization, way-lay a fellow being whom I dislike, and from a safe ambush hurl a spear into his body; but I can from the safe cover of a newspaper push a destroying shaft into his faith. This is just a more modern and allowable form of violence between persons, and both brutal and brutalizing to the degree that bad feeling is satisfied and reverence for personality is destroyed. Just as delicate-souled men take no part and no pleasure in a prize fight, so they take no part and no pleasure in the assaults of men upon each other's faith.

The Essence of Sectarianism.

Sectarianism is a spirit, and not a condition of things. Divisions among Christians are an effect; the cause is a spirit of pride and proscription. It begins by one Christian saying to another: I know more than you about the mind and will of Christ. I have his mind and am doing his will; and if you do not think and do as I do, you can have no faith with him, and no fellowship with me.

Thus have all divisions in the body of Christ been started, and thus perpetuated. Not the holding of one's faith as true; but the holding of every other Christian's faith as false, and the denial of liberty to him.

A faith that one could not hold as true would not be worth the holding. For this conviction that we are right is the foundation of all courageous and loyal action. A man must have certainty as far as he is personally concerned; but it must be a certainty tempered with humility and teachableness of spirit. It is one thing to feel that you are right and that you would be willing to lay down your life for it; and an entirely different thing to believe that your brother is wrong, and that you would be willing to take his life because of it. You may be right and another may be wrong; but you have nullified your right by a wrong spirit toward one who is wrong.

The highest Christian right is a right spirit, a right attitude toward other spirits, whether they are right or wrong. Another's wrong does not justify my wrong spirit toward that wrong.

Holding Truth in Love or in Hate.

We can hold the truth in love, or we can hold it in hate. If we hold it in hate, we destroy it, for the truest truth, the spirit of all truth, is love. Truth is life-giving as well as mind-satisfying. To hold the truth is to give life; for what is the truth for if it is not for life, and life more abundantly. No man can be right and hurt another human being; as no one can love truth and hate a human soul.

The essence of all sectarianism is hatred; which is to say that it is the holding of truth apart from life.

When Calvin affirmed the doctrine of the Trinity he was probably affirming a truth. When he had Seraetus put to death, he acted a wrong. He was holding the truth in hatred, and apart from life. The wrong he acted was greater than the truth he affirmed. The truth a man holds is for him no better than the life he lives or the spirit he shows.

Editor's Note

At our urgent request Dr. Gates will conduct his department under the title "CENTENNIAL STUDIES," until after the Pittsburg convention. He will present various phases of the earlier history of the Disciples, striving to find the essential curve of the movement and to interpret its outstanding events and principles to the present time. We congratulate our readers on the good reading Dr. Gates will provide them so opportunely. He is the author of the best history of the Disciples extant and his volume on "The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples" is accepted by the informed of both denominations as a fair and comprehensive account of that phase of American church history.

Our Pioneers

By E. S. Allhands.

Men were they, our pioneers:
Men of faith, midst doubts, and fears.
Men whose brave hearts boldly beat:
Men whose zeal knew no retreat.

Men of strength, and men of might;
Men who gloried in the right.
Men who loved the truth of God:
Men who trusted in His word.

Men whose minds and hearts were true;
Men of power to dare and do.
Men of culture, men of thought;
Men who by the Lord were taught.

Men who preached for love of truth;
Men who gave their age, their youth.
Men who sacrificed all gain;
Men who braved the toil, and pain.

Men of love, and men of prayer;
Men who brought to God their care.
Men whose lives were pure, and clean:
Men who sowed that we might glean.

Men who struggled out from night:
Men who lived in freedom's light.
Men who called to coward, peace:
Men who fought that strife might cease.

Men, yes, giant men were they:
Men whose labor blazed the way.
Men the "Priceless Pearl" have found:
Men, true, noble, Heaven-crowned.

OUR CHURCH MEN

By John R. Ewers

The Real Man

"Here is the real man," exclaimed Mr. Roosevelt, the citizen, as he rushed eagerly forward with open arms to greet Gov. Hughes, in New York, last week. "The real man," well, I call that the highest compliment possible. It is no doubt deserved. Hughes has made good. I saw him, heard him and studied him, here in Youngstown, at the campaign opening last autumn. All the way from his hotel to the park, where he spoke, he was loudly cheered. Senator Beveridge made the first speech. What an orator he is! Thousands of men and women stood still for forty-five minutes thrilled by his masterful voice and diction. Then came Hughes. Everybody crushed up closer. Hughes is a hero and we Americans are hero worshippers, as Carlyle said. Neither in voice nor presence is he comparable to the gentleman from Indiana, but, when he began to talk, everyone leaned forward to catch every word. His speech was an intellectual masterpiece. Like a surgeon, with keenest steel, he carved the body of opposing principles. Such knowledge, such logic, such keen wit, such a grasp of the situation. The thoughtless left the crowd, the thinkers pressed closer to the cold, self-possessed speaker, who seemed to care no more for popularity than would a machine. When he had, at length, finished, the convinced men, as they walked away, said, "An unexcelled piece of work."

The day of the inauguration, as he rode down Pennsylvania avenue, he was cheered from White House to Capitol. Other governors received occasional applause, Hughes, a continual ovation.

Hughes' Sudden Fame.

Here is a man who leaped into fame only yesterday, as prosecutor in the famous insurance cases. Few ever heard of him before. Everybody knows him since. But Hughes was Hughes before he sent those terrible cross-questions striking terror into the hearts of crooked financiers. As Americans we worship success and we are none too particular what kind of success it is. Until recently we were as apt to fall before the shrine of a successful brewer as before that of a successful banker. Now we are learning to discriminate and when we hear the sound of the dulcimer and sackbut we stop to inquire what kind of an image we put our foreheads to the earth before. And this is well. Now we ask, "How did this particular man achieve his greatness?" The question of "how" is always fascinating. Let us now address ourselves to the task of accounting for this "real man" Hughes. There are at least three factors that enter into his success: Intelligence, Independence and Integrity. And as he is extraordinary he possesses these three in unusual degree.

Hughes is intelligent. He is master of his work. With R. A. Long he would say, "Knowledge is an asset." He knows his business. Men have gone back over the track of his life and they have found every step characterized by thoroughness. As a boy, when in college, as a young attorney, always he has conquered his job. When he studied law or practiced it, he did it right. Therefore when the ordeal of his life came, when he had a chance to show his skill and power, he was able to win a most remarkable victory over desperate foes. He deserved all the honor he got, for he had earned it. The painstaking toil of a life came to fruition there. If Hughes had died immediately after that victory he would have done one man's work in the world.

Efficiency is the demand of our time. "Let a man do a thing unusually well and the world will make a path to his door tho' he dwell in a forest," said Emerson. "The man who knows," will stand before kings. If we have, any of us, any right whatever to be called real men it is because we know our business and can do the particular thing to which we have consecrated ourselves unusually well. The doctor, the attorney, the teacher, the preacher, the merchant, the statesman, the mechanic, the farmer, each must know thoroughly well his work and be able to do it with a rare skill. If he is ignorant, stupid, lazy, inefficient, blundering, awkward, careless or lacks in thoroughness he is debarred from the class of men worthy the name. We must master our work until we can do it with ease and wonderful joy.

Man of Tremendous Convictions.

Hughes is independent. He is courageous. He has tremendous convictions and dares to champion them. He is remarkable for silent earnestness. He has clear grit. There is not a cowardly fiber in his body. He possesses a sublime sense of righteousness. His determination knows no limit. He cannot be swerved from the path of rectitude by friend or foe. He is one of the kind who would go up to Jerusalem, knowing that bonds and afflictions awaited him. Now, the real man must have this trait. Your man who plays for popularity, who waits, with ear to the ground, to perceive popular demands, who trims his sails to suit the winds, who compromises with evil, who sacrifices righteousness for personal gain (and God knows there are a lot of such) who bows the knee to the devil when tempted, he is not, and never can be the real man. He may be an Erasmus, but he cannot be a Luther. Erasmus said, "I will champion the truth as far as the spirit of the age will allow." Luther said, "Here I take my stand, I cannot do otherwise, God help me." Erasmus was scholarly, refined, brilliant, partonized by the rich and powerful. Luther was less the scholar, less refined, less brilliant, guarded by a prince but perfectly independent, every inch the real man.

His Life an Open Book.

Hughes is full of integrity. He is honest. He is of sterling worth. He is incorruptible. No man offers him a bribe. No machine has him for a cog. His life is an open book. There is nothing to hide. He dwells in the light. There are no deals, no underhanded agreements. He stands forth before the American people untarnished. There is an honest man. With him honesty is not the best policy, but right is right while God is God, and right the day has won. No wonder people cheer him. No wonder we worship the hero. Fearless he goes to Saratoga and wins the nomination by sheer worth. All the hounds of hell cannot howl him down. Here is the real man and there are thousands of others who have not bowed the knee to Baal.

Aspects of a Spiritual Religion

BY J. M. LOWE

I. Universality.

Science is fact. Religion is aspiration. Science covers the field of positive knowledge. Religion in man relates him to that which lies beyond, and begets in him a feeling of reverence and awe. The attitude toward science is mental, that toward religion is spiritual. There is no such thing as an intellectual religion. One has a mental appreciation of religious values, but the thing itself is spiritual which though not separate from mind is yet a larger realm than mind, as music is more than a study of music. There are many accessories to religion—temples, sacrifices, creeds, churches, sacred writings, songs, prayers, sermons. These cannot be included in the term religion, save as they are essential to it. In the world there are various religious practices and beliefs, but only one religion. There cannot be one God and one race and many religions. These differing religions, so called, are adumbrations of the true. Religion is reverence for the sacred, the mysterious. It is the prayer of the universal human heart, the thirst of the spirit, the cry of the soul. It is, as said above, the attempt to pierce the unknown, to see the invisible; scripturally, the desire to "be filled with all the fullness of God." It is the universal aspect that argues grandly for its divine implanting. The Christian, of course, rejoices in the conviction that Jesus is God's answer to this universal prayer and that his message shall win the world. In fact this is rapidly being done. Jesus is the self-declared son of man and God. He is the universal character and his character must become universal uniting the human race. "Neither in this mountain nor yet in Jerusalem shall men worship the Father. God is a spirit." "He is the true light that lighteth every man coming into the world." Here is clearly sounded the note of universality. "By one spirit were we all baptized into one body." "There are diversities of gifts but the same spirit."

It would please me so to state that all might see that religion, the religion of Jesus, I mean His own personal religion, is an unfettered life and does not depend upon temple, form or ceremony. It is a spiritual touch with God. He is in God and God is in Him. And in Him we may all become "partakers of the divine nature." I am not ignoring that which some by mistake call forms, but these are concrete expressions of spiritual vitality.

Personally I do not believe that there is a form, merely, in the New Testament. Baptism and the Lord's Supper, in the mind of Jesus, are not forms, any more than a mother's kiss is a form, or the grasp of a friendly hand. There is a way of doing it, of course, there is also a way of eating breakfast, but eating breakfast is not a mere form. I speak from personal experience.

My purpose in this last is to show that spirit is the life of religion, and that it lifts all of its accessories up to a spiritual interpretation. Let us disentangle it from its many complications, and see it in its purity—a flame of divine energy burning in the heart of man. It may be and is hindered by erroneous ideas, bungling theologies, frozen dogmas, petrified doctrines and hilarious ignorance, but in spite of all, the religion of Jesus is growing for it is a living thing. As all oceans compose one sea, some men will learn that differences are incidental, that agreements are fundamental, and that the real thing is the same thing everywhere. If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of His. As many as are led by the spirit of God they are the sons of God. Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. Whosoever will may come. Identity, catholicity, and comprehensiveness. The religion of Jesus is a universal religion therefore the true religion. Let us give it to the world.

"No broadest creeds can hold her and no code;
She chooses men for her august abode,
Building them fair and fronting to the dawn."

The Half Mile Stone in the Last Centennial Year

It is the evening of March 31, the close of the second quarter of our missionary year. We pause a moment. The company of women are a great host, more than we can number yet, as some auxiliaries have delayed their reports to the state secretaries. We hope it is 68,000, the mark set for this point in the enlisting campaign.

One of the aims set for the past quarter was an average of two new societies per day. One hundred seventy have been announced. Delayed reports, we feel confident, will swell the number to 180 for the ninety days, the greatest increase ever known in the growth of the work. For the third quarter the same aim is to continue.

We appeal to our pastors where there is no Woman's Missionary Society, "help those women." Send to your State Corresponding Secretary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions or to the National Headquarters, 152 East Market street, Indianapolis, Ind., for literature and supplies. These, with your assistance and direction, will make it possible to enlist and equip a new Auxiliary or a Young Ladies' Mission Circle.

If we could come up to the Centennial with a Woman's Missionary Society and a Brotherhood Society in every church, the crossing of the threshold of the next century would be prophetic of the placing of the standard of the Cross, with its pathetic apeal for the union of God's people, in every province of the world in the present generation.

"Not method only but results is the measure of conduct." In hope of success,

Training the Poor Outcast

There is no work in the Brotherhood that appeals more to me personally than that which looks to the winning of the little people for the master, and there is no more Christlike ministry than that of training the poor outcast, or the heathens' children in our orphanages and schools and then sending them out among their own people to teach and preach the gospel of the Christ. In this good Year of Our Lord Nineteen Hundred and Nine, our great Centennial year, may the largest and richest fruition of the hopes of the young people's department of the C. W. B. M. be realized.

Blomington, Ills. Edgar DeWitt Jones.

Bending the Twig

"As the twig is bent the tree's inclined." It is difficult to straighten the gnarled and crooked tree, but the twig can be trained straight and symmetrical. So train the children. The mission helpers on the foreign field come in large numbers from the orphanage. We of America believe in the royalty of God-created manhood and womanhood. We believe that it is of much less moment who one's grandfather was than what one is. Therefore give the child a chance and above in the name of him who welcomed the little ones and said forbid them not, give the orphan a chance. Where is there a more terrible cruelty of fate than that visited upon the helpless motherless? We must take these little strangers in. On the day we celebrate the Resurrection and the Life let us and our children bring life and the hope of the resurrection to those whom unkind fate has committed to our care.

Eureka, Ill. Alva W. Taylor.

A Prominent Preacher Humiliated

A preacher in one of our prominent churches was called to the house of an aged sister, who was ill, to comfort and aid. Added to her illness was the distress of deep poverty. It was evident to him that something must be done for this suffering member of the household of faith. He found it difficult to provide for her needs and harder still to secure for her the needed care. At last as the only thing that could be done this aged sister was carried to the county farm, there to end her days. The preacher was humiliated beyond expression by seeing one bound to her brethren by the holiest of ties, a member of the family of Christ, hastened to her end, crushed at the thought of dying as a pauper. If she had been a lodge member she would have been saved this indignity. Is not the church better than all the lodges? Let her prove her faith by her works.

Resting in the Twilight.

We present a picture of a group of the old people in the Haven's Home for the Aged, at East Aurora, N. Y. This is one of the homes for the care of aged, indigent members of the church sustained by the National Benevolent Association. In these homes it is now caring for seventy aged brethren. Many of these would be compelled to accept public charity, to their humility and the church's discredit, but for the work of the Association. Easter is the day upon which the offering is made for this holy ministry.

Wards of the Church.

This is a picture of a group of the homeless children who are awaiting a welcome to some of the childless homes of the brotherhood. Since, for various reasons, family home and love are denied them, the Church of Christ, through the National Benevolent Association, has taken them under her loving care. The Easter offering is for their support.

The Ministers' Opportunity

I see in the children the future missionary hope—the future church—doing something worthy of our call of God.

In my judgment the minister who lacks interest in this work is deficient in vital concern in the things that pertain to the kingdom of God, and the church that neglects it is dead while it has the name of being alive. The minister is a busy man and his burdens are heavy, but that is what he is here for. A great preacher is admired, but a great pastor is loved, and no man can claim this latter distinction who fails to take vital and active interest in the children of his parish—"Feed my lambs."

While this work is with the children, it is no child's play. A trained brain and a brave heart are essential to it.

If I should make any plea today, it would be to our ministers to see to it that the future men of the kingdom of God who are now in our mission bands and Junior Endeavor have their consecrated attention. What a great opportunity Easter affords for the cultivation of all benign and lofty purposes and sentiments of the human heart.

CHAPTER IX.

Courthorne Disappears.

Supper was cooking when Lance Courthorne sat beside the glowing stove in the comfortless general room of a little wooden hotel in a desolate settlement of Montana. He had a good many acquaintances in the straggling town, though it was some months since he had last been there, and he had ridden a long way to reach it that day. He was feeling comfortably tired after the exposure to the bitter frost, and blinked drowsily at the young rancher who sat opposite him across the stove. The latter, who had come out some years earlier from the old country, was then reading a somewhat ancient English newspaper.

"What has been going on here lately?" asked Courthorne.

The other man laughed. "Does anything ever happen in this place? One would be almost thankful if a cyclone or waterspout came along, if it were only to give the boys something to talk about. Still, one of the girls here is going to get married. I'm not sure old man Clouston finds it helps his trade quite as much as he fancied it would when he fired his Chinamen and brought good-looking waitresses in. This is the third of them who has married one of the boys and left him."

"What could he expect!" and Courthorne yawned. "Who's the man, and have I seen the girl?"

"I don't think you have. So far as I remember, she came since you were here last, and that must be quite a while ago. Nobody seems to know where Clouston got her from, and she's by no means communicative about her antecedents; but she's pretty enough for any man, and Potter is greatly stuck on her. He sold out a week or two ago—got quite a pile for the ranch, and I understand he's going back to the old country. Any way, the girl has a catch. Potter's a straight man, and most of us like him."

He turned over his paper with a little laugh. "It doesn't interest you? Well, if you lived out at Willow for six years as I have you'd be glad of anything to talk about, if it was only the affairs of one of Clouston's waitresses."

Courthorne yawned again openly and took from his pocket a letter that he had received the day before at another little town to which, in accordance with directions given, it had been forwarded him. It was from one of his comrades and had somewhat puzzled him.

"There's about one hundred dollars due you, and we're willing to pay up," it ran. "Still, now we hear you're going back east to the Silverdale settlement it's quite likely you won't want them as much as the rest of us do. It's supposed to be quite a big farm you have come into."

Courthorne was a little troubled, as well as perplexed. He had certainly not gone to Silverdale and had no notion of doing so, though he had distant relatives there, while, so far as he knew, nobody had left him a farm of any kind. He had promised the whisky runners a guide on the night of Trooper Shannon's death, and it was dark when, muffled in Winston's furs, he met the men—who were, as it happened, for the most part new adherents it seemed probable that they had not recognized him or had any reason to believe it was not Winston himself who was responsible for the trooper's death. It was not a very unusual thing for one of the smaller farmers to take a part in a smuggling venture now and then. Still, the letter left him with an unpleasant uncertainty.

By and by his companion looked up from his paper again.

"You came from my part of the old country, I think?" he said. "I see a man of your name has died there lately, and he seems to have left a good deal of property. Here's a list of the bequests."

He stopped a moment, and with another glance at it handed Courthorne the paper. "I notice your own name among them, and it's not a common one."

Courthorne stretched out his hand for the paper, and his face became intent as he read: "It is with regret many of our readers will hear of the death of Mr. Geoffrey Courthorne, well known in this vicinity as a politician with Imperialistic views and a benefactor of charitable schemes. Among the bequests are . . . and one of the farms in the Silverdale colony he established in Western Canada to Lance Courthorne."

He laid down the paper and sat rigidly still for a minute or two, while his companion glanced at him curiously.

"Then," said the latter, "it's you!"

"It is," said Courthorne dryly. "I'm much obliged to you for showing me the thing, but I'd be still more obliged if you wouldn't worry me with any questions just now."

His companion made a little gesture of comprehension as he moved away, and Courthorne leaned back in his chair with his eyes half-closed. He could now understand his smuggling comrade's letter, for it was evident that Winston was going to Silverdale. Indeed, Courthorne could not see what other course was open to the rancher, if he wished to preserve his safety. Still, Courthorne was aware that farming, as carried on at Silverdale, was singularly unprofitable, and he had a somewhat curious confidence in the honesty of the man he had deceived. Winston, he decided, no doubt believed that he was drowned the night Trooper Shannon died, and had been traced as Courthorne by some Winnipeg lawyer acting for the executors.

Then Clouston came in to announce that supper was ready, and Courthorne took his place among the rest. The men were storekeepers of the settlement, though there were among them frost-bronzed ranchers and cattle-boys who had come in for provisions or their mail, and some of them commenced rallying one of their comrades who sat near the head of the table on his approaching wedding. The latter bore it good-humoredly, and made a sign of recognition when Courthorne glanced at him. He was a big man, with pleasant blue eyes and a genial, weather-darkened face, though he was known as a daring rider and successful breaker of vicious horses.

Courthorne sat at the bottom of the table, at some distance from him, while by and by the man at his side laughed when a girl with a tray stopped behind them. She was a very pretty girl with big black eyes, in which, however, there lurked a somewhat curious gravity.

"Fresh pork or steak? Fried potatoes," she said.

Courthorne, who could not see her as he was sitting, started involuntarily. The voice was, at least, very like one he had often listened to, and the resemblance brought him a little uneasiness. There was a certain fastidiousness in him, and it did not seem fitting that a girl with a voice like the one he remembered would have to ask whether one would take pork or steak in a little fourth-rate hotel.

"Take them right along, Ailly," said the man next to him. "Why don't you begin at the top where Potter's waiting?"

Then Courthorne looked around and for a moment set his lips tight, while the girl would have dropped the tray had he not stretched out a hand and seized it. A dark flush swept into her face and then as suddenly faded out of it, leaving her very pale. She stood gazing at him, and the fingers of one hand quivered on the tray, which he still held. He was, as it happened, the first to recover himself, and there was a little sardonic gleam in his eyes as he lifted down one of the plates.

"Well," he said, "I guess Potter will have to wait. I'll take steak."

The others had their backs to the girl, and by the time one or two of them turned round she was quietly helping Courthorne's companion; but it was a moment or two before Courthorne commenced to eat, for the waitress was certainly Ailly Blake. It was as certain that she had recognized him, which was, however, by no means astonishing, and this promised another complication, for he was commencing to realize that since Winston had gone to Silverdale it would be convenient that Courthorne as such should cease to exist. He fancied that should any of the men he was acquainted with happen to come across Winston at Silverdale—which was, however, most unlikely—they might be deceived by the resemblance between himself and the farmer; but it was hardly to be expected that Ailly Blake would fail to be sure of him in any circumstances and anywhere. He accordingly decided that he must have an interview with her as soon as possible, and, since he had been in many tight places before, in the meanwhile went on tranquilly with his supper.

The meal was over, and the men clustered around the stove when he gathered up one or two of the plates and laid then ready as the girl moved along the table. She glanced at him for a moment, with startled eyes. A spot of crimson showed in her cheek.

"I want a word with you," he said.

Ailly Blake flashed a swift glance round the room, and Courthorne noticed with a little smile that it was one man in particular her gaze rested on; but neither Potter nor any of the others seemed to be observing them at that moment.

"Then open the second door down the corridor in about twenty minutes," she said.

She moved away and left him to join the others about the stove, until the time she mentioned had elapsed, when he sauntered out of the room and opened the door she had indicated. It led into a little room apparently used as a household store. Here Ailly Blake was standing, while a litter of forks, spoons, and nickeled knives showed what her occupation had been. Courthorne sat down on a chair and looked at her with a little smile, though she stood intent, and quivering a little.

"Well," she said, almost harshly, "what is it you want?"

"You are going back to England with Potter after the wedding?"

His companion said she was, and Courthorne sat silent a moment or two, for the news was at once a relief to him and a cause of thoughtfulness. Ailly Blake, who would never be deceived by the resemblance between him and Winston, was a standing menace while she remained anywhere near the frontier of Canada. He had discovered that it is usually the last thing one expects or desires that happens, and it was clearly advisable for Lance Courthorne to efface himself very shortly, while the easiest way to do it was to merge his identity with that of the man who had gone in his name to Silverdale. Winston had, so far as everybody else knew, been drowned, and he must in the meanwhile, at least, not be compelled to appear again. It would simplify everything if Ailly Blake, who evidently did not know of Trooper Shannon's death, went away.

"Well," he said, "I'm glad to hear it, and I'm leaving this country, too. I'm going east tomorrow to Silverdale."

He held his hand out, but Ailly Blake shrank away from him and pointed to the door.

"Go," she said. "Go."

Courthorne made a little gesture that might have meant anything, and then he swung round abruptly without another look at her. When the door closed behind him he went down the corridor with a little wry smile in his eyes.

Then he sat down beside the stove in the bare general room very thoughtfully. Ailly was going to England, Winston, to save his neck, had gone as Courthorne to Silverdale, and in another day or two the latter would have disappeared. He could not claim his new possessions without forcing facts better left unmentioned upon everybody's attention, since Winston would doubtless object to jeopardize himself to please him, and the land at Silverdale could not in any case be sold without the consent of Colonel Barrington. Winston was also an excellent farmer and a man he had confidence in, one who could be depended on to subsidize the real owner, which would suit the gambler a good deal better than farming. When he had come to this decision he strolled towards the loungers. "Boys," he said, "somebody has left me land and property in the very select colony of Silverdale on the Canadian prairie, and I'm going back there to take possession first thing tomorrow."

Courthorne strolled away, retired early and started for the railroad before daylight next morning. He laughed softly as he glanced back a moment at the lights of the settlement.

"There are a good many places on this side of the frontier that will suit me better than Silverdale," he said. "In fact, it's probable that most of his friends have seen the last of Lance Courthorne."

CHICAGO

The Pacific Garden Mission

Whenever we suspect ourselves of preaching from books and not from life, when we fear that we are not addressing ourselves to great human needs, we like to go where we are sure the work is really being done. For this reason it is rather frequently that we go to the Pacific Garden mission and watch the way in which the most terrible outbreaking sin is treated by the evangelists who speak there from time to time. On a recent visit, we grew curious about the history and some of the inner workings of the plant and interviewed a leading worker to get more facts.

Missions Characteristic of Great Cities.

Rescue missions are to be found in all the great cities, perhaps the most famous one in America being the "Jerry McCauley" mission in New York city. Here for many years the criminals and rounders were gathered together by an ex-convict and taught the ways of righteousness. These rescue workers know each other and while not organizing a church, meet often for conventions where methods of work are discussed. There are many worthy efforts in Chicago in the line of rescue missions, notably the missions conducted by Johnston Myers as adjuncts of his church. We feel, however, that there is no down-town mission where the work of rejuvenating broken-down men is carried on more successfully than here.

Going into the meeting recently, we decided to study the homiletics of the sermon. Harry Monroe did not preach, but a visiting worker from another city. He preached for a half hour with short trip-hammer sentences and with words that were seldom more than two syllables long. The crisp Anglo-Saxon was never more beautifully handled. He occasionally used a slang phrase but only where there was no other Anglo-Saxon equivalent. We noted that his sermon was constructive in that it spent little time telling of the iniquity of outbreaking sin. It had to do with the fact that the worst sinners were sometimes saved and used of God in many a blessed ministry. It gave the very thing that practically that entire audience lacked—hope.

Invitation and Personal Work.

After the sermon, the invitation was given. This was a much quieter process than in most of our churches. Harry Monroe went up and down the aisles and with unerring vision spied the men that scarcely dared to hope but were longing for the new life. A kindly word, a warm hand-clasp and the man found under the spell of this man's influence the courage to make the decisive step. Before the song was finished and the exhortations concluded, perhaps a dozen fallen men and some fallen women had gathered and knelt at the rude altar.

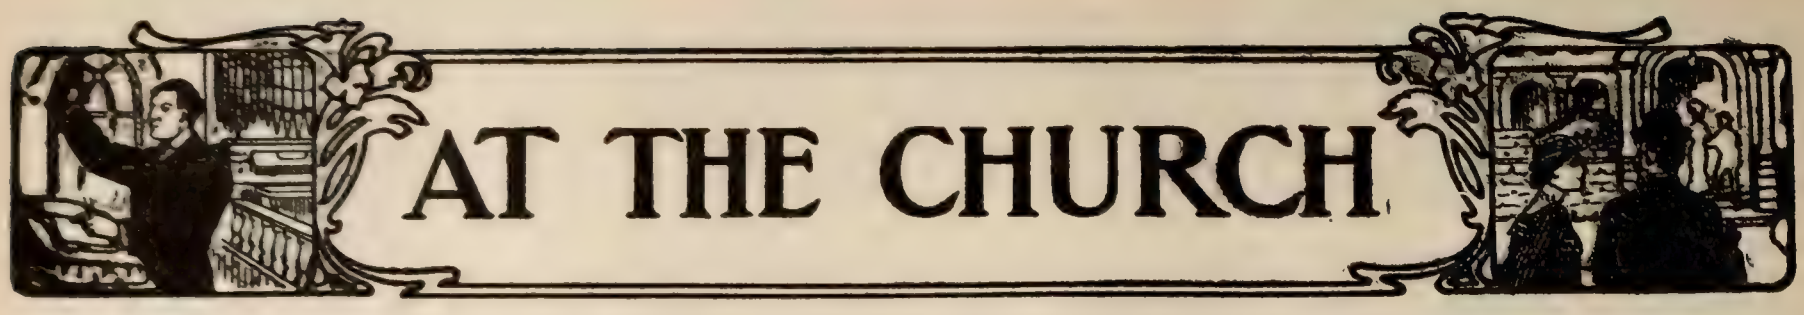
The most pathetic sight imaginable was that of a hardened old sinner trying to learn to pray. Perhaps he had never prayed in all his life, having been reared in an ash-barrel. Perhaps he had come up in a minister's home and was the black sheep of the family that was at last overtaken by Divine Love. In either case, that first prayer was a most difficult effort. A simple prayer was repeated by the preacher of one sentence and the candidates asked if they could sincerely pray such a prayer. One after another of these men prayed the prayer given them. Then followed words of exhortation and the presentation of a copy of the New Testament to each of the men.

No Need to be Told of Hell.

Following the conversions, there are often words from the recent converts as to their experiences. One vigorous and independent man who had but recently been reclaimed from a life of sin gave a word of exhortation to Christian workers who came down to help in the mission. He addressed it especially to the students of Moody Bible Institute, but it is good doctrine for all. "When I knelt at that altar the other night a Moody man came to talk to me. Now I thank God for the Moody men, but they have something to learn. They always come around here preaching hell instead of the gospel. Now I know more about hell than they do because I lived in it a good many years. I would not have been saved that night if a mission worker had not come and told of Christ's love and how other men worse than me had found help. When you men preach, in the name of God, tell us something we don't know. Nearly every man of us here knows what hell is, but we want to know what salvation is."

Other testimonies were given, telling of success in the new life and some giving the story of their disappointments in trying to realize their ideals. Most of the atsmosphere here is of the hopeful, buoyant kind that helps a man the minute he steps into the room. We were glad to note that the frequent proof of genuine conversion given was that a man had gotten a job and gone to work. On such testimony the sonorous exclamation of "Praise God" coming from Harry Monroe was full of deep feeling. He felt that when a drunken bum actually went to work, there was the best of all proofs that he was soundly converted. There can be no doubt of the permanence of many of these conversions. In the temperance parade last fall there was a considerable number of these men in the line of march, and every face had painted on it the story of the Fall, and with that partly erased, there was being added above a sketch of the great Atonement.

Imposture not Infrequent.



There is, of course, the poor wretch lower than all the rest, who will come forward and profess conversion that he may the more urgently press his appeal for a night's lodging afterwards. Harry Monroe has a wonderful instinct to deal with such as these. It may be that he is imposed upon at times. But for every quarter wasted on the unworthy, there are the more solid results apparent with the men who leave the hall to sleep in an alley rather than to ask any man for a cent.

The Pacific Garden mission was established shortly after the Civil War by Col. Clark. He served in the mission for many years and left the superintendency of the mission in charge of his wife, Mrs. Clark. She is at the present time the real head of the incorporated body that manages the mission. She is in every meeting and has become a mother to a countless number who have no mothers. She is not anxious for publicity, however, and is filling out the rest of her useful life content to do good and have the record kept on the other side. Harry Monroe is the managing preacher of the mission. He is an Irishman with all the resourcefulness and wit and cheeriness of his native land. He is greatly beloved by all the men.

Home for Homeless Girls.

We are much interested in a new project on the part of Mrs. Clark. She has established a home for homeless girls and fights the human demons of white slave traders with all her strength and cunning. She is engaged now in financing her project and making it a permanent part of the work of the mission.

The Pacific Garden mission is not a church. It is content simply to do good, without building up an institution that will do more than allow the gospel to go forward. It is an admirable example of the fact that the kingdom is far larger than the church. Perhaps any individual congregation must specialize and meet some rather definite social problem and that is the reason that a church that is successful in reaching the middle classes cannot work in the tenderloin. If that be so, let the greater honor go to those devoted men and women who bury themselves in a heathenism worse than that of China and pour out their lives in following their Master. "The poor have the gospel preached unto them." O. F. J.

Loosened Chains*

The closing section of that portion of the Book of Acts which deals with the life and ministry of the apostle Peter is the theme of our present study. The remainder of the book, beginning with Chapter 13, is devoted to the ministry of Paul, the great apostle to the Gentiles. Already, indeed, in the ninth chapter Paul's conversion has been recorded, and in the close of the eleventh chapter his embassy to Jerusalem in company with Barnabas, bringing the offering of the church at Antioch to the improverished Christians in the holy city is described. But nearly all of the earlier section of the book is concerned with the planting of the church in Jerusalem and the neighboring regions and with the activities of Peter and the other apostles and evangelists of the Jerusalem group. A suitable climax is furnished to this set of narratives by Peter's deliverance from prison and his interview with the disciples at the home of Mary, the mother of John Mark. Only once in the Book of Acts does Peter appear, and that after some seven or eight years when he was present at the conference held between Paul and the members of the church in Jerusalem regarding the terms on which the admission of the Gentiles was to be permitted (Acts 15.)

King Herod.

Herod Agrippa I. was the grandson of Herod the Great. He exercised dominion over practically the same territories as those which had constituted the domain of his grandfather. He had the characteristics of all the Herods, vanity, cruelty, and a disregard of justice, provided his own interests were served. He was not king in any independent sense, but exercised the function of royalty under the sufferance of the Roman Empire in whose service his ancestors had achieved note and won royal favor. The Herods were Idumeans or Edomites from the region south of the Dead Sea. They were, therefore, possessed of no Jewish sympathies and were only concerned to secure the largest rewards for the most superficial services of government.

Death of James.

The circumstances leading to the death of James, the brother of John are unknown. In a single verse the tragedy of his taking off is recorded by Luke. It was not a death like that of Stephen who had perished by mob violence at the hands of the Jewish people after a semblance of a judicial procedure. This was a Roman execution of the same character as that which had hurried John the Baptist out of life. It was the first death in the circle of those apostles who had sat together in the glory of the pentecostal day. The sword that cut short the life of one of the Sons of Thunder must have entered deeply into the heart of the other, that John who was to survive to be the latest of all his apostolic brethren in the service of the Lord.

Peter's Arrest.

Herod lived in his palace on the western hill of Jerusalem. One section of the Herodian palace still remains in the so-called Tower of David close to the Jaffa Gate. It is possible that under this palace were the dungeons in which prisoners were confined, but it is more likely that when Peter was arrested by the tyrant for the purpose of still further gratifying the Jewish citizens over whom he ruled, he was put into one of the cells of the tower of Antonia, that massive pile of masonry which rose at the northwest corner of the temple aria, and included that judgment hall from which Jesus had passed to his death. Herod probably had no convictions as to Peter's case or that of the other disciples. He merely knew that the people of Jerusalem were prejudiced against them, and, since the followers of Jesus were too obscure to excite any widespread public sympathy, it was easy to please his Jewish subjects by an act of tyranny, such as the persecution of Nazarenes. His act would attract all the more attention because it took place at the season of one of the national feasts when Jerusalem would be full of pilgrims from other portions of Palestine and the outlying countries in which the Jews resided.

Prison and Prayer.

Peter, having been shut up in the prison, was placed in charge of sixteen Roman soldiers who relieved each other by fours at intervals of six hours throughout the day. It was no suitable time to try the apostle. The festivities of the Passover season were to engage popular attention at the time. It was better to secure whatever favor the trial and condemnation of Peter might arouse in the hearts of the Jews by putting his trial and execution at a time when they were not so greatly engaged in their national feasts. His arrest in the tumultuous days preceding the Passover was enough to secure popular favor. Meantime the entire Christian community was stirred to its depths. No such bold act of persecution had ever yet been tried as the imprisonment by royal command of one of the Christian preachers, much less an apostle. When in the early days Peter and John had been put into confinement over night and had escaped, it was only a matter of municipal importance. A Jewish council had no authority to execute a man save with the permission of the Roman rulers. But now the king himself had taken up the serious task of destroying the leaders of the new faith. No situation could have been more serious than this. The church, therefore, lost no time in its earnest intercession in his behalf. Day and night prayer was offered that he might be spared that death which had fallen already upon James.

Commanding Position of Peter.

The tragedy was averted in a way little expected by either party. Peter's escape from the prison was so astonishing, so unexpected that when he appeared among the disciples at the house of Mary, the assembled company could not believe he was actually alive and free. Their faith had not reached so far as to anticipate any such blessing as this. His leadership had been so marked in the past and personally he was so much beloved that in spite of the criticisms upon his intercourse with the Gentiles at the house of Cornelius, he was held in high regard. Even those who were most disposed to question his right to further headship of the community of believers on the ground of his sympathies with the Gentiles could hardly withhold from him their personal esteem in view of his notable services as the champion of the faith. To this was now added the pathetic interest in his safety and in this moment of peril all were of one mind in their earnest prayer for his release.

Peter's Escape.

When Peter told of his experience later on, it was in terms which must have furnished the basis for the narrative Luke records. Peter declared that he hardly knew what the events of the night were. He seemed to be as one in a dream. His deliverance appeared to him to be the result of divine activity, as if an angel had come bringing an overpowering light into the dungeon where he was confined and releasing him by loosening as with magic touch the chains from his limbs. Out through the silent prison, where the guards were either asleep or negligent of their duty, he was taken and even the outer door of the prison offered no barrier to his departure. It was not until he found himself upon the street actually free to go whither he would that he realized the meaning of this strange experience.

Fate of the Guards.

What story was told by the guards the next day is not recorded, but a tragic touch is added to the narrative in the statement that they were condemned to death for allowing Peter to escape. Had they been able to assert with positiveness that his departure was owing to no negligence of theirs but was the result of a divine power to which they could offer no resistance, it is questionable whether Roman justice would have condemned them to so drastic a fate. Either they had to confess that they were asleep during all of these events or that to their own negligence of some other sort the escape of the apostle was due. They perished as any Roman guard might have done who had allowed an important prisoner to elude them and deliver himself from their hands.

Peter at the Gate.

The scene at the home of Mary is of the greatest interest. Of course a very few of the total community of believers in Jerusalem could have been present. There a prayer meeting of intense earnestness was going forward. When the apostle reached the door of the court which gave access to the house, he received no answer to his knocking until a maiden, whose very name Rhoda, was remembered by the narrators through whom the story had come to Luke, came and released the bolts. This personal and intimate salem and especially of James, the brother of the Lord, who was now more and more looked to as the chief representative of the new faith, Peter insisted that they should bear word to him. Then, lest his presence in the city might be discovered and fresh danger thrust upon him, he left Jerusalem under cover of the darkness and made his way to some unnamed place until the excitement of his departure should pass away. It is clear that the disciples never counted on any such unusual happenings in their experience as proclaimers of the faith. They used the ordinary means open to all men for the accomplishment of the gracious purposes of the new evangel. They did not claim miraculous protection and when there was reason to believe that such had been granted them, they never boasted of it nor did they reckon upon its recurrence. Their proofs of Christianity were not of this order but rather the appeal of the gospel to conscience and will; and thus the highest proof of the Christian faith in apostolic times was not miracles but the transformation of character from selfishness to the service of Christ.

touch in the narrative suggests the possibility that Paul and Barnabas, who had come from Antioch to bear alms to the church, may have been present at this prayer meeting. This would account for the vivid details recorded by Luke. It is clear that the maid was a disciple, for in her boundless joy at the reappearance of the apostle whom they all counted as well-nigh lost to them forever, she did not even stop to admit him but, having looked through the aperture in the gate, she rushed away to tell her strange good news. No one believed her as well they might doubt such an astonishing report. They thought rather he must have been secretly assassinated in the prison and that it was his phantom, his ghost, his angel that now appeared to reveal to them the tragedy of his end. Such a view was quite consistent with Jewish belief at that time.

Peter's Welcome and Departure.

But when Peter, by insistent knocking, gained admission to their circle no words could describe their amazement, and perhaps even he found it difficult to tell how he had come forth from the prison and was now restored to their love. But mindful of the anxiety of the others of their group in Jeru-

Topic, April 7. I Peter 1:3-25.

"Blessed are ye of Jehovah, Who made heaven and earth." To the psalmist's word of praise the Christian adds: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who acording to his great mercy begat us again unto a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." If the Christian has a better hope than any other, it is because he believes that life triumphed over death when his Master came forth from the tomb and showed himself to chosen witnesses. God is the God of the living and of this the resurrection of Jesus gives assurance. The wisdom of the world mocked the Christian apostle when he set forth the grounds of his hope, but the philosophers were discredited by what was to them foolishness. The poor man and the slave began to lift up their heads and to feel that they were the objects of God's care.

A New Life.

A. McLean quotes the following from Harlan P. Beach: "In the Fiji Islands the difficulty was not so much that men were any more brutal by nature than we; it was their gods that were brutal, their ideals were cruel. A chief there roused himself with the same effort of will to slaughter human beings and crush out every particle of mercy as that with which we nerve ourselves to some high moral effort. When, as was the case with one chief, he knocked his wife on the head and killed and cooked her, it was not that it was easy; it was hard. It was the ideal of the cruel chief that he was seeking to realize. The ideal organized the community." Now put over against this ideal of the savage that which the Christian has before him in the risen Christ. His aim is not eating and drinking and the glorincation of physical force, but righteousness and peace and joy. There is the exaltation of mercy and truth. Disease, obscurity, the malignity of enemies, and the capriciousness of fortune can not deprive him of the good he seeks. The new life is one of fellowship. The Christian man loves other men. He tries to be in their company. It is not enough for him to know that he has done well. He wants to belong to a society of the beneficent whose existence is not bounded by time and sense. Earth is not large enough for his hope; he looks out upon eternity.

Heaven and the Life That Now Is.

Does the hope of another life keep men from doing their duty in this world? Some have thought that it does. I do not think so. The trouble with us when we begin to talk about the effect of any belief is that we are in too much of a hurry to reach our conclusion, favorable or otherwise to the creed in question, so we do not stop to learn just what is the effect of the belief on the lives of those holding it. We tell what the men do and then we charge up the deed to the belief. It may be that an entirely different cause is operative. I have heard of landlords who said that animals should be well cared for, because the present life is all they can have, but that it did not matter about the human tenants of their estates, as they had a prospect of happiness in the next world. Christianity has nothing to do with expressions of this kind. Brute selfishness controls any man who gives such an excuse for cruelty to the helpless. He feeds the animal for the profit it brings. He neglects the man that he may gain money thereby. There are some, too, who look upon heaven as a place of special privilege. They expect to get into it in the same way that the little grafters get into the inner circle of the chief grafter. They buy their way in this world and it is incomprehensible to them that advancement is to be had anywhere by any other method. Further, some of us think the Lord will honor our private grudges and keep out of heaven people that we do not like. We strongly insist that he shall not allow men of certain theological notions to enter the New Jerusalem. But what does all this prove? It proves that the evil of our nature will show itself in spite of our efforts to conceal it. If we have hope in Christ and are guilty of wrong to a brother, we are to be blamed for two things, for the wrong and for dishonor to him whom we call Master. For the heaven he promises is one in which righteousness dwells. The exhortation of the Christian hope is to purity of life, to genuineness of affection, to freedom from malice, deceitfulness, insincerity, jealousy, and the disposition to work another injury. Without the gates of the holy city are the evildoers, the murderers, the robbers, the fornicators, and the liars. The hope of being in the society of the just and loving after death can hardly make a man unjust and unloving now.

The Temperance Movement Throughout the Country

During the year 1908 enough saloons were closed, allowing twenty-five feet to the front, to make a solid line fifty-two miles long, and means that in round numbers 11,000 saloons have been closed by the popular vote of the people under some form of prohibition or local option law. This ought to make a good text for a temperance sermon or a lesson for a Sunday-school class. The preacher or teacher might have his hearers try to estimate what this means to the drunkard's wife and to the drunkard's children, its bearing upon the social and financial problems of the home, the community, crime, poverty, insanity, etc.

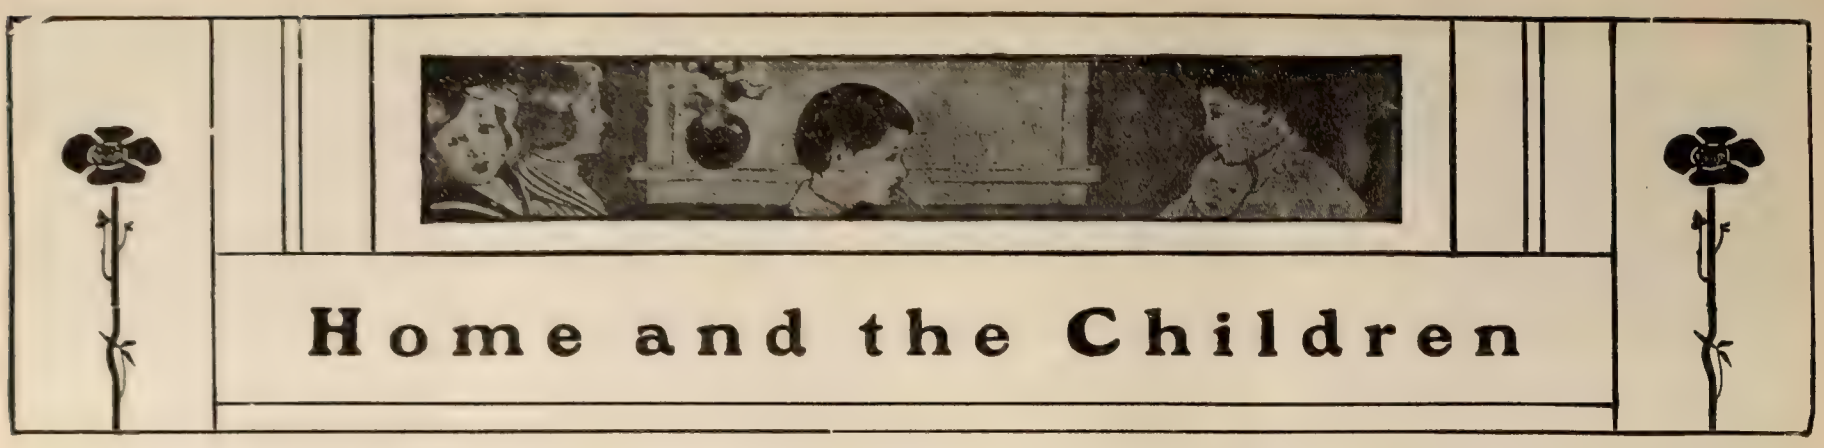
The old year closed with the following eight states in the prohibition column: Maine, North Dakota, Kansas, Oklahoma, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia and North Carolina. And really the greatest victories in the way of saloon extermination were in other states under various forms of local option laws. Illinois closed 1,600 during the year, Indiana, 600; Ohio over 2,000, and other states too numerous to mention have run into the hundreds. For the first time a halt has been called in the increased manufacture and consumption of alcoholic liquors with a marked falling off of the same. Even in cities and villages that retain the saloons, the saloon keepers complain that the young men by the score and hundreds are curtailing their drinking habits and many of them quitting altogether. This is due to the great educational force of the reform movement.

The record of last year is all the more significant when one considers that it was the great year for both national and state politics.

The year 1909 opens auspiciously. The temperance wave or tide, as the saloon keepers are wont to call it, and thereby gain some comfort, is still rising.

The shot that some months ago killed the noble Carmack of Tennessee has already gone crushing through the liquor traffic of the entire state, for the legislature of the state has passed a state-wide bill twice, the second time being over the governor's veto, and then have added to it a Manufacturer's Bill, prohibiting the manufacture of liquor within the state after January 1, 1910.

The legislature of the state of Texas is at the present time in the throes of intense debate on the submission of a provision for a constitutional amendment against the liquor traffic.



On January 26 the lower house of the Idaho legislature passed a county local option law by a vote of 44 to 9. It is expected that the bill will pass the senate.

Indiana has opened up the year with a vote on January 26 in four counties under its new local option law. The returns show that all went dry by the following majorities: Decatur, 1,500; Tipton, 1,527; Putnam, 1,784, and Hamilton, 2,000. Only four or five precincts out of the entire four counties voted wet. Ten more will vote next week.

On January 25 the Committee on Temperance in the Kansas legislature reported favorably a bill prohibiting the drinking of intoxicating liquor on the trains.

Throughout the country great attention is being paid by the people to the enforcement of their laws. This is all essential if the present ground gained from the enemy is to be the permanent possession of temperance.

Magic

Edward N. Teall in the March St. Nicholas.

There is a little cozy den, up on our highest floor,
It's right beneath the roof and far above the city's roar;
The way to it is up a steep and dark and winding stair—
It's rather difficult to reach, but jolly when you're there!

A table and some shelves of books, some pictures on the wall;
A couch—and that's (I'll tell you why) the very best of all:
When things are going all awry—they sometimes do, you know—
I come up here alone and choose where I'd most like to go.

Perhaps it is a Saturday, all spoiled by clouds and rain—
Well, then, would it be just the thing to fly away to Spain!
All right, I'll go! Here's Irving's "Conquest" ready on the shelf;
I lie and read—and soon in bright Granada find myself!

Sometimes I visit Arthur's court, and join the Table Round;
Again, with Mr. C. Columbus I am westward bound;
Sometimes it is that wonder book, the famed "Arabian Nights,"
And then upon my magic couch I take the strangest flights!

And that's the secret—don't you see? I'm sure you never guessed
That there were any such things now—enchantment and the rest!
Come up some time and try a trip—just now I've got to go
And meet my old friend Robinson—Man Friday, too, you know!

Who Should Care for the Orphan Child?

"Not I," says the elder of the church, "I have troubles of my own. My family demands my attention. When I have provided for them I can do nothing more."

"Not I," says the deacon. "We have all we can do to keep our church going. When we have to worry with funds to keep current expenses paid, we have neither the time nor the inclination to provide for children that we never heard of."

"Not I," says the preacher. "I am poorly paid and do not get my salary promptly. Besides there are so many calls I can not get them all before the congregation. If I attempted it there would soon be complaint and I would lose my place."

"Not I," says the business man. "Business is business and the man who attends to business in these bustling times has little time for sentiment. The cry of the orphan, to be sure, is piteous and some one should answer it, but I can not stop to consider it. Let those who have given their lives to benevolence attend to such cases."

"Not I," says the superintendent of the Sunday-school. "Some one ought to help these little ones, but I do not know how to do it. It is true that a child always responds to a child when suffering and in need, and the children in our school would no doubt be glad to help, but when I have attended to the regular work of the school I can do nothing more. It is impossible for me to get these outside things before the children."

"Not I," says the busy housewife. "I have orphans of my own and must provide for them. I am not rich and when my own are fed and clothed there is nothing left for real orphans that have no one to care for them. Let rich women who have no children and money that they do not know how to spend, care for them."

"Not I," says the society woman. "My life is full. My social duties demand all of my thought and time. One in my position cannot afford to neglect the functions of society. I must keep my position with the best people of the town. I must entertain and be entertained. This calls for thought and time and money. I can not have my peace of mind disturbed by the cry of the orphan. I must close my ears to them. Let those not so high up in society, who can take real pleasure in such things, attend to these orphans."

Well if all of these can not help the orphan, upon whom does the responsibility rest? The fact is there is no one else to place it upon. When we say, "Let someone else do this work," whom do we mean? You mean me and I mean you. The preacher thinks the man of large income should give and the man of income says the preacher should do it, for he has given his life to just such business. In this way every one throws the responsibility on other shoulders and the orphan is cast out to grow up just as he can.

True, all do not shift responsibility in this way, else we could not provide for the hundreds of helpless ones that are now receiving shelter and care in our homes. But every day our orphanages are turning away children because there is lack of room and lack of funds to care for them. If every one of us felt the responsibility as the few do, then would we be able to let the doors swing inward in response to the cry of every homeless one.

In that great day when we stand before the throne somebody will have to answer for these little ones against whom our doors are closed. Reader, if you have heard this orphan's cry and gone on your way thinking some one else would answer, I want to say to you very emphatically, but very kindly, that if there is any truth in God's Word, you will again hear that cry when you stand before the throne of God and it will bring to your heart the terror of remorse. The excuses we make here will not stand there.

Who that has the love of Christ in his heart can turn away coldly and indifferently from these little ones that cry so piteously to us? Their responsibility is a personal one. I can not throw it off on you nor can you throw it on me. Whether rich or poor, busy or idle, each one of us must do our full part and not until we have done so can we stand blameless before our own consciences and before the throne of God. W. T. Hilton.

The Junior Pulpit

RICHARD W. GENTRY, PREACHER

THE "ME" AND THE "I."

A long time ago, when wise men were so thick that anybody who couldn't think of anything else to do, thought, there was a wise man who had a little boy. And this little boy had always said, "Me"; "Me wants so and so;" "Me wants to go to the circus;" or "Me wants more jam." This wasn't good English, was it, because "me" never comes at the front.

But one day the little boy stopped saying "me" and spoke these words, "I want some trousers." Then the wise man invited all the other wise men in, and they came and sat down at his table, and ate Grape Nuts. "For," said the wise man, "my little boy has been changed by the fairy, 'Growth,' into another being. He has quit being a 'me,' and has become an 'I'."

It is much better to be an "I" than a "me," isn't it? For a "me" always comes at the end, while an "I" comes at the front. And an "I" does things for itself, while a "me" only gets things done to it. When we are very little we say, "Mother dresses me," but when we are more like men folks we say, "I dress myself."

We can never do things unless we are an "I." Why, to be a "me" is to be no better than an "it"! And who wants to be an it? A post is an it. How would you like to be a post? There you would have to stand all your days in one spot and maybe they would hitch a horse to you or carve their initials in your face.

Let us begin to do things for ourselves, and then we can say, "I." The morning sun will find these words upon our lips, "I will be strong. I will be happy. I will do good."

Easter and the Orphan in Every Land

The year 1909 is one of great import to the religious movement of which we are a part and which we love so dearly. It marks the close of a century of unparalleled success in the Lord's work. We must come to our Centennial with a thank-offering that will speak eloquently to the world of our loyalty to the cause which we serve, and that will adequately and fittingly express our gratitude to God for his favor in these one hundred years. What better evidence could we give of our fidelity to apostolic Christianity, and what more acceptable expression of our gratitude to God could our hearts give than through a generous offering for the loving care of orphans in all lands? "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

The Young People's Department of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions and the National Benevolent Association unite in inviting the Bible schools and the young peoples' societies to a joint observance of Easter in behalf of this holy ministry.

The Young People's Department of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions

What the Young People Have Done.

The first Junior Society of Christian Endeavor in the world was organized March 27, 1884. The same year our C. W. B. M. organized its Young People's Department, and during the past quarter century has perhaps done as much as any religious people in training children for the service of the Master and teaching them concerning missions. The offerings of our mission bands and children's Endeavor societies have been far in excess of the offerings received from a similar source by any other religious people. Not only have the direct offerings by the children been generous but their training in giving has helped all our missionary enterprises. The year preceding the organization of the C. W. B. M., when we had but one national board, the offerings made to it from some 600,000 Disciples amounted to $5,183.43; the combined offerings of our national societies now are in excess of $1,000,000 per year. The fact that many children have been trained to give generously from their little store who have now large incomes and still give generously, has had much to do with the increase in the offerings to all our missionary treasuries. This training given the children has also done much in augmenting our missionary and church forces. It has given to the church Sunday-school superintendents and teachers, Christian Endeavor leaders, church officers, ministers of the Word and missionaries to foreign lands. Surely the work of the Young People's Department is deserving of special recognition and help by all our people at Easter this year when it is celebrating its quarter centennial of efficient service as well as the centennial of our religious movement.

The department has accomplished much with its offerings. It has built churches, school houses, homes for missionaries, hospitals, dispensaries and orphanage buildings to the number of more than fifty in foreign fields. Perhaps its most important work has been the bringing up of children in the six orphanages and one babies' home in India and Porto Rico which its funds support.

The Need of Such Work.

In India it has three orphanages for girls, one for boys and a babies' home. The care of children in India is considered by all who know conditions there as a very important part of missionary work. The people are not well able to care for their children because of poverty. A missionary says: "These people are very poor as well as degraded. When I say 'poor,' I am afraid you will not understand my meaning. Imagine a man whose entire outfit of clothing did not cost 35 cents, and who scarcely ever receives more than the equivalent of 5 cents a day for wages; and is deprived of even this miserable pittance, in famine times or when work fails, and with nothing whatever to fall back upon! Is this poverty? There are thousands around us today in this wretched condition. Even under the best circumstances thousands upon thousands of people in India are always hungry." Not only are the people very poor, they are also frequently very cruel to their children. Because of British law many are restrained from killing their girl babies; but they frequently let them starve to death, or desert them, or sell them for a pittance. Our missionaries gather these children into orphanages, care for their bodies and educate their minds and hearts. As there are no Christian homes in that land in which to place orphan children, they must be kept in the orphanages until they are grown. This is well, for in this way they can most effectively be trained for service. A missionary writes: "Yashoda and Kumaniya are two of Mahoba's orphan girls who are now married and living here—girls for whom some in the homeland have labored most faithfully and prayed most earnestly. Do we ask if it has been in vain? To but know what these young women are doing answers the question. Kumaniya, besides her duties as a teacher in regular school work, has a large kindergarten school. Yashoda, besides helping in school work, visits the homes of the people, giving the Gospel message and teaching the women to read. When I tell you that these young women spoke to 114 women in different homes in Mahoba this morning, you will know that it pays."

Other Activities of the Young People.

There are also two C. W. B. M. orphanages in Porto Rico, supported by the funds of the Young People's Department. Our Girls' Christian Orphanage was the first Protestant orphanage in the island. A large and very substantial building has been erected for our Boys' Orphanage there. The chief enterprise of the department this year is securing the necessary funds for a commodious orphanage for girls as the one in which the work is now conducted has become unfit for use and is very small. This orphanage building is the one C. W. B. M. centennial object for our young people. It is also their memorial to Mrs. Moses, and is to be named the "Helen E. Moses Girls' Orphanage."

The Need of a Generous Support.

Much building work must also be done in Jamaica. Ten churches built with children's offerings were injured or destroyed by earthquake some months ago. Seven of these are still to be rebuilt. This will require many thousands of dollars. The Young People's Department surely needs the $25,000 it is asking for at Easter during this, its twenty-fifth anniversary year.

The National Benevolent Association

The work in which the National Benevolent Association is engaged is one of first importance to the church which it seeks to serve.

It Is the Will of the Lord.

It clearly is the will of the Lord that his church should throw the mantle of protecting love over the shivering forms of his suffering little ones. To her has he committed the care of the orphan child, and the aged, dependent member in his family on earth. The Apostle recognized the care of the widow and the orphan in their affliction as an essential part of true religion. The unanimous conclusion of the first council at Jerusalem was that they "should remember the poor." This is the work in which the National Benevolent Association is engaged. Evidently a generous loyalty toward its support will bring to his church his approval and blessing.

It Has Been a Fruitful Ministry.

The Lord has placed his seal of approval upon the association's work, as witnessed by its unparalleled fruitfulness. Beginning with nothing twenty-two years ago, it has grown until its helpful influence is felt by the church in every part of the land. It has homes for the aged, three in number, located in New York, Illinois and Oregon. It has two hospitals, one in St. Louis and the other in Valparaiso, Ind. It has six fine homes for orphans and other unfortunate children, located in Ohio, Georgia, Texas, Colorado and Missouri.

It has aided through the practical touch of divine love, expressed in the life of the church, 10,424 sorely needy lives. Of this number 114 were fathers and mothers in our Zion, who, having wrought faithfully, were in danger of perishing of want in their old age. Among those aided in the name of the divinely benevolent Christ were 780 widows in their affliction, 946 fathers, temporarily, in the care of their motherless little flocks, 5,434 children bereft of parental love or cursed by the influence of a wicked parentage, and 3,150 childless homes brightened, blessed and made unselfish by the gift of a baby's love and dependence. It is to the church's credit that this army of children, deprived of parental love, has not been turned over to the Roman Catholics or to the loveless state institution.

Does This Work Pay?

Does it pay to take orphan girls or girls whose parents are leading them into the way of death and make trained nurses, stenographers, home mission workers, and cultured Christian wives and mothers of them? This the association has done with hundreds. Some of them have shown their love for the home that blessed them by contributing generously to its support. Some, becoming widows, have placed their little ones under the care of the association while they work for their support.

Does it pay to take young orphan boys from the streets and haunts of sin and train them to preach the gospel of the Son of God, to serve as civil engineers, to direct great business interests, to handle thousands of dollars daily as bank tellers, to serve society by serving a United States senator as private secretary? If this kind of work pays, then the work of the National Benevolent Association pays. It has served the church and the country by rescuing hundreds of orphan boys and girls from influences that threatened them with evil and preparing them for valuable service to society. It pays to save the American orphan. He becomes a factor in every good work.

The Needs are Urgent and Can be Met.

This is our Centennial year. What better evidence can we give of our fidelity to the plea for the restoration of apostolic Christianity, what more fitting expression of gratitude to God for one hundred years of blessing than by making generous offerings for the comfort and care of the aged, homeless disciple, and the orphan child? The association asks all the churches and Bible schools to help it clear all of its Homes of debt as a Centennial thank-offering.

Then there must be enlargement. Many pathetic appeals from aged Disciples in distress are being denied because of a lack of room. Recently two widows of preachers once prominent in the church, in deep distress, had to be turned away. A new home for the aged must be established at once. We have none in the South. Five thousand dollars has been raised for this purpose in Texas. Fifteen thousand dollars more is needed. The Lord will not bless a church that allows even the "least" of his "brethren" to perish.

The present work must be sustained. We are sure that not a single member of the church would be willing to turn the seventy old people out of our Homes to suffer. Nobody would consent to closing the doors of our orphanages, thus leaving our 450 little dependent charges without loving protection. The Easter call is theirs and God's. It remains for the brethren everywhere to answer. We are confident that a great generous people will give at least $25,000 for the purpose of feeding the hungry and clothing the naked in the homeland in the name of Christ. The answer is prayerfully awaited.

The C. W. B. M. and the N. B. A. will each give, as a receipt, an attractive little booklet to each person contributing one dollar or more to their respective treasuries through the Easter offering.

This is to be a joint offering—each church is to make its own division, sending each society its portion directly.

Remittance should be made to Mrs. M. E. Harlan, 153 E. Market St., Indianapolis, Ind., and to the National Benevolent Association, 903 Aubert Ave., St. Louis Mo.

Dr. Dye at Wichita.

I count the visit of Dr. Dye to the Central Church, Sunday, March 21, one of the great occasions seldom granted any people. Nothing like his story can be heard since the days of John G. Paton in the New Hebrides. He caught this splendid church up into a mountain vision of privilege and fellowship. Great crowds hung on his story. At night 1,200 people filled our church. Our offering amounted to $700. After the Y. M. C. A. meeting, Mr. A. A. Hyde, a Presbyterian, called Brother Gill into the office and forthwith offered to give $1,000 to the Bolenge mission, if Brother Gill would do likewise. The offer was promptly accepted on Brother Gill's part, and the check was given. At the night service Brother J. H. Butts offered to give half the support of a missionary if another could be found who would duplicate. With tears of rejoicing the Schollenger Brothers promptly accepted the offer. That made $3.300 for the day. And what a day. Then late at night we gave the gospel invitation and three persons crowded down the aisles to offer their lives to Christ. The Central Church is awakening to realize the wonders of the spiritual power of money and service.

Since the close of the Scoville meetings last October, we have missed but two Sundays without additions. Brother Scoville writes that our record is phenomenal.

We look forward confidently to the future for greater fellowship in the service of Christ.

On Tuesday night we had a great banquet in honor of one of our men, a leader in the present legislature; two hundred men sat down to the tables. E. W. Allen.

Save Children in Heathen Lands!

There is no more commendable work being done by our brotherhood than the orphanage work in heathen lands by the Young Peoples' Department of the C. W. B. M.

No work is more telling than that among children. No children are so much in need of help as those in heathen lands. No children are more responsive to the sympathy and help given them.

If we are going to work among the heathen at all, common sense will tell us that we may hope for better results from work among the chiluren than adults. Experience proves it.

Let us not do less work at home; let us not do less for adult heathendom, but let us, by all means, redouble our efforts to save the children in heathen lands and train them for His service among their own people. Chas. M. Fillmore.

Greater New York

A new work was inaugurated on Monday evening, March 8, by the City Mission Committee of the Disciples Missionary Union of Greater New York. A class for the study of English was attended by fifty-four Russian young men. The meeting was held at the Young Men's Institute of the Y. M. C. A. at 222 Bowery. The teacher is Robert H. Hahn, a young lawyer, member of the Lenox Avenue Union Church. The course is entitled "English for Coming Americans." This is a system designed to teach foreigners the words they need to use every day by linking language to life. The student immediately begins to think as well as to talk English. His imagination is quickened as the familiar incidents of his daily life are called to his mind in a natural succession and as the teacher shows him how to label each idea with the right words. Only two or three members of the class could speak English even brokenly and the greater part of the members were young men who had recently come to America. A photograph taken during the evening shows the delight and enthusiasm manifested by these coming Americans in an opportunity for becoming better citizens by acquiring a knowledge of the English language. The class will meet twice weekly.

WITH THE WORKERS

W. F. Rothenberger of the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, Ohio, recently addressed the men of the church at Ashtabula upon the subject, "A Call to Men."

H. A. Turney, of Oden, Ind., has accepted a call to the pastorate of the Central Christion Church in Evansville. Mr. Turney did a good work while at Oden.

The church at Wheatland, Ind., has called W. H. Ashley, of Lebanon, Ind., to take the pastorate for this year. The Wheatland church is in a flourishing condition.

W. A. Dalton, of Oklahoma, has taken the pastorate of the church at Bruceville, Ind., and also that of the Mariah Creek Church, near Bruceville. These are two good churches.

Robert W. Lilly, minister at Keokuk, Ia., assisted by Charles E. McVay, singer and personal worker, just closed a successful meeting. Mr. McVay is now in a meeting at Auburn, Ill.

C. W. Harvey, of Irvington, has been called to the pastorate of the Flatrock Christian Church. The former pastor, Roscoe Smith, has taken the pastorate of the Fairland Christian Church. The Flatrock Church is near Rushville, Ind.

William Oeschger, pastor at Vincennes, Ind., is one of the leaders in the local option fight in his city. The churches have seventy-two saloons, one brewery and two distilleries to beat. Mr. Oeschger says it is real fighting—no practice game.

The work is moving alone nicely at Mystic, Ia. Seven were added the 14th by letter; apportionment for foreign missions more than doubled. The church begins a union revival the 28th with C. Fenwick Reed of Indiana. It has erected a tabernacle for the occasion.

The Sunday-school of the church at Memphis, Mo., has grown so greatly that the parsonage will have to be vacated to make room for the classes. The church has already decided upon this action. M. J. Nicoson, the pastor, is glad to have to move under such circumstances.

Following the Gipsy Smith meeting in Kansis City a number of our churches have been holding evangelistic services. Sheffield, C. W. Comstock; First Church, C. M. Chilton of St. Joseph, preaching; Independence Boulevard, James Small and Geo. P. Taubman; Ivanhoe Park, J. T. Ferguson, pastor, has the Fife family of evangelists. In each of these meetings good results are being obtained.

Many fine reports of the work of L. P. Schooling at Pullman, Washington, have come to us indirectly. Among these is the organization of a class which he is leading in the scientific study of the Bible, and which under his leadership has grown to have a membership of 125. Mr. Schooling has been in Pullman only one year and a half, and has already brought the church, by his aggressive and faithful work, to a position of leadership in the community.

The reports of the church at Carthage, Mo., for the past year (March 15, 1908, to March 15, 1909), show splendid results, under the leadership of D. W. Moore. From it we glean the following: Sermons, 103; additions, 81; funerals, 16; weedings, 18. Receipts—cash on hand (all departments) March 15, 1908: including certificates in Building and Loan for Aid and Bethany, $1,280.25; total receipts for the year, $5,774.78; total, $7.055.03. Expenditures—Foreign missions, $343.14; home missions, $111.24; state missions, $86.25; church extension, $68.35; orphanage at Damoh, $25; National Benevolent Association, $13.18; state bible school work, $3; Y. M. C. A., $25; centennial fund, $62.50; state special work (C. W. B. M.), $42.05; new church building, $900; general expense, $3,585.49; total expenditures, $5,285.83; Building and Loan, $90; balance, $1,679.20; total, $7,-055.03. The above report does not include funds available for the new church edifice. This is a separate fund and will approximate $40,000. The total membership of the church is 475, about seventy-five more than at the beginning of the year just closed.

Austin Hunter is in a fine meeting at Fairmount, Ind. He is assisted by Mr. Schwan as singing evangelist. The church is a newly organized one.

W. B. Morris has accepted the pastorate of the Oden (Ind.) Church. He has already moved there and is hard at work in his new field of labor.

The church at Sumner, Ill., has called J. L. Fowler, of Washington, Ind., to take charge of the work for a year. He will devote full time to the church at Sumner.

L. E. Murray is to preach for the church at Monroe City on Sunday, March 28. Mr. Murray is a student in the Vincennes University and preaches for churches on Sundays.

Melvin Putnam has resigned at Bedford. The Bedford church is one of the best that we have in the state of Indiana. He has received a call to the church at Muskogee, Okla.

J. V. Coombs held a fine meeting at Oaktown, Ind. The meeting only lasted about two weeks and there were more than sixty additions to the church. D. F. Hanna, the pastor of the Oaktown Church, is doing a very fine work.

N. Douglas Webber reports seven persons baptized March 21 in the church at Providence, Rhode Island. One of these was a Chinaman. Rev. Olin D. Connor, former Baptist minister, took membership with the church there recently.

P. Y. Pendleton, minister of the Vine St. Christian Church, Nashville, Tenn., telegraphs under date of March 21 as follows: "Balance of Living-link apportionment raised today."

The Foreign Society has just received two additional annuity gifts; one from a friend in Ohio of $1,000, and another from a friend in Illinois of $500. The Annuity Fund enjoys a steady growth.

George C. Ritchey, Newberg, Ore., speaking of the new boat for the Congo, says: "I feel almost confident that I will be able to report $10,000 at the Turner Convention June 24, and hope to be able to report $15,000 at the Pittsburg Convention." The Oregon brethren may be counted upon to do their very best, and it is now almost certain that the new "Oregon" will be floating on the Congo within a reasonable length of time.

The new $55,000 church property at Independence, Mo., was dedicated March 21, Secretary F. M. Rains assisting. Over $30,000 was raised. It will be remembered that Alexander Proctor preached here more than thirty years. This church supports R. D. McCoy, Tokio, Japan, as a Living-link in the Foreign Society. Their building enterprise will in no way hinder their regular offering for missions. Good example. L. J. Marshall is the minister.

The Price of Goodness

The goodness of Uneeda Biscuit is not a matter of cost to you. It is assured by the careful selection of the best materials for Uneeda Biscuit; by the skill of experts who bake nothing but Uneeda Biscuit; by the perfect cleanliness and appliances of great bakeries built expressly to bake Uneeda Biscuit; and, finally, by the perfect protection of a package that excludes all dust and moisture.

All this has resulted in quality out of all proportion to the price.

WITH THE WORKERS

The church at Kingsfisher, Okla., has called Clay T. Runyon as pastor.

The church at Eureka, Calif., is being assisted in a meeting by E. W. Darst of Berkeley.

George L. Snively, evangelist, has engaged to hold a meeting at Aurora, Mo., during the spring.

The church at Donovan, Ill., will be served during the coming year by A. L. Ragsdale of Eureka.

The Oklahoma Christian Ministers' Association will hold its annual meeting at El Reno in May.

Lew C. Harris, Logan, Iowa, has accepted a call to the church at Onawa, Iowa, and is already at work in the field.

J. K. Ballou, who has served the church at Sioux City, Iowa, for five years, closes his work there the first of April.

J. E. Lynn, Warren, Ohio, says: "We remain in the Living-link column as a matter of course, and will go as far beyond it as possible."

The Metropolitan Church, Chicago, has just closed a two weeks' meeting in which Roy L. Brown did the preaching. There were thirty-seven additions.

A. W. Taylor, Eureka, Ill., who begins work with the Irving Park Church, Chicago, about the fifteenth of April, preached for this church the third Sunday in March.

A men's league has been organized in the church at Blandinsville, Ill., where C. R. Wolford ministers. The church has a men's Bible class of thirty members.

Since the first of March the First Church, Moline, Ill., has been meeting in the basement of their new building. R. E. Henry is the minister of this growing church.

E. J. Arnot, who is studying in the University of Chicago, and preaching for the church at Batavia, Ill., is planning a series of lectures and entertainments for the spring.

C. L. Organ, evangelist, Des Moines, Iowa, has been over in Indiana holding a series of meetings at his old home church near Vincennes. There were 107 additions to the church, of which fifty-two were men.

The church at Pomona, Calif., is building a new $50,000 house of worship, but this does not interfere with the Living-links which will amount to $1,400 this year. Last year Pomona gave $850 for foreign missions. M. D. Clubb is the minister.

The annual convention of the New Mexico Christian Missionary convention will be held at El Paso, Texas, May 29 to June 2. The El Paso church offers free entertainment to all delegates. Names should be sent to W. H. Bryan, or H. B. Robison. Tickets for the convention are on sale from May 26 to 31.

The church at Evanston, Ill., under the leadership of O. F. Jordan, is in a meeting held by home forces. A fine audience greeted the pastor the first evening of the meeting. Evanston is forging to the front, and will begin adding to their building in the spring.

During the week ending March 24, 404 churches made offerings for foreign missions, a gain of thirty-three contributing churches. However, there was a loss in the receipts of $1,552 for the same time. This is our first loss for some time. We are hoping for better things next week.

Guy Hoover closes his work with the West Pullman, Ill., church, the last Sunday in March, and enters upon his work at Tipton, Ind. Mr. Hoover has done an excellent work at West Pullman while completing his work for the Ph. D. degree in the University of Chicago. We bespeak for him a happy and successful work in his new field.

Following the jubilee and home-coming service of the church at Ionia, Mich., they have held a series of meetings led by M. J. Grable, and Miss Una Bell Berry. The pastor, G. W. Moore writes appreciatively of the work of these evangelists, and says that the church has been greatly strengthened by their presence.

W. A. Moore reports fifty-three additions in a nine-days meeting at Saxton, Washington.

Matthew Small, evangelist, is spending ten days in Springfield, Ill., studying the Sunday revival methods.

The apportionment of the church at Balchow, Mo., was $25 more than was raised by their offering. J. A. Dillinger is pastor.

H. H. Peters reports that the C. E. Society at Vermont, Ill., gave $10 to Eureka College and commends their example to societies elsewhere.

There were seven additions to the church at El Paso, Texas, March 14, six of these by confession and baptism. H. B. Robison is the successful pastor.

The work of W. W. Weedon, with the church at Blue Mound, Ill., is moving very successfully, as is witnessed by hearty expressions of appreciation by members of his board.

March 14 was observed as "Decision Day" by the Englewood Sunday-school. In response to the invitation eight of the pupils, from nineteen to thirteen years of age, made the confession.

G. L. Lobdell, yielding to the vigorous protest of the church at Chico, Calif., was compelled to seek release from his contract with the Trinidad, Colo., Church. He reports five accessions on Sunday, March 7.

H. T. Morrison who recently returned from a three years' ministry in Australia and New Zealand and a trip to Palestine and Egypt, has accepted a call to a church at Eastpoint, Prince Edward Island, Canada. The congregation for which he will preach is an informal union of a Baptist and a Disciples' church. Mr. Morrison is well acquainted on the Island having spent a number of years of his early manhood there.

Dr. Royal J. Dye spent Sunday, March 21, with the Central Church, Wichita, Kans., E. W. Allen, minister. The offerings of the day amounted to $3,200—of this amount a member of the Presbyterian church gave $1,000 cash. I. W. Gill, the president of our National Sunday-school Association, gave another $1,000. These two gifts go toward the new "S. S. Oregon" on the upper Congo.

Two new churches are to be built in South Bend, Ind., this year. The First Church, of which G. W. Hemry is pastor, will begin this spring the erection of a $40,000 building. The Indiana Ave. Church, C. C. Buckner, pastor, will build a $10,000 house of worship.

H. O. Breeden and C. H. Altheide are in a meeting with the Central Church, Houston, Texas, where the pastor, Frank Sanderson, is doing a very successful work. Mr. Athleide is available for meetings after the first of May and should be addressed at Bloomfield, Ia.

The churches of Elkhart, Ind., will hold a union meeting during the month of May, led by Samuel Gray of Amherst, Mass. Following this the Christian church will hold a short meeting in which they will have the assistance of C. H. Winders, Irvington.

The First Church at Carthage, Mo., is beginning the erection of a $49,000 building, under the leadership of D. W. Moore, who has been with the church but one year. In another column will be found a summary of his annual report, which tells a story of good work done.

P. J. Rice of Minneapolis recently preached a series of sermons in the Portland Ave. Church there on the twelfth chapter of Romans from the ninth to the twenty-first verses. Rich texts, certainly, for wholesome instruction.

The West End Church, Chicago, C. M. Kreidler, pastor, announces a special monthly song service, March 28. The church has a choir of twenty-five voices, which is doing excellent work under the leadership of Mr. J. E. Davison, director. They are being assisted in this service by the Trier sisters, so well known among the Disciples of the Central West.

S. G. Buckner, who has distinctly "made good" in the work at Elkhart, Ind., is now it seems about to accomplish the union of the Disciples and Baptists of that city. At a recent meeting the Christian church voted unanimously to invite the Baptists to enter into the union, and appointed a committee to meet a similar committee from the Baptist church. Should this union be accomplished the two churches will at once build a new house of worship, in the most favorable location in the city. If it is not accomplished the Christian church will erect a building.

L. V. Barber reports two accessions to the church at Carlisle, Ind., March 21.

The church at Oakland, Calif., is beginning the erection of a $40,000 building.

J. J. Evans, of Albany, Ore., becomes pastor of the church at Sacramento, Calif.

F. E. Boren has received and accepted a call to the church at Vacaville, Calif.

R. V. Hope, of Columbus, Miss., has accepted a call to the church at Washington, N. C.

Lewis R. Hotaling reports five accessions to the church at Hoopeston in the last two weeks at regular services.

As soon as the right man can be found the Indiana state board will place a Bible school superintendent in the field.

J. L. Fowler, of Washington, Ind., has been called to the church at Sumner, Ill., for full time, beginning March 21.

Prof. Walter Stairs, of Berkley Bible Seminary, preaches at Irvington, Calif., on Sundays, and is pushing the church work with enthusiasm.

A good meeting has been held with the church at Michawaka, Ind., where J. D. Hull is pastor. The church was assisted by Mitchell and Bilby.

Thirty-six churches have raised double their apportionment or more in the March offering for foreign missions. Some have five and six times as much.

The Martin family are in a meeting at Blackwell, Okla., with more than 249 additions to the church, more than doubling the membership of the church.

The First District of the Indiana Christian Missionary Society will hold its convention at Kendallville, April 5 and 6. An excellent program has been prepared. S. G. Buckner, pastor of the church at Elkhart, is to make an address upon "The Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ." G. W. Henry, South Bend, upon "Our Centennial."

V. W. Blair, who some time ago resigned his pastorate at Greenfield, Ind., and at the earnest request of the church, consented to withdraw his resignation, has finally resigned and is taking a season for recuperation after his long siege of typhoid fever. Mr. Blair went from Yale University to Greenfield about three years ago and has done a very aggressive and successful work with that church. We regret his resignation, but hope that he may be fully restored to health, and that some of the good churches of this vicinity may secure his services.

The Missouri Christian Lectureship

Springfield, Mo., April 12-14.

The program includes:

Address, "The Men's Brotherhood Movement"—P. C. McFarlane, Kansas City.

General discussion led by Frank W. Allen, Paris, Mo.

"The Evidential Value of the Gospel of John," First paper, President J. B. Jones, Fulton, Mo., second paper, Earle Wilfley, St. Louis.

"The Ethics of Jesus," First paper, Prof. Charles M. Sharpe, Columbia, Mo., second paper, W. M. White, Mexico, Mo.

Address—Madison A. Hart, Columbia, Mo.

"The Resurrection of Jesus"—James Orr. (Book Review)—J. W. Monser, Kansas City.

"Some Results of New Testament Criticism"—W. W. Burks, Nevada, Mo.

Address—J. H. George, president of Drury College, Springfield, Mo.

The meetings of the Lectureship are to be held in the First Christian Church, corner College and Campbell streets, four blocks from the two passenger stations. Those attending will be the guests of the three congregations of Springfield. Entertainment, the best they can provide, will be furnished free. The ministers and congregations unite in extending a most cordial invitation to all who can attend. Executive Committee.

J. A. Hopkins, of Bellaire, Ohio, has been called to the work at Snow Hill, Md.

The church at Ontario, Calif., is remodeling its building.

The Berkeley Bible Seminary adds H. J. Loken to their faculty. Prof. Loken is an alumnus of the Seminary and also of the University, and spent last year at Harvard. He will also serve as pastor of the church at Alameda.

Telegrams

Georgetown, Ky., March 29.—Seventeen yesterday, ninety-two in two weeks. Kendrick popular pastor, Sturgis fine song leader and soloist.—R. H. Crossfield.

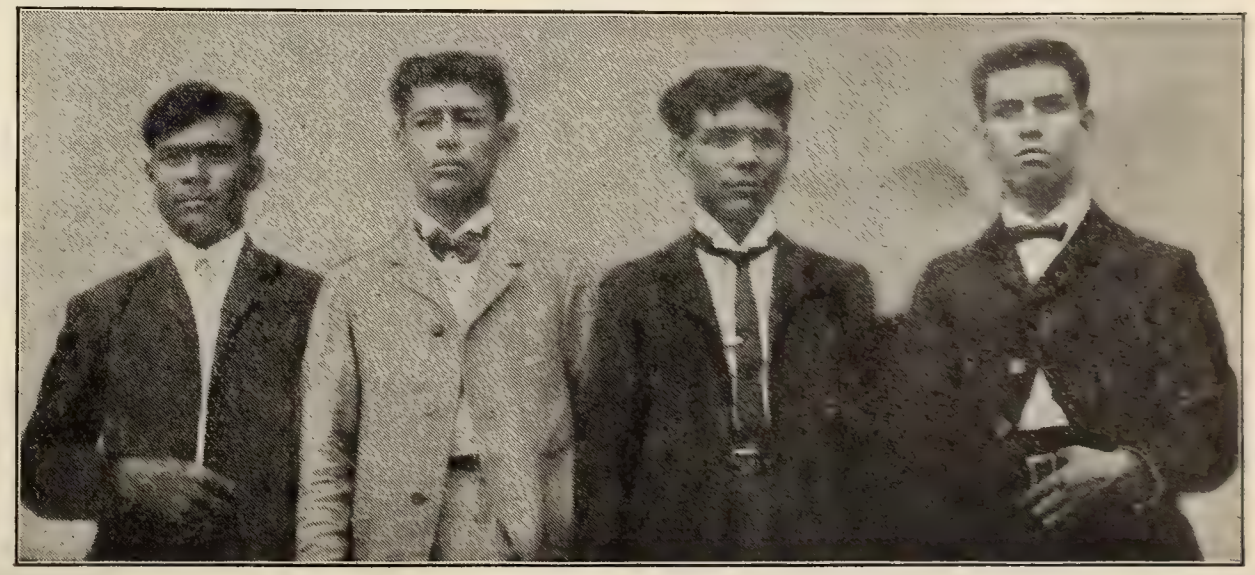
El Reno, Okla., March 28.—Seventy added thus far. Shifting population makes ingathering difficult. Church will build $30,000 house at once. Pastor O. L. Smith wields great influence here. We go to Frankfort, Ky.—Sellers and St. John, Evangelists.

Herington, Kans., Mar. 28.—Nineteen days with ninety-four additions. Seven men tonight. Nineteen today. One Jew made the confession. One engineer and his fireman came forward together. Tonight's opera house service crowded. Continue.—O. E. Hamilton and Haley.

Denver, Colo., March 26.—Meeting with Bro. Pickett and the Highlands Church growing in interest. Bro. Pickett after eight years is much loved by the church. Heard Gipsy Smith's lecture "From Tent to Pulpit." So did 10,000 others. The auditorium cost $1,000 a week. Converts estimated by the thousands. Thousands were at the station to see him off, this gypsy boy from the tent. Four weeks schooling, continents listen to him. His audience travelled from laughter to tears and back again to laughter.—J. M. Lowe.

Connersville, Ind., Mar. 29.—Short meeting with this great Connersville church, Burkhardt's monument as pastor. Big men's meeting yesterday. Hundreds turned away last night. People rallying every way. Brother Scoville's converts enthusiastic and among our best workers. There cannot be another phenomenal ingathering, but there are conversions every service. Sixty-three first week of invitations. Rodgers doing fine work as singer and soloist. Continue over next Sunday when start at Washington, Indiana, with Pastor Davidson.—Herbert Yeuell.

Bloomington, Ill., March 25.—Our offering for foreign missions at the First Church is the greatest in the history of our congregation. Over $700 to date in cash and pledges. We recently had our Living Link Dr. E. A. Layton, of Chicago, with us. He gave us three thrilling addresses and his presence here was a benediction. Missionary interest and zeal on the part of our congregation is increasing. Our Endeavor Society recently provided for all of the annual expenses by thithing the income of the members for three weeks. About 100 additions since the first of the year.—Edgar DeWitt Jones, Pastor.



Des Moines, Ia., March 29.—Forty-one added at University Church yesterday, 777 since meetings began. Thirty-three at two missions. One thousand six hundred forty-one in all since coming to Des Moines. The fellowship of those churches and Brothers Medbury and Idleman is as near ideal as an evangelist could ever expect. At our reception for new converts at Central Church $3,581 was subscribed for next year's current expenses of Central Church. The old subscribers have increased their pledges $1,300 and church increased pastor's salary $500. We have many consecrated souls in these churches. Vancamp and Rockwell singing.—Chas. Reign Scoville.

The Springfield Awakening

The W. A. Sunday union revival in Springfield, Ill., continues with intensifying interest. About 100 persons come forward and sign cards each night, while at the children's meetings on Saturdays the number is between 200 and 300. Nine thousand men heard what the newspapers called a "warm" sermon on Sunday afternoon. About 200 responded to the invitation. The total number of conversions to date is about 2,500. On Friday night of last week Mr. Sunday preached his famous sermon on amusements, denouncing cards, theaters and the dance in a most vehement and lurid manner. The crowd on the outside of the Tabernacle at 6 o'clock that evening was big enough to fill the mammoth structure. Fifteen hundred seats were reserved for railroad men on Saturday night. Governor and Mrs. Deneen attend occasionally and a prayer meeting was held one morning in the home of Mayor Reece. It is reported that the boys of one of the grade schools have banded together with the pledge not to touch tobacco or liquor for at least one year. Mr. Sunday has had great difficulty in getting the church people to "work" in the congregation during the invitation. He has finally accomplished this, however, and the mass of people is alive with activity and excitement while the evangelist is exhorting. This week men's noonday meetings will be held in the court house. The town is in the grip of the churches just now. Newspapers devote three and four full pages each day to a report of the meetings. One editor told me that his subscription list had been increased by over 3,000 names on account of the revival news. If the other papers get a like increase it indicates how widespread throughout the state the interest is. The meeting will last over Easter—making six weeks of it. The last two weeks are the harvest time. It is our purpose to visit the revival again and afterward to give our readers a report of the results, with, perhaps, a bit of discussion as to the significance of it all. C. C. M.

Reception for Mrs. Agnew

The Woman's Missionary Auxiliaries of the Chicago Union will give a reception in farewell to Mrs. Mary Agnew in the Hyde Park Church next Friday evening at 8 o'clock. Mrs. Agnew has been president of the union for several years and is greatly loved by the women of all the churches. It is hoped that many representatives from all parts of the city will be present at the reception.

Mexican Evangelists Educated in School at Monterey Conducted by C. W. B. M.

Round and About Pittsburg

It was C. B. Knowles, who used this significant sentence in "St. Cuthbert": "The weekly garner is the best grist for the Sunday mill." A number of our Western Pennsylvania preachers have made a discovery, and in consequence the work in their churches is going by leaps and bounds. Thos. Hughes, the faithful pastor at Turtle Creek, has given a demonstration of this, not only in the large ingathering at a recent meeting, but in a splendid Bible school. The church is not yet seven years old, situated in what has been denominated a hard field, yet they have a membership of about 475. This includes the 213 added during the recent evangelistic campaign. A similar result may be noted concerning the work at Knoxville, where Fred M. Gordon ministers. The church is young, but full of splendid enthusiasm, and additions there come every Lord's Day. In other words, they have an evangelistic campaign on fifty-two Sundays in the year. Both of these men are firm believers in pastoral visitation, and the crowded houses evening after evening throughout the year is a demonstration of the real value of this sort of work. In fact it may be noted that the great success of the work in Western Pennsylvania in the last twenty years is to be attributed very largely to the faithful work of the men in constant and persistent pastoral visitation.

The evangelistic report for the week is as follows:

Bellevue, Wm. Ross Lloyd, minister, 16; Bryn Mawr, E. B. Quick, evangelist, 20; Homestead, D. R. Moss, 12; McKeesport, C. A. McDonald, minister, 2; Hazelwood, W. G. Winn, minister, 2; Knoxville, F. M. Gordon, minister, 3; Squirrel Hill, Lawson Campbell, minister, 10; Turtle Creek, Thomas Hughes, minister, 3; Wilkinsburg, Geo. W. Knepper, minister 1; Big Run, G. A. Maldoon, minister, 51 (two weeks); Duquesne, Percy A. Davis, minister, 23; making a total of 143 additions.

We are pained to announce the death of James Blackstone, a faithful and consistent member of the East End Christian Church, and Mrs. J. E. Weddell, a fine worker in the McKeesport Christian Church.

There is a contest on between the Bethany Adult Bible Class at Knoxville, with Fred M. Gordon as teacher, and class No. 17 of Washington, Pa., with E. A. Cole as teacher.

203 Bissell Block. O. H. Philips.

Arkansas

J. J. Taylor, Secretary,
Little Rock.

The Arkansas Traveler has not sent any "notes" for some time. This is not due to having been idle, but to the fact that he has been so exceedingly busy he has had no time to write of his work.

Much has been accomplished since our last report. Churches have been organized, others have been reorganized, meetings, great ones, have been held in many churches in this state and the work has gone forward wonderfully.

The great new church at Paragould is being filled at almost every service and the Sunday-school is growing. Morgan E. Genge has the work well in hand and the brethren are greatly pleased with his work.

Jonesboro, Thos. A. Minyard minister, is going forward splendidly. They are rapidly moving up toward the front rank in all work of the Master and the debt on the new church is growing beautifully less. Brother Minyard has a splendid help in his talented wife and she is a leader in the woman's work in that church.

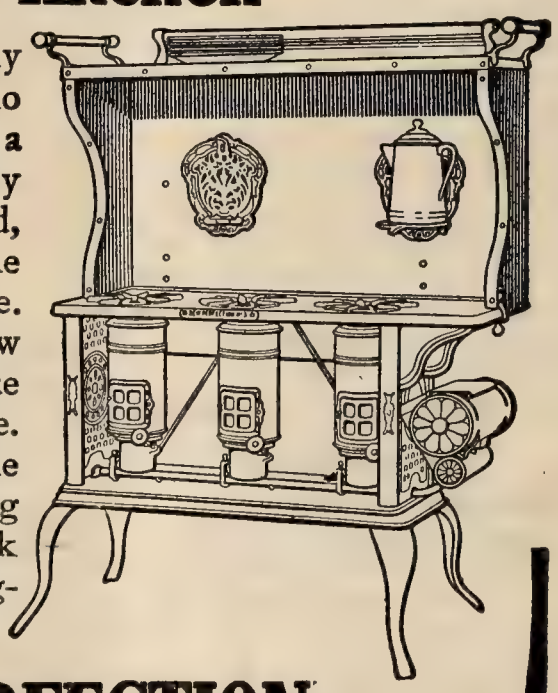
A. R. Adams, Fremont, Mich., has recently taken the work at Clarendon and has already proved that the faithful preaching of the gospel will win there, as it does other places, for the house is filled at nearly every service and the Sunday-school has doubled in the short time he has been there—a little over one month. We are expecting Clarendon to come rapidly to the front now and soon become one of our leading churches in this state.

F. B. Elmore has taken the work at Stuttgart and a new parsonage is one of the recent enterprises undertaken there. Stuttgart is a fine town, in a fine country, and our church there is composed of some choice spirits. We bespeak for Brother Elmore a great work in that promising field.

We spent one day with Brother C. C. Cline and the church at Pine Bluff and it was a happy time for us. Brother Cline is an old friend of ours and it was a delight to speak for him in that busy church and to hear him sing again. The church there had already pledged $50.00 for state Missions, but when we told of our great work in the state and of its possibilities they increased the pledge to $77.00. That is what all our strong churches should do this Centennial Year. Then we might hope to do something worthy of us in this state.

A few days were enjoyed with the Brother Martin T. Pope, minister at Fordyce, and the brethren there. Our church is not strong in numbers at Fordyce but rich in Faith, and therein lies their strength. There is rarely a service at which all are not present, and Brother Pope says that all are so familiar with the Scriptures that he has to study very hard to keep up. Brother Pope says he has the greatest church in the state—only about twenty-two members—but they are present at every service, and they gave last year for State Missions $94.86!

Brother C. K. Marshall is keeping things very much alive at Hope. They, also, increased their pledge to State work $48.00. Brother Marshall is a good preacher and is thoroughly awake to every good work.



A. B. Cunningham has recently taken up the work in the splendid church at Texarkana. We will expect some fine reports from that source soon. He has assured us that Texarkana would do her duty for State Missions.

Joe A. Dethridge, who took up the work at Okolona two months ago, has resigned and gone to Nashville, Ark., to succeed Brother Meyers, and Brother Newton, who recently united with the Christian church from the Methodists, in a meeting we held at Waldron, is at Okolona with a view to taking the work. So, you see, we do not lose much time when a pulpit is vacant, if only the brethren will co-operate with us and make their wants known. There are some good churches in the state without preachers and have been for sveral months, but we can get no direct word from them. Brethren, it is a great mistake to allow our work to drag in this way. Our Master demands of us that we "work while it is day."

E. Howard Peters, who took the work at Altus in November, has accomplished wonders. He is the busiest preacher we ever saw. Besides looking after the work in Altus he has found time to hold several meetings away from home and has organized a church in Ozark, a county seat, raised money for a new building in Altus and had many accessions. We have many opportunities similar to that of Altus if we can find the men like Brother Peters who will work as he works. If there are in our ranks any who want the joy of building up a great work and will take hold with a vim, write the undersigned.

Brethren, let us not forget that this is our Centennial Year. We are to make special efforts for our King this year. Have you doubled your offering for State Missions? Have you sent it in? Please do so now.

The Minister and the Confessional

From the days of the great reformation it has been clearly understood that it is no part of a minister's duty or privilege to institute a confessional. One of the first dangers recognized by Protestantism in the machinery of the Roman Catholic Church was the right of the priests to probe into the private lives and consciences of their people with the effective instrument of auricular confession. This danger has not diminished, but rather grown with the years. The secret and unholy thoughts of the heart are little cleansed by being poured into the ear of another, especially when that other is a fellow sinner, and quite as likely to be moved by curiosity or baser motives as by the paternal sentiment of guardianship and discipline which could alone give sanction to so perilous a rite.

Nevertheless, every minister is called upon at times to become a father confessor to some distressed soul. There are doubts which cry out for the comfort of assurance; there are sins which clamor for confession. There come times in the lives of men and women struggling toward truth and a holier life when nothing but the pouring forth of their inmost souls to some sympathetic listener can lighten the burden. To whom should they be able to intrust such sorrows, perplexities and sins, if not to the man of God who is their father in the faith, the shepherd and bishop of their souls? Thus, without any formal establishment of the confessional, but as the only means of bringing relief to men and women whose troubles are greater than they can bear, the minister finds himself now and then intrusted with the deep mysteries of other lives, the joys or sorrows which lie at the very foundation of their being.

It need hardly be said that the true minister of the Gospel will neither invite nor repel these confidences. To invite them would too often result in unnecessary and even perilous interviews with people, especially women, who by reason of morbid states of mind would delight to relate real or imaginary troubles for the sake of securing sympathy, and even for purposes less praiseworthy. A minister cannot too sacredly guard his inner life as well as his good name which is so easily tainted by any rumor of confidences which are either unnecessary or questionable.

On the other hand, he cannot repel them if he is persuaded that the motive is good and that help can be rendered. To turn away at such a moment might be to give over a sorely distracted soul to the haunting peril of doubt or the black abyss of despair. The right decision at such a moment is one of the problems upon which he may well seek the counsel of the truest and most loving human companionship, and beyond all else "the wisdom that cometh from above." It is a notable and humiliating fact that ministers are more frequently the victims of misplaced confidence than any other class of men. This is due both to the cloistered and protected lives they live, and to the confidential relations in which many people, particularly women, once more, seem to hold them.

To what kind of a minister may all important confidence be intrusted? Certainly not to the frivolous sort, who could render no help. Nor the gossipy sort, who could not be trusted to keep to himself the secrets disclosed. Nor the pompous sort, who would only accept the confidence as a tribute to his own importance and merit. Nor the evil-minded sort, who would gratify his curiosity without affording help. One in trouble might almost as helpfully tell the first stranger met upon the street as a man of either of these varieties, or others that might be named.

The only man who can be safely and wisely made the confidant and confessor of the sinful and the troubled is the man whose nature is a compound of humility, piety, wisdom, discretion, sympathy and invincible secrecy. Where any of these quaities are lacking, there can be no assurance of good as the result of such confessions.

No minister worthy of the name can ever listen to the broken words of confession without a deep and humbling sense of his own unworthiness, and a consciousness that only by the grace of God is he delivered from the necessity of making the same confession. Those who know most of the abysses of the human heart, and how hard a thing it is to shut the gates upon sin, learn to be very gentle with the erring, considering themselves, lest they also be tempted.

Above all things should the absolute secrecy of such disclosures as are made under these conditions be guarded as a man would guard his honor or his life. The minister who would reveal to another the confidences made known to him as a spiritual adviser and shepherd, betrays the most sacred trust committed to his keeping. Such a man is unworthy of the position he disgraces as a minister of the Gospel.

These reflections are suggested by a recent episode in this city. The pastor of one of the Protestant churches was approached by one of the women of his congregation with a request for help and a confession of sin. The nature of the sin is of no moment. It may have been a transgression of the moral law, or only a consciousness of failure to live the fullest Christian life. Instead of fulfilling his office as a counsellor and helper, the minister disclosed the facts to the officers of his church. The matter, of course, became public, the worst possible construction was placed upon the woman's confession, another minister was involved in the growing scandal, the public press seized upon the story as admirably calculated to awaken and gratify a prurient curiosity, the congregation was rent into factions, the entire denomination to which the church belonged was disgraced, and the cause of Christ suffered in the house of its friends. At the present time it seems likely that the unhappy affair will be taken to the civil courts. "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth."

All this scandal and reproach was the result of one preacher's inability to hold his tongue. The evil that this indiscretion has wrought will not be overcome in a generation. It is hard, no doubt, to keep a secret. To be aware that one knows facts that would cause a sensation is to be seriously tempted to misuse those facts. Particularly is this the case when the motive of the public good can even in the remotest way be invoked. But the minister must understand that the confidences committed to his keeping are the result of his sacred office, and are not his to disclose. Great as have been the abuses of the confessional in the Roman Catholic Church, it is the rarest of events that a confession thus made is ever betrayed. The conscience of the priest is bound as with bands of steel not to reveal what is thus communicated. Protestantism has no occasion to create for itself a confessional. But when its ministers are called upon to hear the sins and troubles of their people, it is the first and most elemental of their duties to regard these disclosures as sacred beyond all hint of betrayal.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

GETTING RID OF BAD OFFICIALS

The ordinary corrupt politician counts, that once he is in office, he can continue therein until the end of his term at least and by proper manipulation of office and contracts and police remissness, keep himself there while dealing corruptly with the people's money. At least he will have a full term before anything can be done. The "Recall" has been advocated for some time as a just and expeditious way of preventing the corruption of public trust by an official. It virtually makes his tenure contingent upon honesty and the confidence of the public. A minority may petition for his recall. Usually there is an honest and an interested minority. They must specify legitimate reasons for the recall or else opposing factions could cause untold trouble. Once the recall petitions are filed a new election must be held and in it the protested official may contest again for the office and appeal to his record. If he is worthy and can show good reason for inviting public confidence the public will quickly rally to him; for the American public, once it is aroused to a question of right and wrong, generally loves justice. Los Angeles has recently demonstrated the method, and the utter desertion of the protested mayor attested to the legitimacy both of the method and of this particular use of it. Chicago proposes to adopt it in her new charter. Los Angeles' experiment will encourage all our graft ridden cities to try the expedient. It ought to be adopted for legislative as well as executive office. It would be very wholesome as a means of keeping a legislator interested in his constituents' welfare more than that of some powerfully lobbied special interest.

A DIRIGIBLE WARSHIP

A few days ago Count Zepellin, Germany's venerable inventor of the solid dirigible airship, "flew" 150 miles with twenty-six men on board. This is his new vessel which cost $100,000. He remained in the air several hours and it is claimed his ship can make as high as 50 miles per hour and remain aloft for many hours. The Kaiser is reported as determined on a complete fleet of these new and formidable warships. Zepellin says he has demonstrated the feasibility of his air-craft as a means of transporting troops and carrying munitions of war as well as that of a bomb carrier and terrific torpedo craft. Germany will spend millions in this new war business; France is putting much money into the Wright's new aeroplanes; England is both watching and building; our economical Uncle Sam cannot raise the money. It costs him too much for other luxuries or perhaps he will let others pay for the experiments and he will buy the sure thing.

SCHOOL ALL THE YEAR ROUND

For some years clubs and philanthropic associations have been managing "Vacation Schools" in the large cities. Philanthropic innovations have generally to be introduced by philanthropists and demonstrated, then the government will take them up. Chicago's school board will take charge of all the Vacation Schools hereafter. They have demonstrated their worth. They are really play schools. Healthful recreation is made to carry with it a lesson each day. These efforts will also help to get the play idea introduced into the school all the year round. The play idea is simply the idea of leading into instruction by means of natural childish interest. The child will do well anything he likes to do. He likes to play above all else. Is not there then the golden road by which he may be led into all usefulness? Let instruction be combined with his play instinct and directed to creative effort.

CITY HOMES FOR VICTIMS OF THE "WHITE PLAGUE"

Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt is leading in a new philanthropy. It is no new thing to build model tenements and there are many homes for consumptives furnished by charity. The combination of the two is Mrs. Vanderbilt's original means of mercy. She proposes to build, in the heart of New York City, model tenements for families in which there is some poor victim of the great white plague. This will prevent the necessity of separating the family and allow the afflicted one to continue as a contributor to the family income, while at the same time surrounding him with every sanitary precaution and giving him expert medical oversight. The best expert medical oversight will be provided and every precaution taken to both cure the afflicted and prevent others from contracting the disease. Mrs. Vanderbilt will spend $1,000,000 in these homes and they will be an inestimable boon to families of moderate income who are so unfortunate as to have a loved one stricken with the scourge of tuberculosis.

TEMPERANCE AT THE WHITE HOUSE

By the special request of President Taft, no wines were served at the inaugural ball. Let us hope he will extend the mandate to the White House tables and put not there "the bottle to his neighbor's lips." Here the new president can render untold benefit to the greatest moral reform of the times. His action will give immense moral support to a question which depends utterly upon moral influence. It is here that religious sentiment ought to cluster, rather than around questions of the president's orthodoxy. Let him be a Unitarian if he honestly holds that way. That is an intellectual question. This other is a moral question and being such is vitally religious. Instead of excusing one in a high office on the theory that he must, perforce, follow "society custom," would it not be better to demand that he initiate and enforce moral example?

THE PARIS STRIKE—THE WORKER'S "BILL OF RIGHTS"

Paris has experienced a complete tie up of means of verbal intercommunication. Mail, telephones and telegraphs are included in France under a department of the interior and their control, as governmental activities, is in the hands of a Department chief. This chief has been one Simyan and he has tried to manage his department like a military chieftain. He was one side to all common matters between employer and employees and there was no other side—for there is in reality no other side unless the entire working body are as one in meeting the employing side which is always as one. Whatever detailed grievances were presented by the workers and whatever else is asked for while the strike is on, it is well understood that the whole protest is against the arbitrary principles embodied in Monsieur Simyan. In other words it is a strike for a "bill of rights" for employees wherein they demand the right to be heard in their own behalf and to have a say in their own business and to stand on equal terms in all matters that pertain to the mutual task with their employer. Clemencieu grants their real contention, they grant the minor demands, the government is saved and the cause is won.

"THREE ACRES AND LIBERTY"

Some time ago Bolton Hall issued a little book with the above title. It ought to bring joy to many a weary city worker and man with a family and no job. It ought to be welcome news to the man who wants a change and has little capital, or who would like a chance to be his own employer after his prospects of ever getting a larger salary or a business of his own in the city is gone. It ought to become a campaign for the self-relief of workless city homes and the poor, for the wornout and semi-invalids. Now Mr. Hall has organized "The Little Land League" and a new self-supporting social service is inaugurated.

A MISSIONARY WEDGE

Now that Turkey is opening to all things new and the leaven of modern civilization is working so rapidly, missionary figures take on a rare interest there. The Mohammedan is proverbially the most difficult of missionary prospects. He is a fatalist and a fanatic generally, and if he could be won it has heretofore been worth his life to let it be known. Turkey is not all Mohammedan, nor even to an overwhelming extent so, but missionary work has been difficult because of Turkish oppression both of the missionary and the native who was subject to Islamic power. With the general public understanding of the Turk and his ways it will be surprising to know that there are 483 foreign missionaries in the empire, and that they have the help of 1,600 native workers. Preaching, teaching and healing are carried on at nearly 500 different places and there are 182 organized churches with over 20,000 communicants to say nothing of the adherents. There are 48 hospitals and dispensaries and 226,000 cases were treated last year. Perhaps the greatest activity is that of education by school and press. There are 7 seminaries, 11 colleges, 68 boarding and high schools, and 578 common or day schools, and they instruct a grand total of 35,000 pupils. Roberts College, near Constantinople, in point of influence and extent of work done, is one of the most notable educational institutions of Christendom. At Beirut, in Syria, is one of the greatest missionary plants in the world. There are industrial and medical schools as well as churches and common schools. Perhaps the most notable of this mission's institutions is its great printing press. In one year it printed over 22,000,000 pages and put the material into hands where it would do the most good. The adherents to the various churches of the 15 societies working there number about 80,000, so there is really a Protestant population of about 100,000. This is but the entering wedge.

EDITORIAL

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY will deal gently with the editors, we are sure, if an occasional sermon gets itself printed in our pages. When it is remembered that both editors are pastors of churches we feel that we can presume on the "forgiving spirit" of the reader if we do lapse occasionally into the pulpit order of literature, especially if we promise not to do so very often!

The Ministerial Association of Eureka College provides annually a series of addresses by some pastor or teacher who spends a week of the closest contact with the young men. This year W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, has been asked to perform this service. He will be in Eureka the week beginning May 10, speaking twice each day. His afternoon Round Table Talks are on these subjects: The Preacher, The Pastor, The Message, The Man. "Mark Hopkins on one end of the log, the student on the other" is the ideal that will be realized in these conferences.

After the Chapman-Alexander meetings in Springfield, Mass., the churches of the city published a request that all organizations, whether secular or religious, in arranging for public meetings of any kind, have respect for the standing date of Thursday evening on which all the churches hold their mid-week services of prayer. No community need wait for a revival to awaken extraordinary interest as a warrant for this kind of action. It would be a wholesome thing to do anywhere; and would dignify the prayer-meeting in the eyes both of the community and the church people.

The article by Dr. B. B. Tyler on Gipsy Smith gave a shock to our editorial nerves when we read it first. Our exchanges have been unanimous in their praise of the Gipsy's work in various cities and in the chorus of approval we have discerned many Disciple voices. No more keen observer than Dr. Tyler has spoken, however. He knows what to look for in an examination of evangelistic results. Added to his keen perceptions and balanced judgment all our brotherhood knows of his deeply sympathetic attitude toward Christian evangelism. Therefore, while his article reveals Dr. Tyler's characteristic courage in criticising what nearly everybody else seems to be praising, we feel that his suggestions have to be reckoned with, and we hope every reader will at least give him a fair hearing.

Dr. Arthur T. Pierson, the editor of the Missionary Review of the World and one of the personal associates of Mr. Moody during his life, has recently written in The Record of Christian Work, an article severely arraigning the evangelism of the present generation. He contrasts the old evangelism as represented by Wesley, Whitfield, Nettleton, Finney and Moody with that now in vogue, which, he says is "attended with extensive organization, elaborate preparation, expensive outlay, studied notoriety, display of statistics, newspaper advertising, and systematic puffing, spectacular sensationalism, dramatic novelties, and sometimes doubtful complications with secular and political issues." He emphasizes the fact that modern evangelism is increasingly costly and that it makes so much of numbers that most numerical estimates are exceedingly misleading as to the real value of the work done. Mr. W. R. Moody, son of the great evangelist, in commenting editorially on Dr. Pierson's criticisms of current evangelism, endorses his statements and points especially to the spirit of sensationalism and commercialism that seems to dominate much evangelistic work in our day.

That wily angler, the editor of The Christian-Evangelist, has succeeded in gettin a "bite" from a good sized Presbyterian fish, The Interior. A paragraph on the baptism question was the bait. The Christian-Evangelist called The Herald and Presbyter's attempt to get the eunuch baptized by sprinkling "such a fantastic trick as would make the average higher critic turn pale." The latter paper, it seemed, had arranged a nice little "fountain" by the roadside so that when Philip and the eunuch drove up the affusion-baptism could conveniently take place, but by no possibility could the Ethiopian be immersed. Now, The Interior concedes the validity of the stricture made by the Christian-Evangelist in this instance, admitting that "the story certainly indicates that the eunuch experienced immersion at Philip's hands, though there is more than a chance that he wasn't submersed as Baptists and Disciples would today require." But The Interior "comes back" at the Christian-Evangelist, innocently declaring that "in the baptism of the Philippian jailer 'Luke's simple story' just as clearly indicates that the mode of the rite was sprinkling or affusion." We have seen many fish caught with this bait, but we never saw it taken so unsuspectingly as the always alert Interior is taking it just now. We doubt if we have the heart to watch Dr. Garrison make the landing!

It is hard for our good brethren of other denominations to realize that the great meetings held nowadays by the Disciples are "on the square." The actual number of additions to the membership of a single local church is so often as large as the total number of "conversions" in a union meeting involving from ten to twenty-five churches that our neighbors cannot believe their eyes. Suspecting something wrong they have recourse to the most obvious explanation: these Disciples are proselyting from other folds! A Des Moines correspondent of the Standard (Baptist) reporting the dedication of the University church's new auditorium and the Scoville meetings with over 1,500 accessions, says, "Pastors of other flocks find it expedient to keep watch and ward over their respective folds, as a 'proselyte of the gate' counts the same as a convert from the 'outer court' with these brethren—in Iowa at least." All we have to say is that we believe the basis of this insinuation lies in the imagination of the correspondent, and that if he attempted to furnish specific cases in point he would be made to appear ridiculous. Our curiosity is piqued, however, by a parenthesis in his report. He says, "The Church of Christ-ians is enjoined by order of court from using the name 'Christians' in this city." That would be interesting news to us and our readers. We would like to hear when and for what cause such an injunction was issued.

It is apparent that there is a growing interest in the union of Baptists and Disciples in many places. The recent Congress of Baptists, Free Baptists, and Disciples, held in this city, emphasized the possibilities of this movement. Advices from a number of preachers who are quietly promoting such union with the Baptists in our own localities give reason to believe that a practicable step is being taken toward joining these two closely related bodies of Christians. To be sure there are differences between Baptists and Disciples which have historic significance. But there are differences between Baptists and Baptists and between different groups of Disciples as well. It is not too much to say that when two churches, Baptist and Disciples, possess the spirit of consecration to the purpose of the kingdom of God, they are closer together in ideals and activities than either one of them might be with other churches of their respective communities. It is at least significant that so many Disciples are thinking most earnestly of local solutions to the problem of a divided church and are attempting to promote such coöperation and union with the Baptists as shall bring in the happier day. The success of the union at the Memorial Church of Christ in this city, which is the result of joining the First Christian Church and the Memorial Baptist Church about a year ago, has led many people, both Baptists and Disciples, to believe that the time has come to study the whole question from the standpoint not of the union of denominations, but the union of individual churches where the local needs and opportunities suggest such action. The plan adopted at Memorial Church is serving as a basis for such study in a number of localities.

A number of churches have voluntarily asked to be admitted to the Living Link column in the support of missionaries in the Home field. Some of these churches but a few years ago were being supported by the American Christian Missionary Society. Having passed through the trials and tribulations of the mission field, they have boundless sympathy for those placed in like position, and their first thought is for those that suffer in like manner.

The Living Link plan is a sensible plan of work, and we are not surprised that the churches are coming more and more to adopt it. It brings the whole church into a sense of personal relationship with a definite portion of some great Home field. The congregation is thus enabled to get acquainted with the missionaries actually occupied in building up the cause in remote places. A church which has its assistant pastor in some new field in the West as well as in India or Africa is a church that is bound to be of potent influence in the local community.

We have not seen a clearer cut or more adequate statement from any candidate for municipal office than that made by former Lieut. Governor Sherman, in his campaign for Mayor of Springfield, Ill. Mr. Sherman has only recently taken his residence in the capital city. He won the Republican nomination by a lead of only twenty votes. He now pledges himself to Sunday closing of saloons, separation of the liquor business from gambling and the social evil, and the suppression of wine rooms and all law breaking. He declares that the Illinois license system is on trial. Unless it is demonstrated that the saloon can be conducted under legal restraint there will be no saloon, he says.

"I want to be elected," Mr. Sherman declares, "but I would rather be thrown into the political discard than secure my election on any platform other than the enforcement of the law. If you don't want the statutes and ordinances obeyed don't elect me."

"I can afford to be beaten on this platform," he said with emphasis, "but you can't afford to beat me."

Speaking on the question of the Sunday saloon, Mr. Sherman announced that so long as there was a statute or an ordinance against it he was unalterably opposed to it. Then he added that there wasn't much prospect of changing the statutes.

He continued:

"You saloonkeepers are more industrious than God Almighty. He rested after six days. You never rest. He worked six days. You want to work seven. He made man unto the image of himself and after that he rested. I ask you whether you have not in six days time enough to sell all the booze to the human beings that have a thirst without wanting to run overtime on the holy Sabbath?

"You should be satisfied without wanting to run overtime on the holy Sabbath. The Sunday closing law is not only the law of holy writ, it is not only the law of morals, it is the law of human health. It is not civil law. It is police regulation. It is the law laid down for the health, the peace, and the good government of men.

"You ought to observe it. Every man ought to observe it, and you are about the only occupation I know of who refuse to obey it."

Mr. Sherman's sincerity is unquestioned. It would be interesting to know just how much the great Sunday revival in Springfield has done to give the candidate the courage of his convictions. No candidate for mayor in that city has ever given such pledges with any hope of being elected upon that sort of platform. The campaign, running as it does contemporary with the Tabernacle meetings, and terminating when they terminate, may be regarded as registering the civic impulse derived from the work of Mr. Sunday.

Presumptive Proof of Christ's Resurrection

AN EASTER SERMON

By Charles Clayton Morrison

TEXT: "Whom God raised up, having loosed the pangs of death: because it was not possible he should be holden of it."—Acts 2:24.

Jesus Christ was a man. Whatever else he was let us never let that fact be obscured, or twisted, or in any way rendered unreal, or dubious. We believe that he was divine, that he was the Son of God, but the beginning of our thought about him considers him as a man. Our first acquaintance with him is as Jesus the carpenter of Nazareth in Galilee, a good man and gracious. Our final judgment upon him is that he is none other than the Son of God. But we must make sure that our thought about him does not begin with a doctrine of his divinity, but with the fact of his humanity. For if we bring to him minds that are pledged to a fixed doctrine, we may, and likely will, misread the facts. But if we start frankly with the fact of his humanity, the obvious, unquestioned fact, our doctrine of his divinity and our attitude toward him as divine is much more likely to be correct than if we approach the fact through the doctrine.

Christ Entered Fully into Human Life.

It was Christ's conscious purpose even as it was God's purpose for him to enter fully into human life. It behooved him in all things to be like unto his brethren. To be the Messiah for mankind, it was necessary for him to experience our human life upon all its levels, and it is precisely this that Jesus did. He passed through all the normal stages of human development. He came into the world by natural birth. He came into possession of his knowledge by the ordinary processes of education. He was a child, subject to the authority and nurture of his parents. He related himself normally to the social institutions of his time, the church, the state, the customs. His normal human life is disclosed in his being a toiler, a worker at the occupation most typical of all work. He entered into the gladness of life; he was not a recluse, a hermit, a mere voice out of the wilderness as was John his fore-runner, but he moved among his fellows with a free mastery of the formalities and conventions of social intercourse. Serious he was, but never morbid. Sympathetic and sensitive, but never melancholy. He was an acceptable and responsive guest at feasts, and with all the earnestness of his temper we cannot think that he was a kill-joy. Little chidren came to him as we cannot think of their running to Socrates or Moses or John the Baptist. He was genial, accessible, hearty, radiant with kindliness, and yet he carried in his heart the burden of his neighbor's grief and sin, with a pain the exquisiteness of which has never been matched. Here we have a man indeed; one living in the broad, common-places of human life. Jesus was not different from men, he was like men. He was not unique, but universal. His uniqueness is his universality. He is the ordinary man of history, the world's supreme commoner.

Death the Great Human Commonplace.

But Christ's identification of himself with humanity is disclosed not only in his life, but in his death as well. Death is the great human commonplace. It is the lowest and broadest level of human experience. It is in death that our differences fade out, and men stand revealed as brothers absolute. It is the one catholic event in human life. The death of Jesus therefore put him into relation with man at the deepest level. This is what St. Paul has in mind when he pictures, in the Philippian letter, the condescension of Jesus. He was the Son of God, equal to the Father, but without any reputation as such he came into our world and took the form of a man; yea, of a servant of men. He humbled himself, submitting to death, even the death of the cross.

So when he came forth on the third day from the sleep of death, he was as if born anew. He is not born a man as at Bethlehem, but the Son of Man. His Easter birth was not of a woman, but from the womb of humanity. The angelic announcement at Bethlehem was that one had been born into the human family. The Easter angel announces that one had been born out of humanity into the glory of God. For faith, therefore, Easter is the real Christmas. Christmas is the beginning of Easter. Easter is the perfecting of Christmas. The manger receives the Son of God; Joseph's new tomb gives up the Son of Man. All the experiences of human life were his, and he becomes the world's Savior by his resurrection.

Dare Faith Come to the Test?

Our hearts wish to be assured of this so wonderful event. Not only does historic Christianity get its first impetus from the faith of the early disciples that Jesus arose from the dead, but our own faith would lose its most supporting prop were belief in his resurrection shaken. How shall we satisfy our hearts? Hugging our belief to our breast with the stubbornness of faith alarmed, shall we refuse to examine the evidence lest its inadequacy and weakness be exposed and our belief destroyed? Or shall we honestly face the evidence? Certainly every one of us wishes to be honest with the facts. Certainly not one of us wishes to carry in our soul a superstition which when the time of need comes will fail us.

And yet if we undertake to examine the resurrection narratives

we are almost dismayed unless we chance to be scholars ourselves and possess great confidence in our own judgment. For we do not find the wise ones in agreement on these narratives. There is great difficulty apparently in piecing them together. Our scholars have a hard time of it in giving legal prestige to the direct evidence. How, then, shall we who can examine the direct evidence in a merely casual way have any firm ground for our belief? And assuming that we are interested deeply enough to thoroughly sift the direct testimony at the end of the Gospels must our faith be held in abeyance until this intellectual procedure is finished?

Must Faith Hang on Logic?

Obviously the faith upon which our soul's eternal interests depend cannot hang on so brittle a thread as a logical process. Logic is so precarious, the intellect is so often mistaken, that not one of us feels like entrusting to its care the precious goods of our soul. Even in a court of law the evidence is of two sorts—direct and presumptive. Direct evidence is microscopic, detailed, specific, limited to those things having immediate connection with the event under investigation. In presumptive evidence the court endeavors to conceive the situation as a whole in order to determine whether the alleged event would likely have occurred. Is the event utterly impossible in the light of the whole situation? Or is it probable? Was the current of things moving in the direction of that event? In short, is the presumption in favor of, or against, the likelihood of the event in question?

Now, it is of prime importance to regard the presumptive evidence in connection with the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. If we simply sit down and read the gospel narratives of the resurrection, we have difficulties and discrepancies in the various accounts and, besides we of today have the scientific prejudice against any such literature whatsoever. We read of other resurrections in other literature, and we do not think of taking them seriously; we do not even give time to weigh the evidence; we simply will not listen to such preposterous testimony as that. The first thought of a modern man if he simply listens to the account that a man died on the cross, and was laid away in the tomb, and the stone was rolled against the door, and was sealed, and a guard put over it, and after thirty-six hours the friends of the dead man came back to the tomb, and found the guard gone, and the seal broken, and the stone rolled away, and the crypt in which the body had been laid, empty, while the burial clothes remained as they were originally placed, his first thought is that somebody has lied, or, if not that, somebody has been deceived.

Resurrection to be Taken in Connection With Christ's Entire Life.

But if one takes into account not just the direct evidence borne by the witnesses, but the life and character and consciousness and work of the man who died and is alleged to have risen, one finds the direct evidence taking on a new color. When we ask, Was there anything remarkable about this man who was buried in this new tomb? and, Was there anything remarkable about the men who now speak this testimony of his resurrection? we are following a clue in our search for the truth, which will lead us into an attitude of mind in which we are, at least, willing to entertain the direct evidence long enough to let it make good if it can. And this is the important point of view to which to lead the modern mind. The time was, when the miracles of Jesus were the proof of Jesus' divinity, and the resurrection of Jesus was the great proof of his Sonship to God. But in our time, to the average mind, the miracle is a dead weight to Christianity all around. Many a man says, "If you simply had Jesus Christ without the miracles, I could be a Christian, but," he says, "I can not believe the miracles," and if you read to him the evidence of the resurrection, you find him impatiently, and somewhat perversely, shrugging his shoulders, as if to say, "Well, I can't answer you, but I don't believe you."

The scientific habit has fixed itself so firmly in the typical mind of today that men firmly deny the reality of miracles, or give them only poetic prestige in their thought. The evidence, therefore, that the modern man must have in order to take miracles at all, is the presumptive evidence. He must think of the miracles in their relation to Jesus, and especially must he think of the Easter miracle in its relation to the central figure of that alleged event. But when you think of the miracles of Christ as his miracles, what is more natural than that, being the man he was, he should be able to perform them. And when you think of the resurrection as not the resurrection of a man only, but the resurrection of the man Jesus Christ, it becomes a probable event, it takes on a credibility which it can not have to our minds when regarded simply as a brute fact for which we have certain direct testimony. Christ is the guarantee of his resurrection. A greater miracle, we feel, would be worked, if he had not risen, than was wrought in his resurrection. His rising from the dead was to prevent a miracle.

Such as He Could Not be Holden of Death.

Living such a life as he lived, possessing his unique consciousness of oneness with God, passing through temptations and pains without one moral lapse; the one flawless flower in the garden of humanity, the one man who lived his life through and felt never an incipient impulse to pray, "God forgive me"; possessing a spiritual consciousness of the highest order, and yet lacking that sense of sin which the holiest saints of the world have felt more keenly than the most brutish sinner, he suffered the bitterest fate that is possible to man, not on account of any harm that he had done, or any fault that could be found in him, but because of his very goodness, because of his unimpeachable holiness. Who can look on such a one as he hangs upon the cross, and cries, "It is finished," and believe that it is indeed finished? Is this all of such a life as that? Are we living in a universe which produces such a being, and then so wantonly destroys it? Our souls revolt at the conception. It is not finished. We will not let our universe suffer the indictment of such a tragedy without giving it a chance to justify itself. The God of the universe is bound to justify himself against such a crime, and the resurrection is the justification. As the apostle said, "it was not possible for him to be holden of death." Faith in the resurrection, therefore, is a demand of our moral nature based upon the moral character of Jesus. What kind of a universe is it that we live in, if such a man as Jesus does not rise from the dead? We do not believe in it just because we have been convinced by an evidence that a jury might consider, but we assert that the moral presumption is that Jesus Christ should rise, and while the scholars are tinkering with the evidence to fit it piece by piece into a whole consistent story, our faith does not tremble, for we feel that, however the details are to be connected one with another, the resurrection itself is a fact inevitable.

"Thrice Blessed Those Who, Not Seeing, Yet Believe."

And this is why Jesus said to Thomas when he appeared before the skeptical disciple, and showed him his hands and his side, and gave to him, and overwhelmed him with, the most conclusive sensuous evidence, until Thomas fell upon his face and cried, "My Lord and my God"—this is why, I say, that Jesus, in blessing Thomas for believing upon the strength of sensuous testimony, thrice blest all those who, having not seen, yet believed. The reason for this abounding blessing upon those whose proof in the resurrection comes through faith, and not sight, is clear in the light of what we have just said. For in the proof that comes through faith is involved the assertion of one's deepest moral nature. It means the justification in the soul of each man of the moral universe in which he lives. The presumptive evidence can weigh only with the man whose moral appreciation sets the right estimate upon Jesus' character and worth. To the man who does not care for the things that Jesus Christ embodied in his character, and illustrated in his walk and work, the presumptive argument is without force. But to the man who sets supreme store by the things of the spirit which Jesus so wondrously embodied and illustrated, paying the price of the cross that he might be true all the way to the highest, the presumptive argument is well-nigh final and sufficient. When Mary comes, excited, with her story, when Peter and John come with their's, such a man does not say, as Thomas said, "I will not believe," but, "I thought it must be so, even so." He is not staggered. He would stagger if the resurrection were not true.

Faith in the Resurrection a Moral Achievement.

Faith in the resurrection of Jesus, therefore, is a moral achievement upon the part of the man who possesses it. It is not simply that he is overwhelmed by evidence, but he simply will not have it otherwise, evidence or no evidence, it must be that such a man as Jesus, even though they nailed him to the cross, yet lives. It is not possible that death could hold him. It is a blessing, therefore, to any soul, thoughtfully to accept the resurrection by faith; because to believe that he rose from the dead implies a moral appreciation of the character and worth of Jesus, that lifts one as nothing else does into spiritual fellowship with him.

You can easily imagine how, after the evidence came to Thomas' senses, and he could not but accept the resurrection fact, he himself was overwhelmed with a sense of shame. "O," he must have said to himself, "how I wish I had been man enough, disciple enough, to have believed when they told me that he had risen." Now, that he sees the Master, and touches him, and hears his voice, the moral value of the victory of faith over his doubt is not his, but instead a certain self-pity that he had not been large enough, and true enough, and had not understood his master well enough to have believed without sensuous testimony. He is convinced, yea, beyond peradventure: but how much better it might have been had he been convinced through faith, and not through sight. How much more keen the glory of that moment when his Master came into his presence, had he been able to say, "O! my Master, I knew that thou wouldst rise, I knew that it was not possible for death to hold thee."

The Historic Fact Rendered Significant by the Moral Fact.

However it may have been with Thomas, it is true for us that the resurrection must be a moral demand before it can be to us a historic fact. The presumption that it could be true, the faith that it must be true, is the highest religious and moral ground on which we may assert that it is true. So to each man of us the resurrection transpires in our own experience before we believe it as an event which took place nineteen hundred years ago. The resurrection belief is a tremendous moral assertion of our souls, as well as the emergence of a historic fact in the past. There is nothing to be gained by weighing testimony in a legal manner, but by weighing moral values in a spiritual manner everything is to be gained. And is not this characteristic of all faith that is at all religious? We so often mistake faith as the belief of testimony of one sort or another, but that is not faith at all. The devils have that kind of faith, and tremble in the possession of it. But faith that is Christian is not simply a belief that the universe is thus and so, but a demand that the universe shall be thus and so. The supreme evidence for God is not the argument of the intellect, but the demand of the soul that needs God, that hungers and thirsts after God, that "panteth like the hart after the water-brooks" for Him. The belief in the immortality of the soul is not a result of testimony borne in overwhelmingly upon the intellect. For the student of the history of thinking the arguments for immortality one after another have failed; and who knows but our arguments in which we trust today, may be discredited tomorrow. But we believe that death does not end all, because we will not have it so. We will not admit that our universe is one that reckons so flippantly, so wantonly, with its precious human cargo. Faith does not concern the intellect primarily, but the will, primarily. "He that willeth to do his will, shall know about the teaching, whether it is of God." It is not possible for death to hold Christ, it is not possible that our's is a Godless universe, it is not possible that the soul dies as a candle is blown out. We simply will not have it so, and that is faith.

Easter Sunday the Holiday of Faith.

Easter Sunday, therefore, is the holiday of faith. It is the day when faith revels in the objects of its confidence. For with Christ's resurrection are bound up all those dear and precious interests of our lives. Therefore, faith in Christ's resurrection is faith in our own immortality, and the immortality of those who are dear to us, and of all mankind. The sense of the incompleteness of our life, and of the life of those who have gone from us, is most poignant indeed. If we could feel that the life that passes out of our world is rounded off, that it had completed itself, that its possibilities were exhausted, we would then not demand from our universe the fact of immortality. But because we see little children taken away, because all those wondrous possibilities of childhood are nipped in the budding, because we see some noble youth suddenly vanish from the very threshold of a career that promises great usefulness and great inspiration to himself and the world, we feel that though our prayers are yet unanswered, and though these souls pass out into the dark, they are in the keeping of a kindly God who graciously nurtures their broken lives into completion.

The Tragedy of Uncompleted Life.

But it is not simply of the young that we have the sense of incompleteness, but of the aged as well. Every Bismarck and Tennyson and Emerson and Gladstone and Leo Thirteenth feels in his own consciousness the immortality of his unused powers. Man is the creature of two worlds. He is adapted to infinity. He is hard to please. This life does not satisfy. Its edges are not gathered up; its meanings are not made clear. There must be something more. We try to conceive the something more; we make pictures of it; we build our city of precious stones, of gold, and light, and rivers, and trees, and flowers, and no night, and no tears, and no death, and no more pain, and we bring our picture to the scientist, and he says, "It can not be," and we bring it to the philosopher, and he says, "There is no proof for it." But we know that it can be, we know that it must be, we know that it is not possible for it to be otherwise.

Perhaps Faith is Creative as Well as Perceptual!

And, O brother mine, suppose that it turns out that the reality of the immortal life for you and for me depends upon our believing in it, depends upon our faith that it is possible, depends upon the demand that we make of our world, that it shall be that kind of a world that does take account of these infinite worths and interests of our spiritual life. Suppose it comes to pass that the man who believes that God is, finds God, and the man who believes that heaven is, finds heaven. Suppose that it turns out that heaven's very existence is a creation of faith, that to see reality depends upon someone's believing in it, then it shall be revealed that faith is no caprice, no matter to be turned flippantly away from, but is the very method itself by which the moral universe is being created and will be created.

Gaining Our Standards of Value in Experience With Christ.

What then is the condition of our having faith in our resurrection? Evidently to set a high enough value on our moral worth, on our character, on our manhood here and now. And how shall we set a high enough value on our moral worth? By setting a true value upon the worth of Jesus Christ's character. And how may we know that we are setting a true value upon Jesus Christ's character? Ah! There is only one way, and that is by having fellowship in his life's experience. If we walk with him in the valley we shall find the victory in the values which spelled victory to him. We can reign with him neither in the constant sense of triumph which he carried in his breast, nor in the glorious revelation of his triumph at the tomb's door, unless we suffer with him. The power of his resurrection is given only to those who have fellowship in his sufferings.

What is it to "Accept Christ"?

Faith ever comes back to practice, for its justification. You cannot stand outside the life of Christ and understand it. You cannot know that he is the Son of God until you accept his human life as your life, his way of thinking about God and brother man as your way of thinking. To accept Christ is not to accept a doctrine that he is the Son of God, but to commit yourself to his way of living. And the knowledge that he is indeed God's Son is the crown and prize of such an acceptance of him. But to accept his way of living as your way of living is to go with him on the path of service, self-denial, temptation. It is to go into the night with him to pray. It is to meet the misunderstanding and the hate of men. It is to keep clear in your soul the difference between the flattery of men and the approval of God. It is to count no cause just that rests upon unjust means for its realization. It is to hold it true that your life is planned by God for you, and that no insolence is so despicable as the moral insolence of setting your plan up against God's plan, your will against His will.

To be in fellowship with him is to listen while he speaks, to learn from him, to take his yoke—not one he gives you, but the one he himself wears, to bend the back to suffering with his word upon your lips—"Thy will be done," to say to your soul: It does matter whether I am happy or successful, but it does matter that I be noble, that I be worth somewhat to God, that I advance his work.

This is to have fellowship in his sufferings, this is to have a cross of one's own, nay, Christ's own cross. This is to gain the power of Christ's resurrection.

Greatness Enough to Appreciate the Greatness of Christ.

Do you believe that a man who walks thus sublimely through time can doubt eternity? Do you believe that, possessing enought greatness in himself to appreciate the sublimity of Jesus, he can believe that Jesus Christ could fail to rise? Such a man would say, No! Impossible! Death cannot hold him! He would not be disconcerted at the worst the scientists might do, or the critics. There would be that in him which, if the Bible closed its record at Calvary, would write out for itself the story of that Easter morning. He would be sure that here, at least, whatever happens to other men, is one man whom death cannot hold.

> Strong Son of God, Immortal Love,
> Whom we, that have not seen thy face,
> By faith, and faith alone, embrace,
> Believing where we cannot prove.

Yea, Christ is risen!

Because Christ must rise.

It is not possible for Him to be holden of death!

OUR CHURCH MEN

By John R. Ewers

"Manly Convictions"

Last week we considered one real man, this week let us look at another, and as it happens, another governor. Last Sunday afternoon ex-Governor Hanly of Indiana, hero of many temperance fights, spoke to 2,000 men in this city. The stale phrase of the conventional evangelist would be literally true in this case for "hundreds were turned away." Hanly is a great man. He is also real. He is as brave as Arnold Von Winkleried. He is a politician crucified for righteousness' sake. He is a Christian gentleman, who reads his Bible out loud in his own home every night he is there. He says he believes in prayer, consecration and sacrifice, for these are the pillars of the church. He paid a glowing tribute to the church. He believes in her majesty and in her ultimate victory. He does not hesitate to speak, however, concerning certain blemishes in the modern church. He said that conviction was lacking. The church does not have as solid convictions as formerly.

Too Many Tin Soldiers

What the modern church needs is to be committed to some great worthy cause for which she is willing to pray, consecrate her sons and daughters and for which she is ready to sacrifice. He said that we had too many tin soldiers in our ranks, too many men appear only on dress parade. He seemed to think that men who had convictions which they valued more than office, money or selfish ease were exceedingly few. But he said that one man with great enough conviction, who was made strong by prayer, and consecrated wholly to his task and who counted sacrifice as nothing, could change a civilization and mold a nation. Such a man could hold back with his own hands a deluge. Oh, I tell you, he believes in the power of convictions.

It was a tonic to hear him. It does one good to meet a hero. It is mighty stimulating to feel the strength of one who has looked calmly into the hideous face, dark with passion, of the most damnable and desperate foe America knows, and who has looked without fear and who has defied without hesitation. I am hopelessly a hero worshipper, and when I see a man like Hanly my soul goes out to him. Oh, how your quibbling theologian, your literary dilletante faces before such a man of deeds and valor. Men worth while have convictions and men with convictions are doing things in the field of social righteousness. We need our students who have brains, for they are our architects, but we need even more skilled master workmen who can build the temple of justice and mercy. The universities with honest, capable and consecrated students must furnish the plans and hold up the ideals, while the rugged, honest and valorous fighters and builders out in the world must see these visions and fight and build.

Enthusiasm Created by a Great Task.

I believe Hanly is right when he says that the church needs today the conviction of a great task. I agree with him that that task just now is the bringing in of a temperance reign. One sweep of the great right arm of the church and the deed would be done, the dragon would be slain. But for want of the conviction the church does not act. We all know that the only way to keep a congregation alive is to have some tremendous work just ahead. Thus the building up of a great Sunday-school, the paying of a debt in a limited time, the raising of money for a Living-Link in the missionary field, the battle for civic righteousness in the community —these and other similar ambitions inspire the local church to heroic activity. "Where there is no vision, the people perish."

Now the church at large needs some stupendous task set before it. It must be some real movement which will challenge people's enthusiasm, and which after all is worth the doing. The cause of temperance is the thing. The saloon is a nuisance and it is disappearing. State after state is swinging into line with either straight prohibition or local option. Behold Mississippi, North Carolina, and Tennessee in 1908! Consider what has been done in Illinois, Indiana and Ohio in the last two years. Prohibition measures are pending in Arkansas, Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, South Carolina and Utah. Local option is before the legislatures of Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, Pennsylvania, Washington, Wisconsin and Wyoming. Fifteen new states hope for prohibition in the very near future. The war is on. We will lose many battles but we will not lose the war. Science is on our side, showing that insanity and crime are caused by intoxicants. We will win. But it will be no child's play. It will require strong men and some will have to die for the cause and more will have to sacrifice place and money in the war. Yes, we will win, but it will not come because it just happens, we will have to bring it to pass. Now what shall be the attitude of the church? I believe the church will rise to the occasion. There will be no dodging nor running away. The church will save herself in saving the nation. The fight will put iron into our blood and will be the big thing that will save us.

Faith in a Live God.

We need, as men, other convictions, which are perhaps, primary. We need to believe mightily in a live God. Be still and know that God is God. We need to believe in the Saviourhood of Jesus. Let the theologians define divinity for us. Enough for us that he does save us and guide us. The most precious name in this universe is SAVIOUR. We need to have a conviction of the power and conquering capacity of the Christian church. God is for us, who can be against us? No human male can call himself a man unless he has certain convictions that he will live for and if the occasion arises will gladly die for. Remember the words of Canon Doyle, "Have the heart of a lion, and a soul of fire."

Gipsy Smith in Denver

By B. B. Tyler

The man who is known, throughout Christendom, as Gipsy Smith was born almost forty-nine years ago, in a tent, near Cambridge, England. His father's name is Camelius. His own name is Rodney. He "found" Christ, at a "penitent form," in a Wesleyan church, when he was a big boy. After he was seventeen years old he learned to read. Six weeks is the time "The Gipsy" has spent in school. He is not a graduate of old Cambridge! His family is now Christian. A number of members of the household became preachers. Rodney, however, is the most distinguished. When Rodney was a boy his gipsy father made clothes-pins for convenient cash. Rodney peddled them. He possessed a sweet voice and sang for the people whom he visited in the prosecution of his business. After he "found" Jesus he recited the story of his conversion to as many as would listen to his narrative.

Learned to Sing Religion.

He learned to sing two or three religious hymns. He sang religion as well as talked it, while he peddled clothes-pins. Rodney joined the Salvation Army. In this position he became popular with the people. His admirers and friends presented him a gold watch as a token of their appreciation. For accepting this present he was peremptorily dismissed from the "Army." The people with whom, and for whom, he had wrought were indignant; they raised a snug sum of money, employed "the Gipsy," and hired a hall. "The Gipsy" remained in the place a year or two. Thus the untutored boy, step by step, little by little, became, what is called, "an evangelist." From the beginning Rodney was popular.

Great Throngs in Denver.

A week ago today, Tuesday, March 30, Mr. Smith left Denver, after a sojourn of two weeks, during which time he preached to large audiences. The audiences in the afternoon numbered from three to six thousand. In the evening he addressed, probably, ten thousand. The management of the campaign was superb; the preparations for the coming of "The Gipsy" were perfect. Everything was done, in advance, that can be done to awaken an interest and secure a hearing. An audience of ten thousand persons, curious and sympathetic, greeted him on his first appearance in the auditorium. While "The Gipsy" was in Denver, special trains carried multitudes from the neighboring towns to Denver. The word "Gipsy," now used as the front part of Rodney Smith's name, is an important asset. It is a word to conjure with. Hundreds, yes, thousands, went to the auditorium to see and hear "The Gipsy," who would not have gone to see and hear Rodney Smith. The average person had never seen a "gipsy." This was the one opportunity, probably, in a life-time. Tens of thousands went to the meetings out of idle curiosity; the preacher was referred to and spoken of as if he were a freak.

The Multitude Divided in Judgment.

There is nothing specially attractive about this man, personally. To some, his appearance, and conduct, were repulsive. To uncounted thousands he was at once the saintliest saint, the most heroic hero, and the greatest preacher, that ever was. The multitudes in Denver were divided in their estimate of Gipsy Smith. While he was with us he was the most talked about man in town.

His sermons, from an intellectual point of view, were weak talks. From a biblical point of view they were ditto. Gipsy Smith may understand the Bible; but, if so, he successfully concealed his knowledge while in Denver. A gentleman who was faithful in his attendance, and in service, one of "the workers" in the "Inquiry Room," said, in my presence, the other day: "The Gipsy did not preach a sermon in Denver. His addresses would have been commonplace talks even in a mid-week meeting." "The "Gipsy" did not preach, because he cannot. He is incapable of serious thought. For this he is not to blame. He is to be commended. He renders the best service of which he is capable. Of how many can this be said.

The Religious Results Not Great.

The religious results of "The Gipsy's" visit to Denver, so far as I have been able to discover, are almost nil. I had a talk yesterday with a pastor who was in fine spirits because he had received four persons as a result of the auditorium meetings.

As I meet my brothers in the pastorate I say, "What did you get out of the Gipsy Smith meetings?" The answer usually is, "Nothing."

It was my purpose, before the coming of "The Gipsy," to follow the auditorium campaign with an evangelistic effort, the South Broadway Church assuming that the special interest in things spiritual would warrant such an effort. Passion Week will be appropriately observed—nothing more.

Dollar Mark Made Prominent.

The dollar mark was all over "The Gipsy," and his effort, in Denver. Special appeals for money were made in every meeting. One of the pastors was put forward to present the financial feature of the campaign. Again and again "The Gipsy," not satisfied with the presentation, pleaded personally and pathetically for more dollars. Half the money collected was sent to what in this country we call a syndicate, in London. I am reliably informed that the snug sum of $6,000 was sent to the Committee of the Free Church Council in London; this committee pays "The Gipsy." The remaining $6,000 was used in Denver to pay for the auditorium and advertising expenses. The last evening "The Gipsy" was with us six thousand persons assembled to hear him lecture. Each person paid twenty-five cents to hear him. Admission was by ticket. "The Gipsy" made an appeal and took a collection! I am informed by a gentleman who was in a position to know whereof he affirms that this offering amounted to $500. This was not divided!

"The Truth About the 'National Free Church Council.'"

The Christian Commonwealth, London, of March 10, 1909, contains, on the first page, an article under the caption, "The Truth About the National Free Church Council," in which there is a strong intimation that "The Gipsy" is in America for "shekels" rather than for souls! The following is from the Commonwealth article: "There is a very large income from the results of evangelistic missions. It is far from satisfactory that such a large proportion of its income" (the income of the Free Church Council) "should be derived from evangelistic services. Complaints are made that some of the smaller places cannot secure the services of the most popular missioners" (as Gipsy Smith) "who are engaged in the big centers or sent abroad on extended evangelistic tours. It is very questionable policy to send such men across the Atlantic. If we feel that evangelistic zeal were the dominating motive it might be different, but there is the disquieting fact that these missions pay. The intimate connection between revivalism and finance is one that is bound to be faced sooner or later, for comment upon the subject is continually being made in private. Some connection there must be, but it would be well if all such profits were definitely ear-marked for purely religious work among the struggling churches."

"The Servant in the House"

By Edgar DeWitte Jones

"He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now. He that loveth his brother, abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him. But he that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness and knows not whither he goeth, because the darkness has blinded his eyes. . . . . If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar, for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" I. John 2:9-11 4:20.

This is the passage of Scripture upon which Mr. Charles Rann Kennedy rests his drama of "The Servant in the House." In every program of the play this scripture appears and it is also on the fly leaf of the book of the same title.

The Spell of Jesus.

Verily the spell of Jesus is everywhere to be found. The best poetry; the noblest orations, the most worth-while fiction are permeated with the Christ spirit. The masterpieces of painting and sculpture bear witness to the power and charm of the great Galilean. And now the stage has come under the same spell and lo, one of the popular successes of the hour breathes from first to last the gentle spirit and radiates that all pervading brotherliness of Jesus of Nazareth. In brief, the story of the play is as follows:

The scene is the house of a vicar of the Church of England. His family consists of his wife and their niece, Mary. There are trouble and distress in this house.

In the first place the vicar has an outcast brother whom he has treated shabbily. This brother, Robert by name, is Mary's father, the little girl whom the vicar and his wife love as their very own. Mary has not been told of her father. She does not know what manner of man he is, nor does she know of a certainty that he is alive. Word has been received that Robert is coming back and the information brings consternation to the vicar and his wife. Nor is this all. There is something wrong with the drain under the church. The sanitary condition is frightful and something must be done at once. The vicar's wife's uncle is the Bishop of Lancashire. He is thoroughly unscrupulous and a rascal, but he is rich and as a last resort they have appealed to him for help though the vicar loathes him and turns to him now much against his own better nature. There is also a mysterious Bishop of Benares of whose great work in India they had heard much. He, too, may help them and his arrival is hourly expected. This is the state of affairs when Manson, the new butler from India, arrives and assumes his duties. Manson is really the Bishop of Benares and he is also the long lost brother of the vicar, Joshua by name, from whom had come no tidings for years.

The Christman as the Servant.

Manson is the Christman. He is full of the spirit of Jesus. Indeed the fashion of his garments and his general appearance is strikingly like the conventional portraits of our Saviour. Manson sees at once the situation, and in a quiet, yet masterful manner he begins to set that troubled house in order.

It is Manson who receives Robert the prodigal, and by his kindly fraternal spirit awakens a new and better impulse within him; it is Manson who helps to discomfit and unmask and dismiss the hypocritical Bishop; it is Manson who aids the vicar to be a truer priest of God; it is Manson who melts the stubborn will of the vicar's wife; it is Manson who comforts and encourages Mary, and at last, it is Manson who rights the entire family and brings peace and joy.

As the curtain descends. Manson has just disclosed his identity as Joshua their long lost brother, now Bishop of Benares. Mary has thrown herself into her father's arms. The vicar gives his hand to Robert; his proud wife, now humbled, extends her hand to the prodigal also; the vicar clasps Manson's hand.

The Home Harmonized by the Christ Spirit.

Thus they all form a kind of cross, while the vicar sinks to his knees sobbing as one broken yet healed. The servant who had permitted the spirit of Christ to lead him, has turned discord into harmony and made that house a fit habitation for disciples of his Lord.

There are a few features of this beautiful drama that I wish to note more particularly.

First, The masterfulness of Manson. From the first, one feels the power and equipoise of Manson's personality. He is calm, resourceful, and always gentle. He is never anxious, hurried, or in danger of stampede. There is a great lesson just here. Violent outbreaks of temper, volcanic wrath, envy, malice,—how ill do such things become the Christian life. If we are to be masters of others and of circumstances, we must first master ourselves. Self-mastery is the beginning of a life of overcoming and conquest. Manson is able to conquer this household because he first conquered himself.

The Lesson of Brotherhood.

Second, The lesson of brotherhood. Manson is a most gracious exponent of that fundamental teaching of Christ, "not to be ministered unto, but to minister." He makes poor, outcast Robert feel that warm brotherly love that makes the whole world kin. Soon they are addressing each other as "comrade." Manson does not rebuke Robert in so many words, but he makes him ashamed of his wickedness and puts into him a holy impulse to live differently. Men are hungering for brotherhood, hungering for the great brotherly teaching of Christ to find expression in the lives of His followers. Anything in the church that approaches the caste spirit or a cold forbidding formality is as different from the teaching and practice of Jesus Christ as are the bleak, bitter, cold days of January with snow and ice, different from the rare days of early June and ripe red cherries.

Possibilities in Christ's Leadership.

Third, The Servant in the House shows the possibility that lies within the reach of everybody who will follow the leadership of Christ. One man who is full of the spirit of Christ can influence a whole office, or a store, or a shop, for good. One really Christlike person can revolutionize a home. The idea of principle emphasized by Manson is a cardinal principle of Christianity. Christ emphasized it over and over again. It is Christian living; "by their fruits ye shall know them." It is an exemplification of such texts as "ye are the salt of the earth" "ye are the light of the world."

The Church and the Theater.

In these days of so many demoralizing plays, of so many "problem" dramas that are full of subtle and vicious suggestion, it is refreshing to find such an exception as "The Servant in the House." The problem of amusements is a very vital one and the church cannot solve it by putting the ban on the theater as a whole and thus leave it to pander to a constituency that love the low, the suggestive and the vicious. Because some works of fiction are bad, we do not denounce all fiction. We discriminate. The commendation of the good wherever we see it becomes our duty as well as the condemnation of the bad.

The very next night after this wholesome drama was presented in our city, there came to the same house an "attraction" with one feature that was too brazen even for Kansas City and St. Louis to stand. Yet Bloomington stood for it. Managers furnish the people what they want; what they will pay to see. Undoubtedly, there would be far less of the objectionable on the stage if people were taught to discriminate and avoid some plays as they would a pestilence. The amusement question is here to stay. The many questionable plays that are being produced these days, together with the multiplicity of the five and ten cent theater where thousands flock to see moving pictures, all furnishes food for sober reflection.

Alternative Attitudes for the Church.

The church can take one of two attitudes toward this question.

First, The church can denounce the theater as a whole, profess to see nothing of the good in the institution and advise its members to keep away. This has been and is the position of many sincere Christian workers.

Second, The church can point out the perils of the playhouse, and cry boldly out against certain tendencies; at the same time, frankly conceding the possibilities of the theater for good. Without entering into the matter of whether or not a Christian should frequent the theater (which is a responsibility resting upon each one personally) the church can teach discrimination. This is the position of an increasing number of Christian workers, also sincere and filled with an earnest desire to help humanity.

Theater May be Employed for Religious Ends.

For my own part I do not believe we should permit an institution that was originally employed to enforce religious lessons to be monopolized by the forces that make for frivolity and folly.

I am glad for the opportunity to pay a tribute to "The Servant in the House," as a beautiful and helpful production. One that has positive and definite religious values. And I hope and pray that the day will some time dawn when every art shall be Christianized entirely and made to minister both to the intellectual and spiritual growth of humanity; when the low, the immoral, and the vicious shall give place to the noble, the moral and the good, when generations yet to be shall be able to acclaim:

"Blow trumpet, for the world is white with May Blow trumpet, for the long night has rolled away,
Blow through the living world; let the king reign."

CENTENNIAL STUDIES

By Dr. Errett Gates

[Pursuant to our note of last week Dr. Gates has this week changed the heading of his page from the DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION to CENTENNIAL STUDIES. His purpose is to write a series on the general topic: "The Success of Our Movement." Following his article this week on "Numbers," he will write on "Achievements" and "Influence," all as Evidences of Success. Then he will examine into Causes and Conditions of our Success, treating of the "Timeliness of Our Plea" and its "Rationalism." These to be followed by studies of "Evangelism" and our "Leadership." The splendid historical equipment Dr. Gates brings to this task warrants us in predicting that his great popularity with our readers will be appreciably enhanced by this centennial contribution.—EDITORS.]

Success of Our Movement

The Disciples have come to the close of the first hundred years of their history with an unmistakable feeling of success in their hearts. Whatever feelings of disappointment concerning their achievements may lurk in their hearts, they are for the time being swallowed up in the tide of universal gratitude for what they have accomplished. The record of a hundred years is one, on the whole, to be proud of. But it is also a record to be grateful for; for it is the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes.

God has used this people both in open and mysterious ways. We can understand why he gave us great and good men to be our leaders; why he inclined men's hearts to hear our message of peace and good-will among the children of God; and why he has given us an almost innumerable company of witnesses. But we can not understand why he withheld peace and unity from our own ranks at times, and why many Christ-like enterprises among us have gone begging for worthy support.

Our Thorn in the Flesh.

Perhaps this was our "thorn in the flesh," to keep us humble, that we should not be exalted overmuch. The Disciples are human beings just like other children of God, and were made subject to vanity. It is good for neither human beings nor religious bodies to think more highly of themselves than they ought to think; and our failures and shortcomings were given us to temper our Centennial celebration with sobriety.

While we think of the victories of the plea in Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, we should also think of its failure in Maine and New Hampshire, in Michigan and Wisconsin. While we think of Campbell and Stone, of Pendelton and Errett, we should also think of Franklin and Rowe, Sommers and Lipscomb. While we think of the Christian Baptist and Millennial Harbinger, the Christian Standard and Christian Evangelist, let us also think of the American Christian Review and the Octographic Review, of the Gospel Advocate and the Firm Foundation. While we think of Butler College and Drake University, we should also think of Abingdon College and Garfield University. There is enough in all this reflection to keep us humble. We must still lean upon God: not by might nor by power but by my Spirit, saith the Lord.

Success, but not Complete Attainment.

While the Disciples have succeeded, they have not already attained, neither are they made perfect. The goal stretches far away. They have surpassed others in some things, but they have been surpassed by others in other things. They have taught the religious world some truths, but there are many truths they have learned from the religious world. The law of progressive development and improvement holds good of the Disciples as of the Kingdom of God. First the blade, then the ear, and then full corn in the ear. This is just as true of the truth they teach as of the lives they live, for truth comes through life and experience. The Spirit of God can lead no further into truth than we are prepared to go, and no faster than we are able to follow. Only as we do his will shall we know the truth, either as individuals or as religious bodies. The whole truth of the Great Commission was not known by the Disciples until they began to do missionary work in foreign parts; and now to go into all the world is as binding as to be baptized. It was not always so: truth waited upon life—the full sense of duty upon more perfect deeds.

But the Disciples have not failed; they have succeeded, as success is estimated among religious movements. In this series of studies I desire to inquire into the conditions and the causes of the success that has attended the movement undertaken by the Campbells.

Numbers.

The first, most manifest, evidence of success in a religious movement, is usually sought in the number of followers it can count. If it does not gain adherents it is not regarded as successful. Judged by this test the world has pronounced the Disciples a successful religious movement.

The argument of success from numbers is always an argument from comparison—it is always relative, never absolute. It is in comparison with other religious bodies that the growth of the Disciples argues success. During the 108 years, from 1800 to 1908, the Episcopalians grew from 11,000 to 893,972; the Presbyterians from 40,000 to 1,831,854; the Methodists from 64,000 to 6,838,779; the Congregationalists from 75,000 to 708,913; the Baptists from 100,000 to 5,413,945; while the Disciples grew in 100 years (1809 to 1909), from nothing to 1,295,423. It will thus be seen that the Disciples outgrew the Episcopalians and Congregationalists, but were outgrown by Baptists and Methodists.

Failure in Success.

While the increase of the Disciples has been notable, there must be something disappointing in it to those who build success purely on numbers, and have estimated the progress of the kingdom of God by the number of persons who have taken membership in the ranks of Disciples. Covering the whole period of the hundred years of existence there are other bodies that have made larger gains than the Disciples. There was a period between 1890 and 1900 when the percentage of increase was greater for the Disciples than any other body; but they have lost that lead in growth during the last ten years. There is now little encouragement to a few zealous prophets who predicted an approaching conquest of the Christian world by the Disciples a decade ago.

In the light of this growth of a hundred years, in comparison with the growth of other bodies, there seems little encouragement for the visionary dream that the Disciples as a separate body of Christians will outstrip and overshadow all others in sheer size, pale their progress, and finally absorb their remaining fragments. It never was the ideal of the leaders, nor their wish, to carry on their work in separation from other Christians, but in union with them.

Success by Absorption Not in Leaders' Plan.

The vision of organic size and the wish for corporate monopoly of the world is a betrayal of the fundamental position of the Disciples—a perversion of the spirit and principles of the Declaration and Address, of the Christian Baptist and the Millennial Harbinger. The ideal of the movement as held by its great men was never that of success by absorption of the Christian world, but progress by permeation. Separation from other Christians was enforced upon them, not chosen by them, and organization apart from other followers of Christ was not an ultimate end but a temporary means.

Yes, the Disciples have succeeded, they have carried their principles to victory apart from other Christians; but in that they also failed. Christian union, which was their aim and justification for being, failed when they went apart. If the Campbells had been free to choose, they would have chosen increase of numbers in union with the Baptists. They went apart that they might have testimony against separation among Christians; they went out of fellowship that they might prepare the way for return to fellowship, not only with Baptists, but with every body of believers in Christ. In separation they have grown strong. Has this growth been an unmixed good?

Responsibility of Numbers.

The success of the Disciples has laid upon them a peculiar responsibility. It has also set a new problem. They cannot treat their bigness of size as other bodies might do. They can not say to themselves, This one thing we will do: we will organize congregations, build churches, found and endow colleges, and train preachers, that we may organize more congregations, build more churches, found and endow more colleges, and train more preachers, that we may organize still more congregations,—and so on in a never-ending circle of beneficent activity. At some point in this circle the Disciples are bound to stop and say, if they are true to their original purpose and mission, and to their highest light, What is the relationship of these churches to other churches in the community professing to be Christian, and what shall be the policy and attitude of our ministers toward them? We can go on organizing, building and increasing in utter oblivion of the presence of Methodist, Presbyterian or Congregational churches, or we can work with conscious reference to them. Which attitude is binding upon us in view of our testimony to the sinfulness of a divided church, and the obligation of Christian unity?

Problem of Numbers.

And the problem set by our increasing numbers is the problem whether Christian union has been made harder or easier thereby. Are the Disciples more or less fraternal with other Christians, more or less inclined to seek closer fellowship, more or less desirous of ending a separate existence? Is it as easy to persuade a million people to adopt a basis of fellowship with other Christians as a hundred people? Will it be as easy several decades hence when the Disciples have doubled the number of members and colleges and newspapers and missionaries and mission stations, to terminate their separation from other Christians as now?

It will all depend on whether we have grown as much in grace as we have in size. Growth in size is good, if there goes with it growth in Christian love and humility. This is even more true of the Disciples than of any other people. To be as large as our principles, we must not be larger than any other people; to be as fraternal, as unselfish, as self-forgetful, we must be more so than others. What do ye more than others to heal the wounds in the body of Christ? is the reproachful question which the religious world should never have cause for putting at the Disciples.

It is not enough, therefore, for the Disciples to estimate success by numbers. Growth in numbers may mean growth in contentment with and passion for numbers, and for what numbers bring—respectability, self-sufficiency and independence of other servants of Christ. In numbers there is power, but there is also peril.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

Can we know the truth or do we take the product of the best intellectual development and call it the truth?

Does God speak to us or do we take that which we think to be the best as God speaking to us?

Lincoln, Kansas. R. L.

Truth is not a fixed quantity. The truth of one generation is modified and amplified by that of the next. Similarly, the truth held by each individual differs from that of all others, just as personality differs. Each individual accepts as his standard of truth that which to him makes the strongest appeal to his intellect and conscience. While this can never be a fixed standard in all of its details, it is sufficiently authoritative to control life and character.

The Christian faith affirms the fact that God has spoken to us in the lives and utterances of prophets and wise men of the past, in the teachings and characters of the apostles of our Lord, and most fully in the life and words of Jesus himself. It is the acceptance of these teachings, properly interpreted by comparison one with another and by final reference to the words, character and purposes of Jesus, which constitutes the authoritative norm for belief and conduct for Christian men and women. The words of the prophets were their interpretation of God's will made known to them in their study of his character and their experience of his presence. These prophetic utterances were not always consistent with each other nor satisfactory in the light of later and fuller disclosures. But they pointed in the direction of the full manifestation of God's life and purpose in the character and teachings of our Lord. He becomes the standard by which the utterances of prophets and apostles are to be measured. Higher than his authority as a revealer of God it is impossible for us to go.

What significance do you attach to Jesus' words and actions when he went up to Jerusalem in his twelfth year? Do they have bearing on the growth of his consciousness that he was the Son of God? Inquirer.

Jesus' response to his mother, "Did you not know that I ought to be about my father's business" or, more accurately, "that I ought to be in the things of my father?" does not necessarily imply that Jesus had at this period anything like the full development of Messianic consciousness. It only indicates his wonder that she should have been surprised to find him in the temple, interested in that which should have been the first concern of every normal and right-minded young Jew. Jesus had used the first opportunity of his life to visit the great school where Jewish youths were trained for the work of teaching and preaching. This seemed to him a most natural desire. His mother, however, expected to find him in some of the places where the crowd gathered for the festal celebration of the Passover. At the least the words of Jesus implied his unusual interest in the teachings of the Old Testament and in sacred things. At the most they might include the beginnings of his perception of Messianic responsibility which culminated at the time of his baptism and temptation.

Please explain Matthew 5:48: "Be-ye therefore perfect even as your Father which is in Heaven is perfect." If it is impossible to attain to perfection in this life, as many Christians assert, then why did Jesus give such a command? F. B. P.

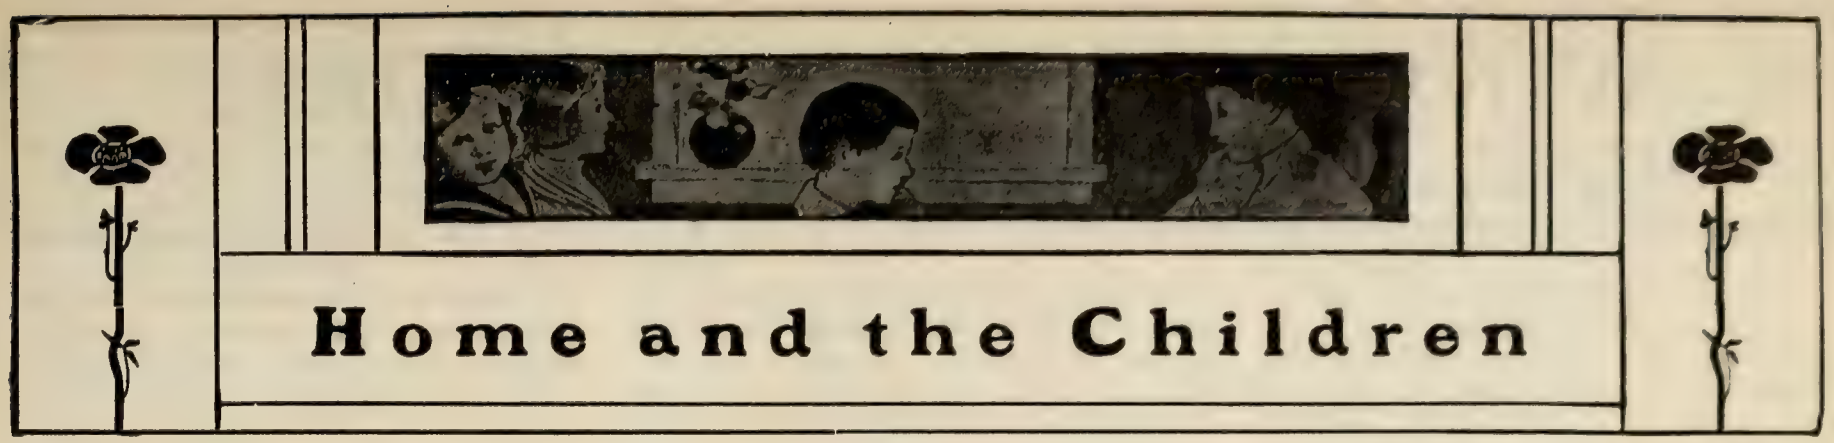
Perfection in the absolute sense Jesus could not have associated with the present human life. But his purpose was to lift before his disciples the ideal which could be attained by growth into likeness to himself as the Son of God. This growth has ample time for the realization of the ideal. Time is ours and eternity also. Jesus meant to insist upon the possibility and duty of every follower of his to attain the fullest measures of the divine life. This cannot come at once. The law of spiritual evolution was defined by him in his words "First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear."

Do you regard the office of the seven appointed in Acts (Chapter 6) as identical with the office of deacon as mentioned later in the New Testament church? Are the duties they there performed identical with the service existing in the church today?

Des Moines, Ia. Reader.

The word "deacon" in the New Testament means "helper" or "assistant." It is not certain that, as it was first used in the New Testament time, it described an office at all. It seems rather to have been used as implying that some men were set apart for duties connected with the temporal welfare of the church, such as caring for the poor. It is easy to see how these helpers became in later times a recognized body with the name "deacon" designating the office to which they were regularly chosen. It will be remembered that some of the seven were among the most notable preachers of the early church. They were set apart at a time when the Christian community needed a somewhat different order of activity from that to which the apostles could devote their time. Later on the office was recognized as one of value to the welfare of the church. Such duties as they performed at that time might well fall to the deacons of a modern church, who are also helpers or assistants, having more particularly charge of the temporal and business life of the congregation.

What did Jesus mean when he said to the disciples "Into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not"? (Matthew 10:5.) M. B.



Cleveland.

The Jews and Samaritans in Jesus' day were hostile to each other through circumstances traceable as far back as the downfall of the kingdom of the ten tribes. Jesus did not share this feeling of enmity, as is shown by his kindly treatment of the Samaritans on more than one occasion, but he knew that if the disciples went into that region, there would be danger of quarrels breaking out between them and those to whom they came. He did not as yet dare to trust the disciples in this hostile atmosphere. He felt that their journeys would be more fruitful and their own training more rapid in a less unfriendly region. Christianity was, however, preached to the Samaritans very soon after Pentecost, as we know from the events of Acts, (Chapter 8.)

Please name some of the best helps to a study of the Book of Hebrews.

Homesville, O. W. E. H.

The recently published volume by Edgar J. Goodspeed, in the series known as "The Bible for Home and School," is perhaps the best short commentary on Hebrews (Macmillan, 50 cents net). Professor Bruce's "The Epistle to the Hebrews" (Clark, $1.50 net) is perhaps the best longer treatment. The sections on Hebrews in Bacon's "Introduction to the New Testament" (Macmillan, 75 cents net), McGiffert's "The Apostolic Age" (Scribner's, $2.25 net), Farrar's "Early Days of Christianity," and the articles on Hebrews in Hastings' Bible Dictionary, and the Encyclopedia Biblica will be found of great value.

Home and the Children

The Rich Little Kitty

I'm a rich little kitty
I live at my ease,
I eat when Im hungry,
I sleep when I please,
Sometimes on the sofa,
Sometimes on the bed,
Right on the soft pillows
If nothing is said.
My mistress she loves me,
She says I'm so sweet,
Such a dear little dumpling,
I'm most fit to eat.
She hugs and kisses
Me right on my nose,
She says that my mouth
Is as pink as a rose.
She says that I'm pretty
With bright shining eyes
That sparkle at night
Like the stars in the skies.
She says that my paws
Are as soft as fine silk
And my breast is as white
As the purest of milk.
She says that I sing
Just as sweet as a bird,
That my songs are the sweetest
That ever were heard.
I love my dear mistress
So loving and kind
And I know I could never
A better home find.
For I'm a rich little kitty
I live at my ease
I go where I want to,
And I do as I please.

Aunt Ruth's Stories About Crabs

FAY STUART.

"Oh come, Lois, and see this funny thing on Aunt Ruth's table! I wonder what it can be," and with careful fingers Paul picked up what looked like a big shell.

"I'm sure I don't know, but Auntie would tell us all about it. Go and find her, Paul," said Lois, eagerly.

They were soon gathered around the cosy wood-fire which sent little dancing shadows over the dusky room as it snapped and crackled merrily away. Lois sat upon a hassock beside Aunt Ruth's chair, while Paul perched in true boy-fashion upon the head of the couch still holding the curious object in his hand.

"What does it look like, children?" asked Aunt Ruth, smiling into their interested faces.

"A big shell, I should say," cried Paul.

"It would look something like a horseshoe if it wasn't for that long, sharp tail," said Lois.

"That is it, exactly," replied Aunt Ruth. It is a horseshoe crab that I found upon the beach at Brant Rock last summer. You wanted me to tell you about it?"

"Yes, yes!" they cried in a chorus.

"Well, once upon a time, this odd-looking brown shell was a house in which lived a crab. He had plenty of room, for he was small and only filled about one-third of his shell. He was a quiet creature, easily frightened and never ventured far out to sea, but stayed safely at home burrowing in the sands to find his insect food. He is also called the King Crab."

"Ha! ha!" laughed Paul, "what a comical house and he had to carry it around on his back just like a turtle."

"Yes," said Aunt Ruth, "but I can tell you something stranger still. There is another little crab who has no house of his own. He would make a dainty breakfast for the fishes if he remained so defenseless, so he starts in search of a home. There are always empty periwinkle shells lying upon the beach. Mr. Crab selects one, crawls into it and walks off. Soon, however, he finds his house has become too small. Then he goes house-hunting again.

"Sometimes two crabs decide upon the same shell and then there is a bitter fight. It continues until one gets his claw broken and cannot defend himself. Even that is often not the end, but the victor will actually eat the poor fellow up. Then the house is his."

"The horrid creature!" cried Lois.

"Isn't he?" agreed Aunt Ruth. "I don't like quarrels, whether they are between crabs or little folk. This hermit crab has many enemies and is not safe even in his carefully selected shell, for if he sticks his head out to see the sights he is apt to be gobbled up by some watchful frog fish."

"What kind of a fish is that?" asked Paul, "I never heard of a frog fish."

"We are talking about crabs tonight, my boy. Some other time I will tell you what I know about fish."

"Tomorrow night, Aunt Ruth?"

"Perhaps, if a certain little boy gets his spelling paper correct," and with a merry laugh Aunt Ruth continued:

"There is another variety called the Robber Crab. He is not like the Horseshoe, but is very bold, I think he is the largest sort of crab, sometimes nearly three feet long. He digs a hole in the sand near some rock or tree and usually stays there until dark, when he creeps out like any other robber."

"What does he steal?" asked Lois, leaning forward in the firelight, her eyes big with wonder. "Cocoanuts, Lois, of which, like yourself, he is very fond." "Now Aunt Ruth, you are surely joking," protested Paul, "for what good would they do him? or does he keep a number in his cave?" "No, but trust him to get at the sweetmeat. It is said, upon good authority, that he drags the nut in his claw until he finds a large rock against which he can dash it until it breaks open. You must remember his size and the strength of that huge claw."

"I am glad he don't live around here," said Lois.

"Aren't there more kinds of crabs?" asked Paul, eager for more stories.

"Oh, yes; many more. Over in Japan they have the spider and porcupine crabs, named for the animals they resemble. In the West Indies there is the black crab, which lives several miles from the ocean. The people consider it an elegant dish, but it is rare, for they can be caught only at certain seasons. They burrow up in the summer just as woodchucks do in winter."

"Eat crabs!" exclaimed Lois in a disgusted tone, "they must be heathen!"

"Why, my dear child," laughed Aunt Ruth, "we have edible crabs in America. Some people right here in Boston think they are better than oysters. They are found in quantities along our coast."

"Well some people have queer taste," said Paul decidedly, "I'd rather have oyster stew, baked beans or roast beef."

"Supper is ready, children," called mother. "Why are you sitting in the dark?"

"Aunt Ruth has been telling us a firelight story," explained Lois. "I didn't know before that crabs are so wonderful."

"This is a wonderful world, little girl, and God has filled it with wonderful, mysterious things," said Aunt Ruth, reverently. "We ought to learn more about his strange, beautiful creations.—The Advance.

What Women Are Doing

—A wreath placed on the grave of Nancy Hanks Lincoln at Lincoln City, Ind., last month was paid for by one cent contributions from 2,500 school children of Indianapolis.

—Miss Helen Gould recently entertained three hundred bluejackets from the battleships of the North Atlantic squadron now at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, after their round-the-world cruise, at a reception and tea held at the naval branch of the Y. M. C. A.

—Queen Helena of Italy is a generous shopper, and quick to decide always on gaily colored things. Her mother-in-law, Queen Margherita, is also expansive in dress ideas, and is apt to change her mind very often as to the style and cut of her clothes.

—Mme. Guadalupe De Haro, a Mexican, and a descendant of the Montezumas, is in New York studying domestic science as practiced in the United States. She will carry it back with her to Mexico, and at the bidding of her government introduce it in that country.

—Miss H. I. McGann of New York was honored by Congress with a medal for distinguished heroism on March 13. At the time of the General Slocum steamboat disaster Miss McGann, who was convalescing from an illness, left her bed, and wading into the river, saved the lives of nine children at imminent risk.

—A curious effect of the exodus of nuns and convents from France owing to the new law regarding religious associations is that false hair has gone up tremendously in price. One of the foremost wig makers in Paris says that an incredible quantity of hair used to be supplied regularly to the trade by religious establishments, and their departure has created a dearth and consequently enhanced prices in the home market.

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER X.

An Armistice.

The dismal afternoon was drawing in when Winston, driving home from the railroad, came in sight of a lonely farm. It lifted itself out of the prairie, a blur of huddled buildings on the crest of a long rise, but at first sight Winston scarcely noticed it. He was gazing abstractedly down the sinuous smear of trail which unrolled itself like an endless ribbon across the great white desolation, and his brain was busy. Four months had passed since he came to Silverdale, and they had left their mark on him.

At first there had been the constant fear of detection, and when that had lessened and he was accepted as Lance Courthorne, the latter's unfortunate record had met him at every turn. It accounted for the suspicions of Colonel Barrington, the reserve of his niece, and the aloofness of some of his neighbors, while there had been times when Winston found Silverdale almost unendurable. He was, however, an obstinate man, and there was on the opposite side the gracious kindliness of the little gray-haired lady, who had from the beginning been his champion, and the friendship of Dane, and one or two of the older men. Winston had also proved his right to be listened to, and treated, outwardly at least, with due civility, while something in his resolute quietness rendered an impertinence impossible. He knew by this time that he could hold his own in Silverdale, and based his conduct on the fact, but that was only one aspect of the question, and he speculated as to the consummation.

It was, however, evident that in the meanwhile he must continue to pose as Courthorne, and he felt, rightly or wrongly, that the possession of his estate was, after all, a small reparation for the injury the outlaw had done him, but the affair was complicated by the fact that, in taking Courthorne's inheritance, he had deprived Miss Barrington of part of hers. The girl's coldness stung him, but her unquestionable beauty and strength of character had not been without their effect, and the man winced as he remembered that she had no pity for anything false or mean. He had decided only upon two things, first that he would vindicate himself in her eyes, and, since nobody else could apparently do it, pull the property that should have been hers out of the ruin it had been drifting into under her uncle's guardianship. When this had been done, and the killing of Trooper Shannon forgotten, it would be time for him to slip back into the obscurity he came from.

Then the fact that the homestead was growing nearer forced itself upon his perceptions, and he glanced doubtfully across the prairie as he approached the forking of the trail. A gray dimness was creeping across the wilderness and the smoky sky seemed to hang lower above the dully gleaming snow, while the moaning wind flung little clouds of icy dust about him. It was evident that the snow was not far away, and it was still two leagues to Silverdale, but Winston, who had been to Winnipeg, had business with the farmer, and had faced a prairie storm before. Accordingly he swung the team into the forking trail and shook the reins. There was, he knew, little time to lose, and in another five minutes he stood, still wearing his white-sprinkled furs, in the room of the birch-log building.

(Copyright, 1907, by F. A. Stokes Co.)

"Here are your accounts, Macdonald, and while we've pulled up our losses, I can't help thinking we have just got out in time," he said. "The market is but little stiffer yet, but there is less selling, and before a few months are over we're going to see a sharp recovery."

The farmer glanced at the documents, and smiled with contentment as he took the check. "I'm glad I listened to you," he said. "It's unfortunate for him and his niece that Barrington wouldn't—at least, not until he had lost the opportunity."

"I don't understand," said Winston.

"No," said the farmer, "you've been away. Well, you know it takes a long while to get an idea into the Colonel's head, but once it's in, it's even harder to get it out again. Now Barrington looked down on wheat jobbing, but money's tight at Silverdale, and when he saw what you were making, he commenced to think. Accordingly, he's going to sell, and, as he seems convinced that wheat will not go up again, let half the acreage lie fallow this season. The worst of it is, the others will follow him, and he controls Maud Barrington's property as well as his own."

Winston's face was grave. "I heard in Winnipeg that most of the smaller men, who had lost courage, were doing the same thing. That means a very small crop of western hard, and millers paying our own prices. Somebody must stop the Colonel."

"Well," said Macdonald dryly, "I wouldn't like to be the man, and after all, it's only your opinion. As you have seen, the small men here and in Minnesota are afraid to plow."

Winston laughed softly. "The man who makes the dollars is the one who sees farther than the crowd. Any way, I found the views of one or two men who make big deals were much the same as mine, and I'll speak to Miss Barrington."

"Then, if you wait just a little, you will have an opportunity. She is here, you see."

Winston looked concerned. "She should not have been. Why didn't you send her home? There'll be snow before she reaches Silverdale."

Macdonald laughed. "I hadn't noticed the weather, and, though my wife wished her to stay, there is no use in attempting to persuade Miss Barrington to do anything when she does not want to. In some respects she is very like the Colonel."

The farmer led the way into another room, and Winston flushed a little when the girl returned his greeting in a fashion which he fancied the presence of Mrs. Macdonald alone rendered distantly cordial. Still, a glance through the windows showed him that delay was inadvisable.

"I think you had better stay here all night, Miss Barrington," he said. "There is snow coming."

"I am sorry our views do not coincide," said the girl. "I have several things to attend to at the Grange."

"Then Macdonald will keep your team, and I will drive you home," said Winston. "Mine are the best horses at Silverdale, and I fancy we will need all their strength."

Miss Barrington looked up sharply. There had been a little ring in Winston's voice, but there was also a solicitude in his face which almost astonished her, and when Macdonald urged her to comply she rose leisurely.

"I will be ready in ten minutes," she said.

Winston waited at least twenty, very impatiently, but when at last the girl appeared, handed her with quiet deference into the sleigh, and then took his place, as far as the dimensions of the vehicle permitted, apart from her. Once he fancied she noticed it with faint amusement, but the horses knew what was coming, and it was only when he pulled them up to a trot again on the slope of a rise that he found speech convenient.

"I am glad we are alone, though I feel a little diffidence in asking a favor of you because unfortunately when I venture to recommend anything you usually set yourself against it," he said. "This is, in the language of this country, tolerably straight."

Miss Barrington laughed. "I can find no fault with it on the score of ambiguity."

"Well," said Winston, "I believe your uncle is going to sell wheat for you, and let a good deal of your land go out of cultivation. Now, as you perhaps do not know, the laws which govern the markets are very simple and almost immutable, but the trouble is that a good many people do not understand their application."

"You apparently consider yourself an exception," said the girl.

Winston nodded. "I do just now. Still, I do not wish to talk about myself. You see, the people back there in Europe must be fed, and the latest news from wheat-growing countries does not promise more than an average crop, while half the faint-hearted farmers here are not going to sow much this year. Therefore when the demand comes for Western wheat there will be little to sell."

"But how is it that you alone see this? Isn't it a trifle egotistical?"

Winston laughed. "Can't we leave my virtues, or the reverse, out of the question? I feel that I am right, and want you to dissuade your uncle. It would be even better if, when I return to Winnipeg, you would empower me to buy wheat for you."

Maud Barrington looked at him curiously. "I am a little perplexed as to why you should wish me to."

"No doubt," said Winston. "Still, is there any reason why I should be debarred the usual privilege of taking an interest in my neighbor's affairs?"

"No," said the girl slowly. "But can you not see that it is out of the question that I should intrust you with this commission?"

Winston's hands closed on the reins, and his face grew a trifle grim as he said, "From the point of view you evidently take, I presume it is."

A flush of crimson suffused the girl's cheeks. "I never meant that, and I can scarcely forgive you for fancying I did. Of course I could trust you with—you have made me use the word—the dollars, but you must realize that I could not do anything in public opposition to my uncle's opinion."

Winston was sensible of a great relief, but it did not appear advisable to show it. "There are so many things you apparently find it difficult to forgive me—and we will let this one pass," he said. "Still, I cannot help thinking that Colonel Barrington will have a good deal to answer for."

Maud Barrington made no answer, but she was sensible of a respect which appeared quite unwarranted for the dryly-spoken man, who, though she guessed her words stung him now and then, bore them without wincing. While she sat silent, shivering under her furs, darkness crept down. The smoky cloud dropped lower, the horizon closed in as the gray obscurity rolled up to meet them across a rapidly-growing strip of snow. Then she could scarcely see the horses, and the muffled drumming of their hoofs was lost in a doleful wail of the wind. It also seemed to her that the cold, which was already almost insupportable, suddenly increased, as it not infrequently does in that country before the snow. Then a white powder was whirled in her face, filling her eyes and searing the skin, while the horses were plunging at a gallop through a filmy haze, and Winston, whitened all over, leaned forward with lowered head hurling hoarse encouragement at them. His voice reached her fitfully through the roar of the wind, until sight and hearing were lost alike as the white haze closed about them, and it was not until the wild gust had passed she heard him again. He was apparently shouting, "Come nearer."

Maud Barrington was not sure whether she obeyed him or he seized and drew her towards him. She, however, felt the furs piled high about her neck and that there was an arm round her shoulder, and for a moment was sensible of an almost overwhelming revulsion from the contact. She was proud and very dainty, and fancied she knew what this man had been, while now she was drawn in to his side, and felt her chilled blood respond to the warmth of his body. Indeed she grew suddenly hot to the neck, and felt that henceforward she never could forgive him or herself, but the mood passed almost as swiftly, for again the awful blast shrieked about them and she only remembered her companion's humanity, as the differences of sex and character vanished under that destroying cold. They were no longer man and woman, but only beings of flesh and blood, clinging desperately to the life that was in them, for the first rush of the Western snowstorm has more than a physical effect, and man exposed to its fury loses all but his animal instincts in the primitive struggle with the elements.

Then, while the snow folded them closely in its white embrace during a lull, the girl recovered herself, and her strained voice was faintly audible.

"This is my fault. Why don't you tell me so?" she said.

A hoarse laugh seemed to issue from the whitened object beside her, and she was drawn closer to it again. "We needn't go into that just now. You have one thing to do, and that is to keep warm."

One of the horses stumbled, the grasp that was about her became relaxed and she heard the swish of the whip followed by hoarse expletives, and did not resent it. The man, it seemed, was fighting for her life as well as his own, and even brutal virility was necessary. After that, there was a space of oblivion while the storm raged about them, until, when the wind fell a trifle, it became evident that the horses had left the trail.

"You are off the track, and will never make the Grange unless you find it," she said.

Winston seemed to nod. "We are not going there," he said, and if he added anything, it was lost in the scream of a returning gust.

Again Maud Barrington's reason reasserted itself, and remembering the man's history she became sensible of a curious dismay, but it also passed and left her with the vague realization that he and she were actuated alike only by the desire to escape extinction. Presently she became sensible that the sleigh had stopped beside a formless mound of white and the man was shaking her.

"Hold those furs about you while I lift you down," he said.

She did his bidding, and did not shrink when she felt his arms about her, while next moment she was standing knee-deep in the snow and the man shouting something she did not catch. Team and sleigh seemed to vanish, and she saw her companion dimly for a moment before he was lost in the sliding whiteness, too. Then a horrible fear came upon her.

It seemed a very long while before he reappeared, and thrust her in through what seemed to be a door. Then there was another waiting before the light of a lamp blinked out, and she saw that she was standing in a little log-walled room with bare floor and a few trusses of straw in a corner. There was also a rusty stove, and a very small pile of billets beside it. Winston, who had closed the door, stood looking at them with a curious expression.

"Where is the team?" she gasped.

"Heading for a birch bluff or Silverdale, though I scarcely think they will get there," said the man. "I have never stopped here, and it wasn't astonishing they fancied the place a pile of snow. While I was getting the furs out, they slipped from me."

Miss Barrington now knew where they were. The shanty was used by the remoter settlers as a half-way house where they slept occasionally on their long journey to the railroad, and as there was a birch bluff not far away, it was the rule that whoever occupied it should replace the fuel he had consumed. The last man had, however, not been liberal.

"But what are we to do?" she asked, with a little gasp of dismay.

"Stay here until the morning," said Winston quietly. "Unfortunately, I can't even spare you my company. The stable has fallen in, and it would be death to stand outside, you see. In the meanwhile, pull out some of the straw and put it in the stove."

"Can you not do that?" asked Miss Barrington, feeling that she must commence at once, if she was to keep this man at a befitting distance.

Winston laughed. "Oh, yes, but you will freeze if you stand still, and these billets require splitting. Still, if you have special objections to doing what I ask you, you can walk up and down rapidly."

The girl glanced at him a moment and then lowered her eyes. "Of course I was wrong. Do you wish to hear that I am sorry?"

Winston, answering nothing, swung an ax round his head, and the girl kneeling beside the stove noticed the sinewy suppleness of his frame and the precision with which the heavy blade cleft the billets. The ax, she knew, is by no means an easy tool to handle. At last the red flame crackled, and, though she had not intended the question to be malicious, there was a faint trace of irony in her voice as she asked, "Is there any other thing you wish me to do?"

Winston flung two bundles of straw down beside the stove, and stood looking at her gravely. "Yes," he said. "I want you to sit down and let me wrap this sleigh robe about you."

The girl submitted, and did not shrink visibly from his touch when he drew the fur robe about her shoulders and packed the end of it round her feet. Still, there was a faint warmth in her face, and she was grateful for his unconcernedness.

"Fate or fortune has placed me in charge of you until tomorrow, and if the position is distasteful to you, it is not my fault," he said. "Still, I feel the responsibility, and it would be a little less difficult if you would accept the fact tacitly."

Maud Barrington would not have shivered if she could have avoided it, but the cold was too great for her, and she did not know whether she was vexed or pleased at the gleam of compassion in the man's gray eyes. It was more eloquent than any anything of the kind she had ever seen, but it had gone, and he was only quietly deferent, when she glanced at him again.

"I will endeavor to be good," she said, and then flushed with annoyance at the adjective. Half-dazed by the cold as she was, she could not think of a more suitable one. Winston, however, retained his gravity.

"Now, Macdonald gave you no supper, and he has dinner at noon," he said. "I brought some eatables along, and you must make the best meal you can."

He opened a packet and laid it with a little silver flask upon her knee.

"I cannot eat all this—and it is raw spirit," said Maud Barrington.

Winston laughed. "Are you not forgetting your promise? Still, we will melt a little snow into the cup."

An icy gust swept in when he opened the door, and it was only by a strenuous effort he closed it again, while when he came back panting, with the top of the flask, a little color crept into Maud Barrington's face. "I am sorry," she said. "That at least is your due."

"I really don't want my due," said Winston, with a deprecatory gesture, as he laid the silver cup upon the stove. "Can't we forget we are not exactly friends, just for tonight? If so, you will drink this and commence at once on the provisions—to please me."

Maud Barrington was glad of the reviving draught, for she was very cold, but presently she held out the packet.

"One really cannot eat many crackers at once, will you help me?"

Winston laughed as he took one of the biscuits. "If I had expected any one would share my meal, I would have provided a better one. Still, I have been glad to feast upon more unappetizing things occasionally."

"When were you so unfortunate?" said the girl.

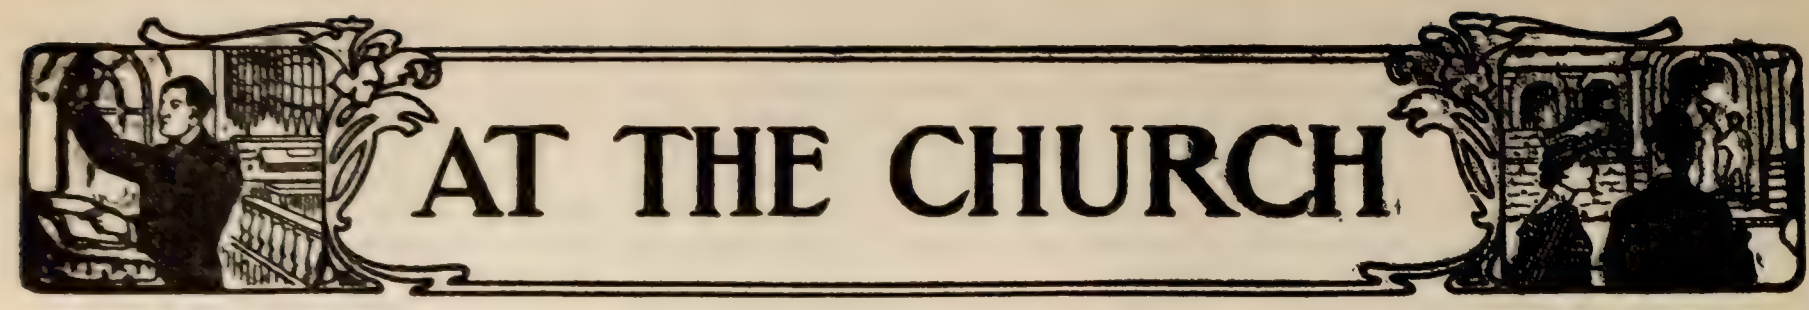
Winston smiled somewhat dryly. "I was unfortunate for six years on end."

He was aware of the blunder when he had spoken, but Maud Barrington appeared to be looking at the flask thoughtfully.

"The design is very pretty," she said. "You got it in England?"

The man knew that it was the name F. Winston his companion's eyes rested on, but his face was expressionless. "Yes," he said. "It is one of the things they make for presentation in the old country."

Maud Barrington noticed the absence of any attempt at explanation, and having considerable pride of her own, was sensible of a faint approval. "You are making slow progress," she said, with a slight but perceptible difference in her tone. "Now, you can have eaten nothing since breakfast."



Winston pointed to the few billetts left and shook his head. "I'm afraid I must get more wood."

The roar of the wind almost drowned his voice, and the birch logs seemed to tremble under the impact of the blast, while Maud Barrington shivered as she asked, "Is it safe?"

"It is necessary," said Winston, with the little laugh she had already found reassuring.

He had gone out in another minute, and the girl felt curiously lonely as she remembered stories of men who had left their homesteads during a blizzard to see to the safety of the horses in a neighboring stable, and were found afterwards as still as the snow that covered them. Maud Barrington was not unduly timorous, but the roar of that awful icy gale would have stricken dismay into the hearts of most men, and she found herself glancing with feverish impa-

The Man of Tarsus*

It is now time in the progress of our studies in Acts to return to the beginning of Saul's career in connection with the Christian community and trace the history of his conversion and missionary work as it develops through the second part of the volume. The first mention of this remarkable man is in connection with the preaching and martyrdom of Stephen. Immediately thereafter a great persecution broke out against the Christians in Jerusalem. Of this assault upon the church Saul was the leader. He laid waste the Christian community, and entered the homes of the believers dragging them forth and committing them to prison. No doubt his leadership was due less to official appointment for such a task than to his prominence in the suppression of Stephen. It may even excite amazement that one whose nature is revealed as so sympathetic and humane in the later story of his apostolic work should have been so vigorous in his persecution of men and women whose only fault, even from his point of view, was the heresy of Christian belief. But Paul had one of those intense natures which hesitate at no sacrifice in behalf of his religion; and perhaps he counted the very hardships of this role of persecution a part of the price he was willing to pay for the favor of God and the vindication of the ancient Jewish faith.

Saul's Persecution.

Back upon this career of persecution Paul looked in later days with absolute horror. No words were ever adequate to express his sense of grief and dismay at the contemplation of his vindictive treatment of the friends of Jesus. He searches the vocabulary for phrases that will measurably describe the havoc he wrought in that period, and counts himself less than the least of all saints because he had wasted the church in the days of his great anti-Christian crusade. So thoroughgoing were the measures he adopted that the church in Jerusalem was decimated, few of its members being left except the apostles. They perhaps because of their prominence in the community, were spared the extremes of official inquisition. The rest were driven elsewhere and compelled to go forth as refugees seeking new homes. But they went proclaiming everywhere the faith that had brought joy to their hearts.

Departure from Jerusalem.

Saul now felt that the crusade should be completed by the pursuit of these refugees to the Syrian cities in which they had taken refuge. We read of the flight of these disciples northward along the coast toward Tyre, Sidon, and Antioch. Some of them went as for as Cyprus; others must have gone to Damascus. No doubt the gospel had already been planted there in earlier days, for it is hardly probable that the company of disciples who learned with terror of Saul's approach to that city could have been the result of such recent preaching as that of the men who escaped from Saul's persecution in Jerusalem. But, having heard of this church in the ancient city of Syria, Saul requested authorization from the Sanhedrin to journey thither and carry forward the work of uprooting the Christian heresy. This permission was readily granted and the zealous young Pharisee started forth from the Damascus gate of Jerusalem with the enthusiasm of a high religious purpose. There could be no question of his hatred of the Christians. They represented to him a serious assault upon the honor and permanency of Judaism. He was literally "breathing out threatenings and slaughter" against them as he took up his journey.

Conflicts of Saul.

But that journey was long. No doubt it was taken on foot, for hints seem to indicate such a mode of travel. It requires six days to cover the one hundred and sixty miles which the caravan route from Jerusalem to Damascus measures. Saul was accompanied by a squad of temple guards who went as the executors of his commission. But otherwise he was unattended, and in the quiet of these days of journeying and nights of rest the whole problem of his relation to the tasks in which he was employed must have come up again and again for reflection. The influences of Stephen's life and death were unforgetable. The character of the Christian community in Jerusalem had not failed to impress him in favorable contrast with his own people. Suppose these Christians were right and he wrong! Yet such a supposition was not to be admitted, since he was a trained and trusted graduate of the University of Jerusalem, with the teachings of Gamaliel fresh in his mind and the entire confidence of the priestly leaders of his nation. And still the arguments from Stephen's character and dauntless heroism, from the passionate and suffering lives of the Christian believers, their disposition and purity, and from the very words of the Scriptures themselves which seemed so pointed in their references to the Messiah, all conspired to increase the conflict in the soul of the young Tarsan.

The Great Disclosure.

That Saul was prepared for the climax of his journey by these conflicts of spirit is evident both from the narrative itself and from the necessities of the case. No such experience as that which happened to him as he neared Damascus could have occurred to one who was still in the frenzied state of hostility to the men of the new faith. It was when his doubts, perplexities and questions had come to their climax and in sheer despair of quieting his conscience except by the immediate resumption of activity, he was hastening forward at the noonday, when no one ever travels in the fiery heat of an eastern sun, that suddenly the great disclosure came. In the blinding light which left him sightless, he heard as if some divine voice were speaking the words to his innermost soul, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" There was no wrath in the words of the heavenly Speaker, but only a great compassion that energy and zeal should be wasted in frantic effort to kick against the purposes of God that sweep onward evermore through the universe, resistless as suns. All his efforts to extirpate Christianity were the futile attempts of a misguided spirit to set back the clock of history. They were like the angry kicks of a bullock against the goad of his driver. For Saul there was a nobler task than this. He was to be sent as the messenger of that Christ whom he had maligned and persecuted, to speak his name and his will among the nations.

An Apostle Untimely Born.

Stricken and prostrate, overwhelmed with the sense of past mistake, conscious that his career as a Jewish leader had brought him only this unutterable humiliation and forlorn sense of misdirected and wasted effort, Saul cried out, "Lord, what wilt thou have me do?" His pride was gone; his past reliance upon authority, the highest in his nation, was shattered forever; his mind was a chaos; only one burning fact remained of all the lore he knew, and that was that "this same Jesus, whom he had persecuted, God had made both Lord and Messiah."

His companions led him into the city wondering at the strangeness of his sudden weakness. No direct counsel had as yet been given him. It remained for human lips to declare to him the message of the cross. But Paul came to recognize the necessity of this interview on the way to Damascus in later days. He never looked upon it as essential to his conversion. He maintains quite frankly that he was born prematurely into the circle of the Christian faith. "One born out of due season," he calls himself, as if he had been hurried into the new life for a special reason. He could not long have resisted, so he seems to say, those impulses and truths which were already working in his soul since the moment of Stephen's death. But, while the events of his journey were not necessary to make him a Christian, they were essential to his apostolic witness of the resurrection. And to this episode of his career he constantly reverts, not only in his recitals of his conversion, but in his writings to the church.

Saul in Damascus and Arabia.

His experience in Damascus was the natural sequel to these events. Ananias, a trusted member of the group of believers in that oldest city in the world, as the Arabs still believe it to be, learned of his presence and of his strange experience by the way. Scarcely knowing whether this was a genuine repentance or a mere device to lure the Christians into fatal confidence, he went to visit Saul in that old "street called Straight," along which the biblical student journeys even yet with the sense of its significance in apostolic history. It required only a brief conference to give Saul the needed instructions. His faith in Christ was now beyond question. In penitence and sorrow, he had mourned over his past life, a failure thus far as he counted it; and now there remained to him but a single act of public acknowledgment of the faith which he had sought to destroy. He arose and was baptized and in the joy not only of restored sight but of pardon and peace he tarried a few days with the brethren at Damascus. Not for long, however, for the necessity of quiet, of meditation, of prayer, of free outpouring of the grief and passionate regret wnich filled his soul, lured him into the regions beyond, and in Arabia, somewhere on that dim frontier of eastern Palestine, he found in the weeks or months of meditation and of prayer the strength for the new life that had so suddenly dawned upon him. When he came back again to Damascus and began to preach in that city, it was with at least the beginnings of that great gospel which he later called decisively his own, and of which he was to make such masterful demonstration in the years that followed.

PRAYER MEETING

THE GOD OF COMFORT.

Topic, April 14. Isa. 40:1-11; John 14:15-20; I Cor. 1:3, 4; 7:5, 6.

Yes, God comforts all sorts of people, but not to confirm them in their prejudices and peevishness. He comforts men by bringing them out into his great world of moral and spiritual activity and biding them play a worthy part in it. He is therefore ever bringing us to face situations which reveal our weakness and arouse within us the desire for more knowledge and a steadier will. In a word, God honors us by treating us as persons whose chief joy is found in being coworkers with him.

A Nation's Comfort.

Exiled Israel was comforted by being purified in heart and by receiving a vision of her mission. The anguish of defeat and exile gave to the nation a sense of sin and taught it to pray for pardon. It is a poor sort of comfort which the self-righteous enjoys. It is only as men realize the greatness and wideness and depths of God's mercy that they have abiding peace. Israel was also called to be a light to the nations. That she understood her mission imperfectly was the cause of many sorrows to her. The purpose of God concerned the whole world. The nation that thinks God is concerned for it alone is doomed to disappointment and sorrow. It will have ambitions that God will break on the wheel of history. It will be envious of other nations. It will not be able to rejoice in the prosperity of many whom God blesses. May we not say the same of a church? Is it not true that much of the anxiety which causes sleepless nights to Christian people is an expression of sectarianism? We are too little to appreciate all the work of God. And by our sectarianism organizations we cultivate narrowness of feeling. Jonah did not want Nineveh to repent and receive pardon. He feared the grace of God. It is possible that Christians have the same fear? God is doing so many things for so many peoples that a complete man will always have reason for gladness.

The Friendship of God.

It is not enough that we recognize God as the "power that makes for righteousness." Abraham is named the friend of God, a distinction which every man desires. To be a friend of God is to have God as a friend.

Let the sweet hope that thou art mine
My life and death attend;
They presence through my journey shine,
And crown my journey's end.

The songs of faith testify to the earnest longing of the spirit of man to have fellowship with the living God. Deism with its God afar off is too cold for the average mortal. The ethical ideal of the stoic may be admirable for contemplation, but nobody is satisfied with it in practice. We cry out for a God on whom we can rest our human hearts. "In that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you." The Master understood our needs. As we grow in human feeling, we grow in admiration for the words with which he spoke to the hearts of men. He reveals God to us as our friend. His utterances must be interpreted in the light of this revelation. We cannot begin with a heathen notion of God as the enemy of men and ever get any sense from the words of Jesus. "Conscientious cruelty and lying in the name of our holy faith are probably to be explained on the ground that men twist the sayings of Jesus to fit false ideas of God.

Comfort in Affliction.

The man who has confidence that he is doing the will of God is not discouraged by a few hardships. He expects to encounter opposition. He really doubts the genuineness of his faith if he has an easy time, for he knows that all the truly good have had to suffer affliction. Furthermore, what do friends mean to one who has no problems to solve and no scheme of wickedness to overmatch? It is not easy to give up the friendship of one with whom we have done hard, honest service.

The coming of Titus meant something to the burdened and anxious apostle. To the pleasure seekers acquaintances are tiresome. What comfort can come without human friendship that is merited and lasting? God comforts by inviting us to be worthy of the confidence of good people. He sends us friends to be our helpers. If we think he is separating us from any one whom we really need, we ought to inquire whether there be not selfishness in what we call friendship. We may in our pride reject the comfort sent from God because he sends in his own way and by persons of his own choosing and not as we would have him send it.

Lesson XV. How the Mind Works.

I. ASSOCIATION. The mind does its work in a way peculiar to itself. Its first method is ASSOCIATION OF IDEAS. All knowledge is the grouping of ideas. "Birds of a feather flock together," is as true mentally as physically. If we see two things together frequently, whenever again we see one of them the image of the other is always sure to spring up beside it. This is the association of CONTIGUITY, or nearness in space. If again two things are similar in shape, color or use, the thought of the one always tends to call up that of the other. This is the association of LIKENESS. It is not only ideas that are associated together; but ideas may be associated with EMOTIONS, as when the sight of some object recalls some strong feeling once experienced in connection with it. Or an act of VOLITION call up an idea, as when the doing of some act makes us think of the consequences involved. When we endeavor to recall anything in MEMORY, it is this law of association that we call to our aid. Memory is voluntary association just as day-dreaming may be called involuntary association. If we may personify mental states, we might say that each idea, emotion or volition has its little circle of boon companions, without which it is never wholly satisfied to appear in consciousness. Let one of the band make its appearance and all the rest will come trooping after it.

II. KNOWLEDGE AS ASSOCIATION. Every object of knowledge is a group of ideas held together by association. Some of these groups we are so familiar with that the association acts instantaneously and we are hardly conscious of it. In the case of others less familiar we can feel the associating process at work. We are then said to be "thinking a thing out." Knowledge is built up out of sensations—the raw material that comes to us through the senses. The infant playing with the orange is getting certain sensations of redness through the eye, shape and color through the touch, bitterness through the taste, etc., and is told, "This is an orange." Later on when it sees an object of a certain red color and shape on the table, all the sensations of touch, taste and sight that were originally experienced rush together again and it recognizes "an orange." Sometimes we go wrong, as when we mistake an orange gourd for a genuine orange. We have then made a false association. When we "leap to conclusions" we are making hasty and ill-considered associations.

III. APPERCEPTION. We are now prepared to know how the mind learns. Learning always involves two elements—the old and the new; and the process whereby the old assimilates the new and makes it a part of itself is called APPERCEPTION. Apperception is the finished product of ASSOCIATION. When anything new is offered to the mind it does not become known until some of the existing contents of the mind condescend "to associate with it," and the more associates it thus secures, the better it is known. When we see something vaguely and ask, "What is that?" we are in the condition between ignorance and knowledge. We have called apperception to our aid. If there happen to be no ideas in our mind that will associate with the stranger, we say we, "Do not know what it is." But if welcoming hands are stretched out to it by a group of ideas already in our mind, we say we, "know it." And if several such groups of ideas fight between themselves for the right to entertain the stranger we say the thing it is either this or that or the other, and wait for the issue of the battle. These groups of ideas are called in technical language APPERCEPTIVE MASSES.

IV. EXAMPLES. (1) Every one is familiar with the picture puzzles in which sertain lines of figures appear now to be one thing and now another. We look at them one way and they appear to be lines on a flat surface; we look at them another and it is a picture of a stack of building-blocks or a flight of stairs. Yet the lines have not changed. We have only "apperceived," or looked at them differently. (2) The astronomer and the common person both see the same shadows on the moon's disk; but to the one these are extinct volcanoes and to the other the outline of a human face. They are differntly apperceived—that is all. (3) The savage and the man of science both see the same lightning; but the former sees in it the weapon of an angry God, and the other one of the many displays of the electric forces of nature. This is to say, the "apperceptive mass" of the one is theological, while that of the other is scientific.

V. SOME DEDUCTIONS. The following

facts concerning knowledge and the way we acquire it spring directly from the principle of association. (1) KNOWLEDGE IS A GROWTH FROM WITHIN and not an addition from without. Its true analogy is the expanding seed, not brick built upon the brick. The new is simply the old in a new relationship. "The apperceptive mass" assimilates the new data of sense or thought just as the seed assimilates the lime, phosphates, carbon, etc., and produces the green shoot. (2) KNOWLEDGE IS INTERPRETATION. It is the way the mind works over the data of consciousness for itself. It cannot, therefore, be poured into the mind like water into an empty vessel, but the mind must be stimulated to get it for itself. (3) It follows that the "form of sound words" will be INTERPRETED VERY DIFFERENTLY by persons with different "apperceptive masses." The writer when a boy thought for a long time that St. Matthew was a liquor dealer, because the word publican in Scotland meant "saloon keeper." The correct apperception was lacking. This illustrates the folly of trying to teach theological doctrine to children in the lower grades. It is not as some think merely a question of putting these truths in simple enough language. The fact is the very conceptions themselves cannot be correctly apperceived except at a later stage. (4) UNIFORMITY OF BELIEF IS NOT NATURE'S IDEAL. Knowledge is individual. Each mind makes its own world. Where belief seems most uniform it will always be found to be most verbal and technical. It is safe to say that of any number of persons of different temperaments and upbringings who repeat the same religious creed, no two "apperceptive," that is, understand or really believe them, in identically the same way. This should encourage charity towards the beliefs of others. (5) Large parts of the Bible being records of religious experience, can only be understood by those who have had SIMILAR EXPERIENCES. The inner history is necessary to apperceive the outer. We should not, therefore, teach the 8th of Romans or the 14th of John to boys and girls of the junior grades whose religious experience is still of the boy and girl, and not the adult type.

LITERATURE: Adams' "A Primer of Teaching;" Dubois' "The Point of Contact in Teaching." Any of the standard works on Psychology.

QUESTIONS: (1) What is the "association of ideas?" (2) Name several kinds of "associations." (3) Explain how our knowledge is built up by "associations." Illustrate your answer. (4) What is "apperception," and explain how it works? (5) What is the mind doing when we say (a) "We do not know what this is," (b) "This is either an orange or a gourd?" (6) What is an "apperceptive mass?" (7) Give some illustrations of "apperception." (a) from the lesson, and (b) from your own experience. (8) Give five truths that may be drawn from the fact of apperception. (9) Is knowledge more like a growing plant or a building? Explain your answer. (10) What do we mean by saying "knowledge is interpretation?" (11) Give some examples of wrong interpretation that illustrate apperception. (12) Is uniformity of belief attainable? (13) What bearing has this lesson on Bible study?

Mary had a little lamb—
'Twas Persian—on her coat;
She also had a mink or two
About her dainty throat;
A bird-of-paradise, a tern,
And ermine made the hat
That perched at jaunty angle
On her coiffure, largely "rat."
Her tiny boots were sable topped,
Her gloves were muskrat, too,
Her muff had heads and tails of half
The "critters" in the Zoo,
And when she walked abroad, I ween,
She feared no wintry wind;
At keeping warm, 'twas plain to see,
She had all Nature "skinned."

OUR SERIAL.

tience at a diminutive gold watch and wondering whether the cold had retarded its progress. Ten minutes passed very slowly, lengthened to twenty more slowly still, and then it flashed upon her that there was at least something she could do, and scraping up a little of the snow that sifted in, she melted it in the can. Then she set the flask top upon the stove, and once more listened for the man's footsteps very eagerly.

She did not hear them, but at last the door swung open, and carrying a load of birch branches, Winston staggered in. He dropped them, strove to close the door and failed, then leaned against it, gasping, with a livid face, for there are few men who can withstand the cold of a snow-laden gale at forty degrees below.

How Maud Barrington closed the door she did not know, but it was with a little imperious gesture she turned to the man.

"Shake those furs at once," she said, and drawing him towards the stove held up the steaming cup. "Now sit there, and drink it."

Winston stooped and reached out for the can, but the girl swept it off the stove. "Oh, I know the silver was for me," she said. "Still, is this a time for trifles such as that?"

Worn out by a very grim struggle, Winston did as he was bidden, and looked up with a twinkle in his eyes, when with the faintest trace of color in her cheeks the girl sat down close to him and drew part of the fur robe about him.

"I rally believe you were a little pleased to see me come back just now," he said.

"Was that quite necessary?" asked Maud Barrington. "Still, I was."

Winston made a little deprecatory gesture. "Of course," he said. "Now, we can resume our former footing tomorrow, but in the meanwhile I would like to know why you are so hard upon me, Miss Barrington, because I really have not done much harm to any one at Silverdale. Your aunt,"—and he made a little respectful inclination of his head which pleased the girl—"is at least giving me a fair trial."

"It is difficult to tell you—but it was your own doing," said Maud Barrington. "At the beginning you prejudiced us when you told us you could only play cards indifferently. It was so unnecessary, and we knew a good deal about you!"

"Well," said Winston quietly, "I have only my word to offer, and I wonder if you will believe me now, but I don't think I ever played cards in my life."

Maud Barrington watched him closely, but his tone carried conviction.

"Yes," said Winston. "It puts a strain upon your faith, but some day I may be able to make a good deal that puzzles you quite clear."

Maud Barrington glanced at the flask and said nothing.

Winston understood that the topic was dismissed, and sat thoughtfully still while the girl nestled against the birch logs close beside him under the same furs, for the wind went through the building and the cold was unbearable a few feet from the stove. The birch rafters shook above their heads, and every now and then it seemed that a roaring gust would lift the roof from them. Still the stove glowed and snapped, and close in about it there was a drowsy heat, while presently the girl's eyes grew heavy. Finally, for there are few who can resist the desire for sleep in the cold of the Northwest, her head sank back, and Winston, rising very slowly, piled the furs about her. Maud Barrington lay very still, the long dark lashes resting on her cold tinted cheek, and the patrician serenity of her face was even more marked in her sleep. Moving softly he paced up and down the room.

Winston afterwards wondered how many miles he walked that night, for though the loghouse was not longer than thirty feet, the cold bit deep; but at last he heard a sigh as he glanced towards the stove, and immediately swung round again. When he next turned, Miss Barrington stood upright, a little flushed in face but otherwise very calm, and the man stood still, shivering in spite of his efforts and blue with cold. The wind had fallen, but the sting of the frost that followed it made itself felt beside the stove.

"You had only your deerskin jacket—and you let me sleep under all the furs," she said.

Winston shook his head, and hoped he did not look as guilty as he felt, when he remembered that it must have been evident to his companion that the furs did not get into the position they had occupied themselves.

"I only fancied you were a trifle drowsy and not inclined to talk," he said, with an absence of concern, for which Miss Barrington, who did not believe him, felt grateful. "You see,"—and the inspiration was a trifle too evident—"I was too sleepy to notice anything myself. Still, I am glad you are awake now, because I must make my way to the Grange."

"But the snow will be ever so deep, and I could not come," said Maud Barrington.

Winston shook his head. "I'm afraid you must stay here, but I will be back with Colonel Barrington in a few hours at latest."

The girl deemed it advisable to hide her consternation. "But you might not find the trail," she said. "The ravine would lead you to Graham's homestead."

"Still," said Winston slowly, "I am going to the Grange."

Then Maud Barrington remembered, and glanced aside from him. It was evident this man thought of everything, and she made no answer when Winston, who thrust more billets into the stove, turned to her with a little smile.

"I think we need remember nothing when we meet again, beyond the fact that you will give me a chance of showing you that the Lance Courthorne whose fame you know has ceased to exist."

Then he went out, and the girl stood with flushed cheeks looking down at the furs he had left behind him.

Blackwell, Okla., Revival

Evangelist Richard Martin, a man of fine personality and a heart aglow with love for souls, logical and persuasive, ably assisted by his splendid Christian children, known as the "Martin Family," who are gifted musicians and personal workers, giving such faithful and efficient help with voice, violin, piano and graceful presence, closed a six weeks' meeting here, Sunday night, March 21, which resulted in doubling the original membership and nearly one hundred more. There were two hundred and fifty added to the Christian Church—mostly adults, heads of families, splendid business men, and several entire families.

To the few of us who have been in the work here from the day of small beginnings, it is wonderfully glorious, and we are constrained anew, to praise Him who has given us these glad days of refreshing. To have had some little part in the task of helping on the work in times of discouragement seems now a good thing to us.

The church here was organized soon after the opening of the "Cherokee Strip" by H. W. Robertson. We met in a one-room school building for breaking of bread and prayer and preaching once a month by Elder Robertson or W. S. Rehorn. There were not always men enough to serve as deacons, the women serving instead.

A tabernacle was then built by the city for general use, and our Sunday-school and now semi-monthly services were held there. When we went to open the Bible-school it was not unusual for Sister M. E. Ralston and myself to find the chairs piled high on either side and the floor waxed for the dance of the night previous; or, perchance, a theater troupe still lingered in the curtained corners of the building, and the coal stoves had been left full of ashes and cinders. We would set to work with a will, the first who came helping; then Brother J. J. Carson came to the rescue with his carriage full of cobs and kindling, and soon things were going cheerily. And O, how we did enjoy the service! —the more because of the difficulties—and how heartily the songs of praise rang out from grateful hearts.

At length we had a little frame church building and a regular pastor, and now for nearly a year a beautiful, commodious brick church seating 600. The present well-beloved pastor, George N. Weimer, a man of large spirituality and capabilities, has ably assisted the "Martin Family" throughout this entire meeting. It is the first thorough arousing our little city has ever had, and from full hearts we are singing "Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

CELESTA BALL MAY.

A Great Day in Carthage, Mo.

Sunday, March 21, was truly a great day for the Carthage Church. For almost one year the minister, D. W. Moore, has been conducting a Teacher Training Class in the First Standard Course, and recently the class finished the course, and the above date was the day of their graduation. I had the pleasure of spending the day with that splendid church where I briefly addressed the Bible-school in the forenoon, preached at the 11 o'clock service, held a very effective conference with the leading workers at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and gave the address to the graduating class and delivered them their diplomas at the evening service. It was an ideal Sunday, and the Carthage people were out in large numbers and with an intelligent appreciation of the occasion, which was inspiring, indeed. Sixteen persons received the International Diploma. This class will at once take up the Second Standard Course and go right along with their work.

In connection with their graduation, formal steps were taken for the formation of another class in the First Standard Course, which it is hoped will enlist one hundred of the people of the church and community to recite week by week, at the same hour with the regular sessions of the Sunday-school. It is possible that still another class to recite at a different hour will be organized to take up the First Standard Course.

The Carthage Bible-School is preparing itself for the increased facilities it will enjoy on completion of the splendid new church building, the walls of which are now going up. With suitable enterprise it will not be difficult for that church to gather together in the Bible-school from 500 to 1,000 after they come into their new building.

D. W. Moore, minister, was full of rejoicing in the graduation of his splendid class. There is but one voice in the Carthage church and that is the voice of praise for this splendid minister, as he leads this great congregation to larger things.

At the afternoon conference arrangements were perfected for all the adult classes of the school to be organized, and receive their recognition certificates by Adult Bible Class Day, March 28.

A Typical Case

About twenty-five years ago, in a city in far-away India, a baby girl was born. Her parents were Hindus, and when the little girl came, the poor mother sighed, thinking what a hard life her little daughter would have, as you all know little girls are not loved in India. The father was very angry and did not mind saying he did not care one poce (one and two-tenths of a cent) for his child. He had one boy, a few years older, and it was upon him that he showered his love. When Tabitha was about two years old her mother died. The father would talk to her, telling her how he wished she would die too, and how she should never have any of his property—for he was considered quite a rich man—and how his son should have it all. He drank dam (a native liquor) and smoked opium, and abused the poor little baby till the news of the neglected child reached some missionaries. Some of the ladies went to see Tabitha and her father, and they asked him if he would give them the little girl. This he was only too glad to do, as he did not care to be bothered with her. Soon after this, as he sat smoking opium by the sagri (a large bowl made of mud and filled with coals, used in the cold season in India), he fell asleep, fell into the fire and was burned to death. This was the beginning of a new life for the Hindu girl. She soon learned to love the ladies who were so kind to her, and having plenty of food and good care she soon became a sweet, loving child. At four years of age she was taken to a C. W. B. M. girl's orphanage. She was given a good education and taught to sew and do all kinds of work such as the native women do in India.

A letter from Miss Burgess said that Tabitha went out with her several days in the week teaching the women in the village, and as she added, "she is worth more than all of my regular Bible women put together." God alone knows what this one true, noble woman has done and will do for her people. Think what would have been her life had she not been cared for by the missionaries, when a child. You who are interested in helping the children in the orphanage in heathen India, do not think your money is not spent for the best good. It means life to many of these little ones, not only in this world, but in the regions beyond. The poor wandering children of India, my heart aches for them, and yours would too, could you but once see them. May God bless you for all the silent sacrifices, for all the prayers you make for the work in that far-away heathen land.

The Missouri Lectureship

The Lectureship will meet in Springfield on Monday evening, April 12. The three pastors and the three churches of the Disciples of Christ in this town cordially invite all our ministers in the state to attend. The three churches will provide free intertainment for all who come. The reception committee will meet all trains, as far as possible, and escort all visitors to the First Church, corner of College and Campbell streets, where homes will be assigned. Let every one, who wishes a home while in town, write at once to any one of the undersigned pastors.

How the A. B. C. Does Things

G. H. Bassett of Salisbury says: "Our school has more than doubled since the beginning of the year, and the church is not nearly large enough for it."

Showing the effect of class organization upon the foreign missionary offerings, W. A. Fite, of Fulton, writes: "One class of boys gave $15 to foreign missions on March 7. Another class gave $20, and another one $35." He also says that one of the classes is responsible each Wednesday night for the prayer meeting attendance, and that there were at Sunday-school on March 14, 215 beside the college girls. This is the largest attendance at the school for a number of years.

The effect of class organization upon the dedication was demonstrated at Independence on the 21st, when a new men's class, only one month old, pledged $1,000; the women's class, five months old, pledged $500; the girls' class pledged $500, and the boys' class $250, a total of $2,250 from the four organized classes of the school. The young women's class is planning to pay off their $500 pledge within a month or so, and expect to pay it in cash, instead of giving entertainments or using expedients for securing the money.

Semi-Centennial Anniversary

MARCH 8-14, 1909.

The First Christian Church, Salem, Ohio, has just rounded out fifty years of history. This has been a half century of splendid achievements and glorious triumphs. For many years this church has ranked high in the state.

This congregation proudly traces its origin back to 1828, at which time Walter Scott visited the city and preached to crowded houses in the Baptist church. For thirty years the little band was visited by many of the eminent preachers of the Restoration movement. They were organized into a church March 15, 1859.

The erection of the present structure began in 1869. The basement was dedicated by William Baxter January 1, 1871; the auditorium September 17, 1871, by Isaac Errett. The lot and building with a later addition cost about $20,000.

Many of the noted educators and preachers of the church have served the congregation. Representatives of this number are: T. E. Cramblett, president Bethany College; M. J. Grable, evangelist; Walter Mansell, pastor, Crawfordsville, Ind.; John G. Slaytor, pastor, East End Church, Pittsburg.

The church had at the time of its organization eighty members. It now numbers about 700 nominal members. The rapid and substantial growth of the congregation in recent years has caused it to become widely and favorably known. The average yearly addition of members has been about 100. The year that is now closing has been one of the most prosperous in its history. The missionary offerings have been doubled, amounting to $750. A $3,000 pipe organ has been recently installed. The balance on the organ was paid during the week of celebration, clearing the church of all debt. The future prospects are bright.

The following speakers appeared on the anniversary program: T. E. Cramblett, M. J. Grable, C. B. Reynolds, John G. Slaytor and J. W. Reynolds. These services brought great spiritual good to the congregation. The pastor has resigned. He is highly commended by the elders. He is open to correspond with good churches. Address him, Salem, Ohio.

WITH THE WORKERS

R. E. McKnight, San Francisco, Calif., has accepted a call to the church at Lodi, Calif. He will be succeeded at Gilroy by W. B. Berry who has been engaged in editorial work.

H. J. Crockett began a series of meetings at Pawhuska, Okla., March 28. Three confessions at the first invitation. The church needs a pastor and can pay a salary of about $1200.

Sumner T. Martin, of Santa Barbara, Calif., has published a thoughtful sermon of his on "Divine Healing" in pamphlet form. He will send it to any address on receipt of postage.

Here is the record of the Jefferson St. Sunday-school of Buffalo, N. Y., for Sunday, March 21: School was large and full of life Sunday. There were 512 present—seventy-eight being in the primary, 176 in the intermediate and 131 in the adult classes. There were ten visitors and 4 new scholars. The offering was $11.15.

The work of the church at Clarendon, Ark., is moving forward with great rapidity since A. R. Adams began work there the first of last February. The Sunday-school has doubled in attendance and efficiency, a Christian Endeavor Society has been organized, the choir has been strengthened, and the church has undertaken some enterprising methods of advertising.

A new church is being established at Toyah, Tex., under the leadership of J. L. Haddock. The church has purchased a lot and will proceed to erect a building. It has been but a few weeks since the preacher entered this field to gather the scattered Disciples for the organization.

Judging from the tone of voice the Mississippi people use in discussing the matter, we feel warranted in saying that they are going to establish a college in their state to be known as the Southern Christian College. The site hasn't yet been selected nor the money raised, but a resolution has been passed that has the ring of victory in it. Certainly such an achievement would have marked effect upon all our work in the Gulf States. Jackson and West Point are rivals for the location.

The missionaries in the Philippine Islands report 800 baptisms during the past year. This is more than we have had in many whole states in this country with many times the number of workers and church buildings and all the facilities of aggressive work.

Wednesday, March 31, was a record breaker in the office of the foreign society. The receipts from the churches as churches were larger than in any other one day in the history of the society. They amounted to $7,098. This is more than one-half of the total receipts of the year 1881, and the largest check was only $500. The total number of churches sending offerings that day was 250.

The leaflet of the Davenport, Iowa, church, S. M. Perkins, pastor, indicates that at least a car load of good Disciples will attend the Pittsburgh convention from the three cities on the river. We shall expect them to join the Christian Century Special at Chicago, about which we haven't said much yet, but which will be a mighty good company. Here's an invitation in advance of the announcement anyhow!

Sometimes our telegraphic correspondents do not send their wire until Monday afternoon or else the company fails to deliver promptly. The following interesting report from James Small was received after we had gone to press last week: "Kansas City, Mo., March 29:—Aggregate report: Forest Ave, 51; Ivanhoe, 113; Sheffield, 22; total Sunday-school, 3,776; offering, $107; aggregate additions churches, 28.—James Small."

The Bible school of the First Christian Church, Lincoln, Neb., had a great day Sunday, March 28. L. C. Oberlies occupied the pulpit in the morning in the absence of the pastor, H. H. Harmon. He spoke on the modern adule Bible class movement and many of the older members signed up for this class. Then followed the most enthusiastic and most largely attended school in the history of this rapidly growing church—459 pupils were in attendance and $45 collection. This school is in a contest with the schools of Omaha, Beatrice and Bethany and ranks ahead on the number of points gained. The contest closes on Children's Day and the interest in all the schools is deepening.

WITH THE WORKERS

Chas. E. McVey is assisting in a meeting at Auburn, Ill.

W. H. Zenor of Iowa, has been called to the East Lincoln Church, Neb.

The church at Lawrenceville, Ill., which supports Mrs. F. E. Hagin, remains steadfastly in the Living-link column. H. C. Holmes is the minister.

Sumner T. Martin, Santa Barbara, Calif., has prepared and had printed an address on divine healing, which he offered to mail to anyone for the cost of the printing.

The church at Water Valley, Miss., where Frank M. Bare is minister, observed C. W. B. M., March 21. The pastor gave an address and the children rendered the missionary cantata, "The World for Christ." The offering was $20.

Rosebury, Ore., B. W. Bass., minister, gave $76.85 last year. The apportionment this year is $100. The church has already sent $357.80 as a church and the Sunday-school $20.97 besides. This is real centennial progress. Oregon is making a great record this year.

Jesse P. McKnight, minister, the Magnolia Ave. Church, Los Angeles, Cal., says: "Magnolia Ave. continues in the list of the Living-link churches. The money was raised more easily than the year before, and this notwithstanding the church just a few weeks before gave over $500 for the special work in Africa."

The Sunday-school at Chagrin Falls, Ohio, is in a flourishing condition. There were 317 present, March 21; 138 in one class and forty-seven in the young people's class, which is taught by the pastor, G. B. Evans. It is the plan of the church to build a Sunday-school annex with gymnasium and club room equipment.

The Men's Brotherhood of the church at Chagrin, Ohio, has invited W. F. Rothenburger, of Cleveland, to address them. The pastor, G. B. Evans, has announced the following interesting series of sermons for Sunday evenings: "A Man's Work in a Man's Way;" "The Man of the Hour;" "The Man of Galilee;" "Christ, the Brother of Every Man."

David H. Shields, who has done a very successful work at Salina, Kans., has resigned to accept a call to the church at Eureka, Ill., where he will begin his labors early in April, succeeding A. W. Taylor, who has become pastor of the Irving Park Church, Chicago. J. C. McArthur, an elder of the church at Salina, writes of the deep regret with which the church at Salina gives up its pastor, who has so greatly endeared himself to the hearts of the people of the church and the city.

W. Remfry Hunt writes from Shanghai:—"The work moves on steadily and effectively. The churches at Hong-Kew and Yang tsz-poo are working enthusiastically. Have sent some of our best helpers to the Bible College. Baptized six young women and married a couple this week. Shanghai is the great field for evangelism. Have set the native Christians to work, and they do well. The large field keeps me working at high pressure."

James S. Meyers, who is pastor of the North Side Church, Kansas City, Kans., has closed his second year's work. From his annual report we select the following: Three hundred additions, with no revival except home forces; financial obligations of the church met with absolute promptness; indebtedness of $3,500 on the basement paid in full. The Sunday-school has increased in regular attendance from 100 to 450; Sunday-school offering from $1 to $14 per Sunday. We have three large Endeavor Societies—the junior, intermediate and senior. The C. W. B. M. and Aid Society are in a flourishing condition. The church will make Armourdale, which suffered from the flood last year, the special object of its missionary help this year, giving $100 in money besides other assistance. An architect and building committee have been selected to begin the erection of a church building to be known as "The Temple" on our present basement.

B. L. Allen has been forced by ill health to give up his work at Kingfisher, Okla.

The West Side Church, Council Bluffs, Ia., has called G. R. Hull to the pastorate.

The church at Larned, Kans., has called D. Martin of Iowa to become their pastor.

The church at Hutchinson, Kans., has been conducting a meeting with home forces. O. L. Cook is pastor.

The Ivanhoe Park Church, Kansas City, Mo., is being assisted in a meeting by R. H. Fife and family.

The C. W. B. M. will send M. B. Wood and wife, of Hiram, Ohio, to Porto Rico as their missionaries.

A. R. Liverett, who has been serving the State Board of Iowa, has accepted a call to the church at Cameron, Mo.

The East Broadway Church, Sedalia, Mo., is to have the assistance of V. E. Ridenour, singing evangelist, in a meeting to be held soon.

The telegrams say that Breeden and Altheide are having a great meeting in Houston, Tex. There were forty-two additions the first week.

J. E. Dinger, who has been pastor of the church at Chickasha, Okla., has been called to succeed J. J. Morgan as pastor of the church at Fort Worth, Tex.

The students of Drake University have pledged themselves to raise $5,000 toward the new gymnasium; $3,500 of this was raised at a single assembly meeting.

J. M. Horne, of the Grant Park Church, Des Moines, has been ill. His pulpit was supplied on the 21st by Rev. Ashley in the morning and Rev. Eppard in the evening.

There have been 678 additions to the church at University Place, Des Moines, during the Scoville meetings there, and the meeting continues, is the report in the Christian Union.

J. E. Lynn, Warren, Ohio, is preaching sermons which are studies of the early church as a guide to the modern church. These sermons he announces as "dedicated to the Bible school."

The Pacific Christian, which has changed ownership, and also the form of its dress, will now become a weekly, and will be edited by D. A. Russell. We bid the new editor welcome to the circle.

Here is the record of the Sunday-school at Warren, Ohio, for March 14: Bible school attendance Sunday, 498; offering, $13.68; Mrs. Lynn's class atttendance, 41; Mrs. Griffith's 39; Men's class 37; Mrs. Snider 29; eight new scholars.

The church at Ames, Ia., has just closed a one week meeting, in which the pastor, J. T. Houser, did the preaching and the music was cared for by home forces. There were thirty-six additions to the church.

Some Des Moines Sunday-schools—Central, 1,000; Capital Hill, 500; Grant Park, 200; University Place, 1,488. With such Sunday-schools who can prescribe the limits of our work in that city in the future?

Under the leadership of J. Boyd Jones, the church at Marion, Ind., has not only cleared up all indebtedness, but has a surplus of funds on hand and is beginning the erection of a new house of worship. The preacher and his wife hold a place of high esteem in the hearts of the people for their works' sake.

Under the leadership of H. F. Burns, who is preaching for the church at Douglas Park, Chicago, and taking special studies in the University of Chicago, the church at Douglas Park will conduct Sunday evening meetings during the month of April in the Lawndale Hall, a well equipped room which will seat between 300 and 400 people. The subjects announced for the month are: "What is Your Life?" "Easter Service," "What Can Christianity do for Me?" and "Christ's Message to Men of Power." This is an attempt on the part of the church to reach a larger number of people than can be reached with the present equipment of the church.

In the meeting held at Brazil, Ind., by J. P. Meyers, of Shelbyville, there were forty accessions to the church. E. L. Day is the pastor of the Brazil church.

Pittsburgh, 1909, will mean much more to those churches who make liberal offerings for home missions than to those whose hearts are unmoved by the stirring appeals of our home secretaries.

Austin Hunter has been in a meeting at Fairmont, Ind. There were three additions the first few days. The meetings continue. This church is only a year old and does not yet have a building.

J. E. Wolfe and the church at Weston, Mo., are working most happily and enthusiastically together. Evangelist Violett is to be with them in a meeting in August, and the church and large Bible school are already working hard in preparation for his coming.

The Christian church at Famalco, Ill., has closed a meeting which was most successful. There were seventy-nine additions to the church, while there are only about 100 people in the town. The meetings were led by Rev. William Ward, whose work is highly commended.

America is the key to the grand strategy of world conquest. "As goes America, so goes the world." The home board has shown us the opportunities. We have the men and the means. Let us consecrate them to the conquest of America. Nn church can be true to itself and ignore the appeal of our home board this year of all years.

L. A. Chapman, of Elmwood, Neb., has received the unanimous call of his congregation to remain there another year from May 1. He reports the church making progress along all lines. Two of his members will educate and then support a native evangelist in India. The church went beyond its apportionment for foreign missions. His normal class will turn out twelve teacher training graduates this spring.

The Imperial University of Tokyo has just received an interesting offer from Oberlin University of Ohio, U. S. A. It is to the effect that Dr. King, next month, will give a series of lectures to our students for half a year on condition that the Imperial University will send one of its professors to lecture to the American students. We learn that the offer has been favorably received by our University, and if the question of expenses be settled to mutual satisfaction, the scheme will be carried out.—Japan Advertiser.

WITH THE WORKERS

Southern California Items

Grant K. Lewis.

There is a Men's Club at Naomi of fifty members. The organization offers the same fellowship as fraternal insurance in the lodges. They pay $3 per week for sick benefits, and also funeral benefits. Their dues are twenty-five cents per month. They meet once a month and have program with refreshments. They will affiliate with the National organization of the Brotherhood of Disciples. This church has recently started a Sunday-school at 1450 E. 40th street. The attendance is about forty.

The church at Rialto is propering under the ministry of Dan Trundle. They are growing in numbers and in "this grace also." They recently gave $700 to the Berkeley Bible Seminary, and besides reaching their apportionment in the March offering they gave Dr. Dye $100 for his work in Africa.

Mrs. Princess C. Long is assisting W. E. Crabtree in a meeting at San Diego Central Church. Reports in the midst of its second week tell of splendid audiences and twenty-one additions. Meetings will continue through March.

Colonel F. M. Chapman, one of the well known Chapman brothers, died at his home in Covina on Thursday, March 18. Mr. Chapman was well known in political, business, social and Christian circles in Southern California, and was an active interested member of the church at Covina.

The church at Glendale, under J. W. Utter, is in the midst of a building enterprise. They have a lot well located near the high school building, on which they are erecting a modern bungalow church. This property is costing them about $5,000, and will be dedicated sometime in April.

Our Mission Church at Burbank has about forty members. E. H. Learned has for years been superintendent of the Sunday-school and the pillar on which the church rests. He has a class of nine, just finishing the teachers' training course. Graduating exercises will take place next Sunday evening. This will be a great event in the valley. Hugh C. Gibson, general secretary of Sunday-school work, and R. P. Shepherd will both be present to make addresses. So far as we know this is the banner church in the Brotherhood, having so large a class from so small a membership.

The work at Santa Monica Bay, including the joint pastorate of the churches at Santa Monica and Ocean Park, is prospering under the ministry of J. Leslie Lobinger; D. W. Mizner, of Los Angeles, supplies each Lord's Day the pulpit at each place, so that both churches have preaching regularly morning and evening.

E. E. Lowe, our minister at San Bernardino, is the best known preacher in that great county. This is largely due to the vigorous campaign last fall when he was a candidate for the state legislature. He preaches frequently at various suburban points about the city in which he lives. Last year, in spite of the financial stringency, this church raised $1,500 to apply on its indebtedness. The secretary recently gave his home mission lecture, entitled "Uncle Johnnie Appleseeds" to a house full of people, and secured pledges to the amount of $76 to the May offering. That church will go above their apportionment for home missions this year.

Great interest is manifested in the regular monthly preachers' meeting at the First Church of Los Angeles. Next meeting comes on Monday, April 5. The lecture of the morning will be delivered by F. M. Dowling, of Pasadena; subject, "Isaac Errett, and his Contribution to the Restoration Movement." In the afternoon there will be special addresses to preachers by Frank G. Tyrrell and C. C. Chapman; also at this afternoon session R. P. Shepherd will read a paper on Christian Science and Divine Healing, which will be in the nature of a reply to the splendid, forceful paper presented last month by S. T. Martin.

E. W. Thornton is conducting a Sunday-school institute at South Pasadena Church G. Warren, A. P. Frost, W. G. Menzies, Mary Arrangements are being made for a tent meeting next month, with R. P. Shepherd as evangelist and Mrs. Princess C. Long to lead the singing.

Recently A. C. Smithers preached a most interesting series of Sunday evening sermons in which he treated the "faith healing cults." Large audiences greeted him at every service and much interest was manifested.

The "Hiram Fellowship" is the most recent fraternal organization in our churches. Graduates, students and friends of Hiram College, Ohio, gathered in number about fifty in the social rooms of the First Church of Los Angeles, and held a banquet. R. P. Shepherd presided as "toast master" and brief and witty speeches were made by Mrs. Pettit, J. G. Warren, A. P. Frost, W. G. Menzies, Mary Sacket, J. W. McConnell, and W. H. Hanna. A promising organization was formed with James G. Warren president, and Dr. Murray secretary and treasurer, and greetings were sent to President M. L. Bates.

The following churches are now receiving help under our evangelizing board: South Main St., Los Angeles, $10 per month; West Side, Los Angeles, $40; Budlong, Los Angeles, $40; Figueroa Blvd., Los Angeles, $40; Highland Park, Los Angeles, $20; South Pasadena, $30; Huntington Beach, $15; Ocean Side, $10; University Heights, San Diego, $25; Santa Monica Bay, $20; Temple, Ariz., $15; Douglas, Ariz., $16.66 2-3; Tucson, Ariz., $30; Arizona Evangelist, $50.

From the Hub of the Empire State

The season for moving has not only struck our members in the cities, but preachers as well. In consequence a large number of the churches will have new ministers. Changes in pastorates will occur in Auburn, Elmira, Gloversville, Second Church Rochester, while Watertown, Throopsville and several other charges are yet without ministers.

Bro. Arthur Braden has resigned a pastorate in the Auburn Church, which has been one of marked success. He has added over 200 to the membership, established a mission in a thriving locality, and strengthened the work in many ways. He goes to Keuka College as head of the department of sacred literature, assuming his duties at the beginning of the next collegiate year.

Bro. C. C. Crawford leaves Elmira to take up the work at the Second Church of Rochester. His has been a ministry of sacrifice in Elmira, but he has been instrumental in seeing the congregation housed in a beautiful modern building, well equipped and located. The growth here has ben slow yet substantial. Elmira is a child of state missions.

Bro. H. H. Cushing leaves Gloversville after nearly three years of a very trying ministry. One month before he assumed the reins a quarrel among the members had resulted in the decision of the officers to turn the property over to the state board and disband the organization. Prompt work on the part of the state officials saved the church. The state secretary called a meeting of the members, heard the stories from all sides, advised action and promised to secure a new minister and give substantial aid to the reorganized body. This was the task before Brother Cushing, and to his credit be it said that he has patiently led this flock back to fellowship and united service, not only winning many of the old members back, but adding nearly sixty otherwise.

Bro. J. Frank Green leaves the state, returning to Ohio. We regret to lose him from the ranks of our ministerial brethren. His work in Rochester has been of a substantial character.

The reports from many of the city churches indicate that the financial stringency of the past months has made itself felt in the work of the winter months. Yet withal ther has been marked progress throughout the state, many being added to the membership of the various churches.

The interest manifested by the Disciples in the co-operative plans in Keuka College during this first year of the plan shows how much the churches of this state appreciate the importance of this enterprise. Bro. Lowell C. McPherson, financial secretary, has not yet been able to visit all the churches, but from those he has visited the responses have been as follows:

Auburn, First Church	$169.01
Buffalo, Jefferson St. Church	$116.55
Elmira, First	13.70
Gloversville, Bleeker St	21.20
North Tonowanda, Paynes Ave	86.55
Niagara Falls, First	72.10
Rochester, First	167.25
Rochester, Columbia Ave	51.35
Syracuse, Central	148.20
Syracuse, Rowland	57.00
Tonowanda, First	6.00
Throopsville	45.60
Williamsville	107.40
South Butler	6.60
Pompey	9.00

Encouraged by these subscriptions, Ball Bros. of Muncie, Ind., one of whom is a trustee, have offered $1,000 provided a like amount is raised by the Disciples by May 1. Brother McPherson just writes that he has secured the amount from two out-of-state brethren. This makes over $1,500 secured from individuals aside from the churches.

Jos. A. Serena.

Syracuse, April 1, 1909.

John G. McGavran, missionary of the foreign society, Bilaspur, India, reports twenty-two baptisms in that field.

Allen Wilson is holding an excellent meeting in Mobile, Ala. "A conservative town," he says, "but we are winning our way."

There were fifteen additions in El Paso, Tex., during March, elven by baptism, three by letter and one reclaimed. One of them, a young man, wants to preach. He is studying as opportunity permits. H. B. Robison is the pastor.

FEED YOU MONEY
Feed Your Brain and it Will Feed You Money and Fame.

"Ever since boyhood I have been especially fond of meats, and I am convinced I ate too rapidly, and failed to masticate my food properly.

"The result was that I found myself, a few years ago, afflicted with ailments of the stomach and kidneys, which interfered seriously with my business.

"At last I took the advice of friends and began to eat Grape-Nuts instead of the heavy meats, etc., that had constituted my former diet.

"I found that I was at once benefited by the change, that I was soon relieved from the heart-burn and the indigestion that used to follow my meals, that the pains in my back had ceased entirely.

"My nerves, which used to be unsteady, and my brain, which was slow and lethargic from a heavy diet of meats and greasy foods, had gradually, but none the less surely, been restored to normal efficiency.

"Now every nerve is steady and my brain and thinking faculties are quicker and more acute than for years past.

"After my old style breakfasts I used to suffer during the forenoon from a feeling of weakness which hindered me seriously in my work, but since I have begun to use Grape-Nuts food I can work till dinner time with all ease and comfort. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WITH THE WORKERS

The great church of Johnson City, Tenn., announces that it will be in the front rank of Living-link churches this year, supporting its own missionaries in foreign, home and state departments. This great church is an example and inspiration to the churches of Tennessee and the brotherhood.

The announcement is already out for the Iowa state convention to be held in Davenport, June 21-24. A neat folder presents some views of that city with the church parsonage as the most attractive object in it. That is a costly thing to do, Pastor Perkins, all your guests will want to be entertained at that parsonage!

The home board announces that no more appropriations are possible till late in the summer. This means that many little groups of Disciples that have been praying for help from the brotherhood must suffer bitter disappointment, and possibly utter defeat. In not a few places unless the present moment is seized without delay all is lost, or if not lost must be maintained at frightful cost. If we could give our home board $200,000 at once the situation might be relieved. The offering day approaches. Home missions should be in our prayers and our meditations in a special sense just now.

The Springfield Union Revival

The Billy Sunday meeting in Springfield, Ill., is approaching its close with a whirlwind of excitement. Mr. Sunday's sermons on "Hell' and "Heaven" and his address to men Sunday afternoon on "Booze" drew immense throngs and were received with great emotion. Three hundred came forward to take the evangelist by the hand Sunday. The total conversions to date is close to three thousand. Often in Sunday's meetings there are as many the last week as in all the rest of the time besides. From fifty to one hundred persons have been coming forward each evening. I intend to be present several evenings during this the last week and will write the fourth article in the series for our next issue. C. C. Morrison.

Church Extension Receipts

Receipts for the first quarter of the new year, compared with same time during 1908.

Churches.

For this year	$2,941.45
For last year	1,394.80
Gain	$1,546.65

Individuals.

For this year	$ 9.262.80
For last year	12.308.22
Loss	$ 3.045.42
Total Loss	$1,498.77

Since October 1, 1908, our gain over the previous year is $1,025.15.

Our comparative statement shows that for the first quarter of 1909 we had a falling off in our receipts of $1,498.77. There is a gain of $1,546.65 in contributions from the churches, which is very encouraging. The falling off in individual recipts was due to a less amount in receipts from annuitants. We have received $3,350 less annuity money this year than last.

The following annuities have been received during the first quarter of this year: $500 from a friend in Oklahoma; $250 from a friend in California; $100 from friends in Kansas; $1,000 from a friend in Missouri; $2,000 from a friend in Ohio; two $500 gifts from friends in Iowa, and $200 from Kentucky. Remit to G. W. Muckley, Cor, Sec., 500 Water Work Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

Glorious Gains

The total receipts of the foreign society for the month of March amounted to $53,878.19, a gain over March, 1908, of $7,614.46. The receipts from the churches as churches amounted to $41,705.48, a gain of $1,924.55.

These gains are all the more significant for the month when it is remembered that the first Sunday in March, 1908, was the first day of the month; this year the first Sunday in March was the 7th. This is just one week's difference in receipts.

During the twenty-five days following the offering this year, the churches as churches gave $41,507,72, a gain of $5,171.09, over the twenty-five days following the offering 1908. The gain in the number of contributing churches for the twenty-five days is 182. In a word, more churches are giving than ever before, and the average offerings are larger.

The record for March this year is greater than the foreign society has ever made before in that month.

The total receipts of the missionary year from October 1 to April 1 amounted to $81,306.48, a gain of $20,703.76, or more than 34 per cent. The gain from the churches as churches since October 1, 1908, is $6,010.80.

The prospects are bright for a glorious year. Let us see to it that the work so well begun is more than maintained throughout the whole year. The month of April promises great things.

Telegrams

Tacoma, Wash.—Beginning the fourth week with 123 additions. Crim and Saxton, Evangelists.—W. A. Moore.

Houston, Texas, April 5—Great services yesterday; thirty-four added; 123 in nineteen days. Breeden and Altheide, Evangelists; Sanderson, Minister.

Albion, Ill., April 1, 1909—We have just closed a meeting of three weeks with twenty-five accessions, of which twenty-four were by primary obedience. The preaching was done by the pastor.—T. J. Clark.

Independence, Kas., April 4—Our splendid thirty thousand dollar church dedicated by Evangelist George L. Snively, Greenville, Illinois, today. Ten thousand needed, thirteen thousand five hundred dollars given. Three men united today. Snively and Leigh continue in meeting. This is my ninth year and church most prosperous, happy and hopeful.—J. A. Longston, Minister.

Connersville, Ind., April 5—Two weeks with 108. Thirty today, mainly adults; many men. Pity to close but engagements pressing. Last night every corner of the large building and every room and vestibule crowded with great eager throngs and hundreds turned away. One of the best Women's meetings at three o'clock I ever had. Fellowship of this meeting glorious every way. Large delegation from Rushville and other points. Many visiting preachers.—Herbert Yeuell.

Bergholz, O., April 5—A large percentage of membership of 157 brought into harmonious reunion with the work here; also additions. Fourteen hundred dollars church debt raised. Mitchell caused greatest stir ever in Bergholz. Strong, forceful preaching has brought results. His lecture night drew larger audience than any in lecture course. He has turned down several lecture bureaus to remain in evangelistic work. Professor Buss who came to our people in Brother Mitchell's meeting at Mishawaka, Indiana, a former evangelist and noted cornetist and soloist has made good the flattering endorsements of the English and American press. A strong team like Mitchell and Buss should never be idle.—H. H. Martin, Elder.

Des Moines, Ia., April 5—Twenty-six added at closing invitations of our great meeting with the University Church and Brother Medbury. Total 806. Drake University with her President, Faculty and Christian students loyally co-operating. Such a fellowship is the opportunity of a lifetime. We received two preachers into our fellowship during this meeting, one Presbyterian who resigned a seventeen hundred dollar pulpit and one pastor of People's Church from Minnesota. Both came to listen and stayed to step out on the divine foundation. New converts subscribed $2,500 for current expenses and then paid $3,300 on dedication day. Full written report by Brother Medbury next week. About 1,652 in Des Moines campaign. Three days more at Highland Park Mission, then North Yakima, Washington.—Chas. Reign Scoville.

Impure Blood Thoroughly Cleansed

Relieved of All Impurities Through the Use of Stuart's Calcium Wafers.

The blood is a thick, opaque fluid of a rich, red hue in the arteries, and a purplish blue in the veins. It derives its color from numerous small bodies floating in it which are called red corpuscles. If the blood be examined under a microscope the red corpuscles will appear as thin, circular disks, floating in a transparent, nearly colorless fluid.

These red corpuscles number 5,000,000 to the cubic centimeter; but it often happens that they become very much diminished in number, a condition known as anemia or leukoaemia. There are also other circular bodies in the blood known as white corpuscles, but which are much less numerous than the red.

The red corpuscles are the stimulating and animating elements of the blood. They absorb oxygen in their passage through the lungs, and convey it to the tissues of the body, where combining it with food elements absorbed from the stomach, it evolves animal heat.

Whenever the kidneys fail to properly filter the blood of its impurities, or whenever constipation occurs, the impure foreign matter collects in the blood-current, is carried to all part of the system in the circulation, and is usually deposited in the form of pimples and other eruptions upon the skin.

Most of these eruptions appear upon the face, for the reason that the skin there is thinner than anywhere else. Many people commit the error of trying to cure the pimples or eruptions by the application of salves and lotions, which is a great mistake, as the cause of the trouble is deeper seated, and the skin disease is simply the outward manifestation of the impure condition of the blood within.

Calcium Sulphide is the greatest blood purifier in existence. Instead of driving the blood impurities out through the pores, it sends them out through the proper channels —the kidneys and intestines.

STUART'S CALCIUM WAFERS contain calcium sulphide, combined with other powerful alteratives or purifiers, which act rapidly and powerfully upon the morbid products of the blood, expelling them completely, preventing their return, and incidentally removing pimples, boils, blackheads, carbuncles, tetter, ringworm, scurvy and all other skin blemishes.

Call on your pharmacist and secure a package of this wonderful blood-cleaning remedy; price 50 cents. Also write us for trial package free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 175 Stuart Building, Marshall, Michigan.

Thirty-Five Courses in the Divinity School
Other Courses in Other Departments of the University

Independence, Mo., Dedicates $55,000 Building

On Sunday, March 21, 1909, at 10:45 the main auditorium, the galleries, the Sunday-school auditorium and the Sunday-school rooms were packed to their utmost capacity. In all this great crowd there was but one aim, one purpose, one desire, "We must lift the debt to-day," a debt of $30,000. It seemed an enormous sum to raise in an hour's time—$30,000; and then, too, the members had just finished paying $25,000 on this new church home. F. M. Rains delivered the dedicatory sermon.

After complimenting the congregation on their handsome structure of brick and wood and stone; and after paying a high tribute to the memory of Alexander Proctor, he delivered a sermon from this text: "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink." It was just the sermon for the occasion; strong, forceful, bright and hopeful. Brother Rains was just the man for the occasion; he understood the people, he fully appreciated the situation, and within an hour by tact and skill, and by joke and device, he had brought to pass that which all hearts so much desired —the debt lifted. Not the $30,000 but $31,000 had been subscribed. The largest individual gift was that of $5,000, the next $2,000, then the Ladies' Aid came forward with a pledge for $1,200, the Sunday-school $1,000, the Twentieth Century Bible class, composed of business men of Independence, $1,000, the Young Men's class $500, the Priscilla class $500 and a class of younger girls $500, which together with the smaller pledges and the cash collection made up a grand total of $31,000.

At 3 o'clock a fellowship meeting was held. This was a most interesting one, and it served as an index to the fraternal relations and kindly feeling of all the churches of Independence, and of the sister churches of Kansas City. Rev. C. C. McGinley, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, represented the Ministerial Alliance of the home churches and in a few choice words gave greetings. The Rev. W. F. Richardson, pastor of the First Christian Church at 11th and Locust, brought the message from the Christian churches of Kansas City. He spoke of the close relations that have always existed between the First Christian Church and the church at Independence, and said that it was due in part to the warm personal friendship of the two men who had served these churches so long in the past, the Rev. Alexander Procter and the Rev. T. P. Haley.

The Rev. H. A. Denton, secretary of the American Missionary Society, spoke briefly, impressing upon the people the fact of their larger possibilities and great responsibilities. Then the pastor, the Rev. L. J. Marshall, spoke in behalf of the congregation, returning personal thanks for the kindly messages.

As you go into the building by the west entrance, on your right is the main auditorium with two galleries overlooking it, and on the left of the spacious hallway is the parlor, which is furnished with handsome rockers, rugs and pictures; back of the main auditorium is the Sunday-school auditorium with twelve individual class room and a baptistery opening into it, six of these class rooms help to make up the gallery. By raising a heavy curtain the Sunday-school auditorium and the main auditorium can be thrown into one large room, with a seating capacity of 1,200.

On the second floor, in addition to the individual Sunday-school rooms, there is a room fitted up for the Ladies' Aid. It is furnished with sewing machines, sewing tables, a sewing cabinet, chairs and a beautiful rug. There are two other large rooms on this floor, now being used as class rooms.

Under the entire building is a basement. It is here that we find a large assembly room, which will seat 350 people. It is fitted up with lights, chairs, a raised platform, and two dressing rooms. The basement also contains the kitchen, serving rooms and various store rooms.

All other departments of the church are alive and at work. The congregation is united, happy and hopeful.

MRS. MARY T. BERRY GALLOWAY.

Pittsburg News

W. R. Warren, our centennial secretary, never knows when he is tired. As the time approaches for the great celebration he is literally taking it to bed with him. The work of getting up the program, of corresponding with the state and national papers, the interest of colleges and missionary boards, the halls in which the Centennial is to be housed, the judicious dissemination of information both to the state and far-and-wide to all the states, suggest some of the lines demanding his time and attention. He is not exactly Atlas carrying the world on his shoulders, but we over here in Pittsburgh feel mighty sure that the burden of the great Centennial will rest upon his shoulders until after October. Furthermore we feel sure that in this matter of preparation no one could have a more loving interest, nor larger visions than he has. He is the man of the hour, and amidst all the obstacles that have confronted him, he has remained undaunted, and in the end all things are going to work out to a most glorious conclusion.

Twenty-five were present at the Book Room, Monday, and the meeting was one of very considerable interest. Among some things to be noted are these:

Beaver, with S. E. Brewster as minister, had 209 present in the Bible school on the 28th. This is the largest attendance in the history of the school. The Men's Bible Class has grown from three in September last to fifty-two. W. G. Winn of Hazelwood announced an Adult Bible Class, starting with twenty-two men. Bellevue meeting resulted in thirty-six additions. Brother Lloyd speaks in the highest terms of the work of Brother and Sister Kendall. The people were charmed by the splendid Bible drills by Sister Kendall. D. R. Moss reports has pleasant Sunday afternoon service for men as constantly increasing in interest. Evangelist W. H. Pinkerton reports twenty-seven confessions at Greensburg up to date. Evangelist F. A. Wight is in an evangelistic campaign at the Fourth Church, Pittsburgh. Squirrel Hill has had some showers of refreshing in the evangelistic efforts of Geo. W. Knepper. F. M. Gordon of Knoxville announced an attendance of 531 at their Bible school. They simply don't know when to stop up there. One of these times they will be aiming for a thousand. The Home Missionary Rally will be held Monday next at the East End Christian Church under the direction of W. J. Wright of Cincinnati.

Pittsburg's Dependent Children

On the northern side of the Centennial Quadrangle and facing it is a large ivy-mantled building set in spacious grounds. The inquirer will learn that it is the Western Pennsylvania Institution for the blind. Last year seventy-three boys and forty-nine girls were being educated here. Their industrial work received the first award in the Jamestown Exposition. The property is worth a half million dollars, and the state gives $30,000 a year for its support.

We have just come through a whirlwind campaign fostered by the Chamber of Commerce, and energetically supported by all the newspapers. It realized $300,000 for the erection of a new building for the Newsboys' Home.

On the north side, in Termon avenue, is a handsome building known as the Home for Colored Children.

Going back and forth between the Centennial Quadrangle and the downtown district on the Forbes street cars, you will notice the Children's Hospital and a free dispensary. In Edgewood, one of our eastern suburbs, is is a splendid institution for the education of the deaf and dumb.

On Anderson street, north side, there is a Protestant home for boys.

There is an Episcopal church home for orphans, another Protestant orphan asylum on the north side, a United Presbyterian orphans' home in Wilkinsburg, a home for widows and orphans of Odl Fellows, Bon Avon, a Lutheran orphanage on the north side, a German Protestant orphan asylum in Mt. Lebanon, one of our southern suburbs.

There are several other private orphanages, summer homes and fresh air homes. Of course there are a number of Roman Catholic orphanages, one of which ranks among the largest in the world.

There are a number of day nurseries and temporary homes.

At No. 3 Fulton street is the Kingsley House, one of the best conducted social settlements in the country. It is in the midst of a densely populated tenement section, and ministers annually to hundreds of boys and girls.

Provoking One Another to Love and Good Works.

The above partial list of institutions for dependent children in the world's industrial center, where accidents are creating orphans daily, will prove suggestive in more than one way to the thoughtful Christian.

When we go up from all parts of the world to celebrate the Centennial of the Restoration of Apostolic Christianity, shall we not be impressed by the fact that others have gone before us in restoring certain phases of New Testament life and service? Would it not be well for us to make haste and vindicate the plea by establishing some institution of mercy in the centennial city?

Our Easter Opportunity.

Among the March offerings for foreign missions this year was one from a mining village that had suffered sorely during the financial depression. By a mistake the envelopes with their coins were sent to the Centennial office instead of Cincinnati. There were eight or ten of them, and the aggregate contents amounted to 63 cents. Possibly this was the largest offering received by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society this year; outstripping even the double and triple Living Link churches. Let us encourage all the children whose parents are still with them, and whose homes are yet secure to have some fellowship with the little ones that lack where we abound. It is Easter morning, and it is the hundredth time it has come around since we promised our Savior that we would restore all things in the church to harmony with his mind. Let us set a child in the midst as he did and win his full approval at last.

W. R. WARREN, Centennial Secretary.

SISTER'S TRICK
But it all Came out Right.

How a sister played a trick that brought rosy health to a coffee fiend is an interesting tale:

"I was a coffee fiend—a trembling, nervous, physical wreck, yet clinging to the poison that stole away my strength. I mocked at Postum and would have none of it.

"One day my sister substituted a cup of piping hot Postum for my morning cup of coffee but did not tell me what it was. I noticed the richness of it and remarked that the coffee tasted fine but my sister did not tell me I was drinking Postum for fear I might not take any more.

"She kept the secret and kept giving me Postum instead of coffee until I grew stronger, more tireless, got a better color in my sallow cheeks and a clearness to my eyes, then she told me of the health-giving, nerve-strengthening life-saver she had given me in place of my morning coffee. From that time I became a disciple of Postum and no words can do justice in telling the good this cereal drink did me. I will not try to tell it, for only after having used it can one be convinced of its merits."

Ten days' trial shows Postum's power to rebuild what coffee has destroyed. "There's a Reason."

Look in pkgs. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

HOME MISSIONS, MAY 2nd.

Every church in our great brotherhood should make an offering for Home Missions this year. The future success of the Disciples of Christ depends upon our attitude toward the opportunities of the hour. Sixteen western states are being repopulated. Two hundred and fifty millions of acres of arid land are being prepared for settlement under the irrigation projects of the Government.

There never was a time of greater opportunity for the Church of Christ. To enter now means prestige, cheap building lots, economy of men, money and labor. To neglect means irreparable loss. To delay means increased cost when we essay to enter later. To enter now means the multiplication of resources. 162 Mission Churches in America sent $8,000 to our Missionary Boards last year. Multiply the churches and you multiply the receipts for all purposes.

We can only enter the East by way of the West. Missionary work in the East is expensive, very expensive. It takes longer to get a footing; it takes more money to buy property. While building up one substantial mission in the crowded East we can build three or a half-dozen in the West. Multiply the churches in the West, where men are growing rich in a day, where the enterprises of the church are intimately related to the community life, and the money will flow back to the Home Board for the evangelization of the East.

But East and West, North and South, the heroic bands of pioneer brethren cry importunately for the brotherhood's help. Two hundred and fifty claims upon our fellowship and sympathy—they were on file in the office of the Home Board February 1st. Every week the number increases. Carrying on work already begun in almost every state of the Union and in nearly every province of Canada, The American Christian Missionary Society feels that these clamorous appeals from the new fields should be laid upon the consciences of the whole church. We are unable to give any hope of succor to these struggling brethren. Unless the May Offering shall far exceed the receipts from the churches last year, many, if not all applicants from new fields must be denied this year.

Can we afford to inspire the cause so much? Dare we take a step in retreat? Shall we not be held responsible for what we are able to do and do not undertake? Our Centennial year should be marked by some signal undertaking that emphasizes our plea and our potency, bringing up every church and enlisting every Disciple. To establish a thousand new churches in the West would mean more to our cause in the next five years than any single undertaking.

The "Home Board" appeals for $250,000 for the stupendous million-dollar enterprise committed to its hands. Will the preachers and the people answer the appeal the first Lord's Day in May? Letters upon the subject and all remittances should be sent to

The Story of a Statesman's Downfall

By Dr. Austen K. de Blois

Nobody ever knows what will happen tomorrow in China. There the wisdom of sage and prophet goes for naught. The Empress Dowager is dead. So also is the docile Emperor Kuang-hsu. Prince Chun is Regent. Pu-yi, his son, a child of three years, ascended the throne on the second of December, and will hold the reins of government when he is old enough to drive.

A Wayside Shrine.

Thus far these great changes have wrought no great change. Two new actors have appeared, and occupy the center of the stage, but the rest of the drama goes forward as before. Men and nations, east and west, have been watching eagerly the interplay of the forces of reaction and reform during the last decade in China. They have noted the somewhat unsteady advance of the party of progress. They are now beginning to believe that there will be no powerful retrograde movement. This may be true, yet no one can tell what surprise tomorrow has in store, in China.

The Lightning Bolt.

I had written the above sentences as the commencement of an article on the late Empress Dowager. Then I laid down my pen to follow some other work which called me. Before I had the opportunity of returning to my task, the afternoon Chicago papers had announced the advent of the "surprise." It was startling enough to satisfy the greediest imagination. The ablest statesman in the empire has been dismissed and disgraced. He is shorn clean of all honors and dignities, and has barely escaped with his life from Peking.

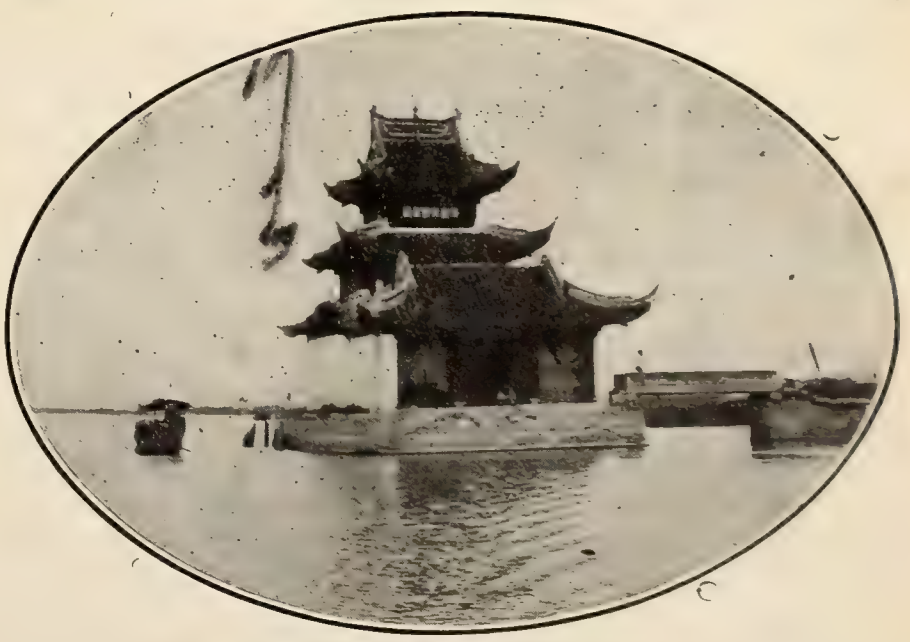
Sometime before her death the Dowager Empress made a most important appointment. She called Yuan Shih-Kai, the most liberal and progressive servant of the Empire, to become a member of the Board of Foreign Affairs and a grand councilor. Many years of honorable public service lay back of this appointment. At the age of twenty-five Yuan was the representative of China in Korea. Later he was resident-general at Seoul, then taotai and director-general of the army, then governor of Shantung, then viceroy of the Imperial Province of Chihli, and finally a controlling force in the central government, and virtual prime minister of the Empire. This eminent man attracted the world's attention by his enlightened administration. He was the valiant leader in all progressive policies. His promotion by the Dowager Empress a year ago was hailed with unqualified approval by friends of the Empire everywhere. This is the man whom the new order has caught, stripped, whipped and banished. What has caused this extraordinary action? The answer is given briefly in the edict as "rheumatism." The erstwhile premier statesman of the Middle Kingdom may be afflicted with that uncomfortable complaint, but something worse than rheumatism is the matter this time.

Some Phases of the Situation.

The newspapers express quite generally the opinion that the Prince Regent and his advisers are determined upon a reactionary movement, of which this is the first step. This may be true. It is undoubtedly true, on the other hand, that Prince Chun has never been regarded as a violent reactionary. He is described as mild and amiable. Perhaps his counselors have overborne his own better judgment. It is certainly true also that Liang Tun Yen, the successor of Yuan, as acting minister of foreign affairs, is a moderate, not a reactionary. It is true, again, that formal assurance has been given by the foreign office that "the new administration will promote with vigor the reforms inaugurated by the late emperor." It is doubtless true, also, that so many of the leaders in China are now imbued with the ideals of reform that a complete reaction is simply impossible. To this it may be replied that all things are possible in Chinese politics.

Apart from the foregoing considerations it is well to remember that Yuan is a Chinese, not a Manchu, that he has been the object of jealousy on the part of some powerful rivals, and that he has been both radical and arbitrary in some of his reform measures. Let us consider each of these facts.

Yuan Shih-Kai is a Chinese. The Manchu Dynasty still governs China. Two hundred and sixty years ago the Manchus were invited into China to help a Chinese general avenge the murder of his sovereign, the Emperor. The men of the far north accepted the invitation with alacrity but declined to return home when the trouble was over. So the Trojan horse was brought within Chinese walls. The Manchus soon subdued the whole empire. They have remained as masters ever since.



Yuan Shih-Kai.

The Chinese do not love their conquerors. Many rebellions, big and small, have troubled the current of Manchu rule, that of the Tai Pings fifty years ago, ranking as the most serious. The people of central and southern China are especially rabid in their opposition to the "Dynasty" of the "Foreigners." The Manchus are not great in numbers. Within the past two hundred and fifty years they have furnished nine emperors to the Dragon Throne, five of whom have been statesmen and warriors of truly regal type. As a race or caste, however, they have degenerated, both in physical and intellectual force. Most of them are thorough reactionaries. As the new education extends its sway the anti-Manchu propaganda will become more and more threatening. At the seat of government the relations between Chinese and Manchu officials have frequently been strained almost to the breaking point of late years.

There are really four chief parties or "influences." The reactionaries oppose every forward movement. The moderates have their eyes toward the dawn but they counsel extreme caution in the introduction of new things. The reformers are strenuous advocates of western ways. The revolutionists are radicals of a different stripe. They would like to drive the Manchus from the seats of power, exclude the "foreign devils" and establish a pure Chinese regime, perhaps a republic.

Rivalries at Court.

In a government such as that of China, intense rivalries amongst men in high place are inevitable. The court has maintained its ascendancy and prevented serious intrigues by playing off these rivalries against each other, and from time to time deposing those statesmen who have become too powerful. Witness the checkered career of Li Hung Chang. Witness now the downfall of the successor of Li the Magnificent, Yuan the Strenuous.

For some time such a rivalry as I have indicated has existed between the great Yuan and Tieh Liang, formerly his protege and later minister of war. The former is a Chinese, the latter a Manchu. The details of the rivalry of which I speak are described by Mr. Putnam Weale in "The Coming Struggle in Eastern Asia." The story runs as follows: Yuan, as viceroy of Chihli, was instrumental in securing and training the 85,000 men who constitute the new "Army of the North." This army was drilled by foreign military experts; but native officers, trained by these experts, are now acting as drill masters in the central and southern provinces.

Tieh Liang is powerful in Manchu court circles. Until two years ago he was, nominally at least, an ally of the viceroy. He was watching his opportunity, however. He became chief of the Peking army council. In 1907 the Imperial Department of War was reorganized. Tieh Liang was elevated to its presidency. One of his first acts was to make himself the direct and sole master of the entire army. The control of the Lu-chun, or new conscript army, was vested in himself. So the seven well-disciplined divisions of the army of the north, the creation and pride of Yuan-Shih-Kai, passed into the hands of the wily Manchu. Now that the Dowager Empress has gone the way of all the earth, and Prince Chun, amiable of temper and a moderate in politics, is regent, the chance of crushing completely his powerful rival has come to Tieh Liang. He has not been slow to act.

The Fighting Factions.

The path of the resolute reformer is always a hard road to travel. The regent is a semi-progressive. So is Tieh Liang. So are other Manchu and some Chinese leaders. Yuan is a reformer of pronounced type. Two or three years ago a commission, sent forth by imperial command, visited Europe and America and made a careful study of the various forms of government, with the view of recommending to the authorities at Peking those features which appealed to them as judicious and practical. When the commissioners, who were led by a Manchu prince, returned from their journeyings, a noteworthy conference of viceroys and other distinguished officials assembled to listen to their report and discuss it. What in our American tongue would be termed "a hot time" ensued. The battle was not between reactionaries and reformers, let it be noted. The unanimous sentiment seems to have favored some change in the ancient order. The debate raged between the so-called semi-progressives and the progressives. Talk was fast and furious. The progressives advocated the immediate introduction of a constitutional form of government; the others advised deliberateness of action. Though favoring the final adoption of a constitution they urged the careful education of the people, the reform of the official system and the thorough revision of the laws, as a necessary propædeutic.

The semi-progressives won the day, and important decrees, embodying their point of view, were issued. Amongst the resultant reforms immediately accomplished, the reorganization of the governmental boards or departments was the most important. It is interesting to note that then, as now, the prediction was freely made that the redoubtable Yuan would not be allowed to escape from Peking alive.

Summary of the Situation.

Yuan Shih-Kai is one of the very few high officials of Chinese birth who have reached a place of large influence in the inner circle of Manchu authority. His successor in the office of grand councilor, Na Tung, is a Manchu and was one of the zealous confreres of Prince Tuan, the notorious Boxer leader. Had the broad-minded Pu-lun become regent the campaign of reform would probably have gone forward rapidly, and Yuan would still be, as he has been, the foremost man in China. As it is the party of progress will be regarded with suspicion by the government. A policy of moderate reform will probably be conducted.

The president of the Chinese Reform Association in New York has described the court at Peking as worse than that of Catherine de Medici. The influence of corrupt and conscienceless men has been alarmingly great. But fortunately the path of retreat is beset with more dangers than that of cautious advance. The degradation of the illustrious Yuan is simply one of the unfortunate checks to the inevitable evolution of New China.

In the course of an illuminating discussion of recent events an American gentleman, long resident in Peking, and whom I met in that city, said to me: "China can never return into her broken shell. The thing is inconceivable. There will be setbacks, reactions, retrograde movements; but the Manchu government dare not bring to pass a complete reaction. They could not even if they dared. The forces now fully at work are too tremendous for any group of leaders to assail and overcome, even though they were thoroughly united amongst themselves in plan and policy. They are not thus united. The reformers must finally win!"

Even though the great Yuan should never come again to a position of authority he will be remembered far beyond the boundaries of the empire for his mighty deeds. His enemies have accused him of treachery. He has even been charged with poisoning the late emperor and causing his death. Such tales can hardly be credited in face of all the wise policies and noble achievements which had their birth in his brain. He knew which way lay strength. He was a friend of the foreigners in the days of the Boxer outbreak. He founded China's new army. He led in the reconstruction of China's educational system. He set his face like a flint against the opium traffic. He antagonized the long-prevalent official corruption. The Bismarck of China, shrewd and masterful, a virile leader and an intense patriot, it will go hard with him if he must sit henceforth with folded hands outside that arena of national turmoil and struggle in which he has proved himself a strong-limbed gladiator. But his day may come again. Nobody knows what will happen tomorrow, in China.

Dr. F. B. Meyer, till recently the pastor of Christ Church, London, but now president of the World's Sunday-School Union, has made many journeys in recent years into the far regions of the world in the interest of the Christian faith. He has just started on a still more extensive tour, which is to include Turkey, India, China, Japan and Australia.

The temperance victories continue to come in with most encouraging regularity. Last week a large majority of the counties of Michigan voted dry. Thus a new state is practically added to the prohibition territory. A large portion of the north shore beyond Chicago has also voted out the saloons, thus admirably fortifying the prohibition district of Evanston, which has hitherto contended singly against the drink traffic on the northern flank of Chicago.

The drama, "The Servant in the House," of which Edgar D. Jones wrote in last week's Christian Century, was recently presented on a Sunday afternoon before the students and faculty of Michigan University, at the request of President Angell and other officers of the institution. Several pastors attended the performance and spoke in much the same terms as those in which Mr. Jones expressed himself in our pages. By request, all applause was repressed and it is said the actors did their part with unusual earnestness and dignity.

The Second National Peace Congress is to be held in this city, May 3-5. It is an interesting omen that Hon. J. M. Dickinson, Secretary of War, is to be the president. The sessions are to be given up to the discussion of topics suggested by the present arming of the world's fighting forces on land and sea, the economic waste of war and of preparations for war, the success of arbitration thus far, and many kindred themes. A very distinguished list of speakers has been provided, and the event promises to be a Hague Convention on a somewhat smaller scale.

Some interesting reading on missionary doings in Africa is in store for us upon ex-President Roosevelt's return from his hunt. He has procured from Bishop Hartzell, who has charge of Methodist mission in Africa, a list of their stations in the part of the continent he will visit and will make an investigation so that he may have first-hand data of which to write. Our foreign mission work is being enhanced in the eyes of the world of late by these responsible students who, traveling abroad, take time to learn the facts. Mr. Bryan and Mr. Ellis have recently borne telling testimony to the mission work in China, and when such an independent scientist as Frederick Starr says the good things he did concerning Dr. Dye's mission work in Bolenge, our last doubt should disappear.

The Congregationalist (Boston) of April 3 publishes an interesting article on Professor Paul's great Mission Study class in Hiram College. The article is written by Rev. S. T. Willis of the Second Church of Disciples, New York City. Professor Paul's class is the largest in the world. "He has reduced the study of missions to a science," Dr. Willis says, "and has made the subject a most attractive theme to the masses of the student body of the college. His work is all the more marvelous when it is remembered that the study class is entirely voluntary, no credits being allowed in the college for it. The first year's work saw an enrollment of 175 students. This year there are more than two hundred in the class."

From The Interior we learn of a step in the Federation movement one degree yet nearer Christian union. It was taken by the three churches—Episcopal, Methodist and Presbyterian—in Ouray, Colorado. The town has about 2,000 people, mostly families of miners. Not one of the Protestant churches seems able to support a pastor. An influential layman, editor of the village newspaper, took advantage of the simultaneous vacancy of the three pulpits to combine the three congregations in one. He worked out a common sense plan for a coöperative church. The local churches continue their organizations intact. Members of the churches elsewhere are understood to preserve their connection unaltered by the circumstance of their affiliation with the Ouray Church. On the other hand, if persons are admitted who have not had any previous affiliation, they will have the privilege of choosing any denominational connection they may wish, and the ministerial committee will forward the names of such applicants to the nearest congregation of their choice for enrollment. The attendance at the services of this coöperative church is said to be larger than the total attendance at the separate services of its three components. Ten denominations are represented in its present membership.

One of the effective instruments for the fashioning of temperance sentiment in the rising generation is the law requiring temperance instruction in the public schools. In many places the teachers have done admirably in carrying out the purpose of this law. Its main emphasis is laid upon the physiological effects of intemperance. It was a wise thing to secure the proper instruction on this theme in connection with the study of physiology. The chief difficulty has been that the amount of space required by the law in an elementary text-book on physiology was somewhat out of proportion, and the exclusive emphasis upon the physiological side left the moral and economic aspects of the matter without treatment. For these and other reasons the law has of late failed to secure the hearty coöperation of teachers and principals in several sections of Illinois. Last year an effort was made by the friends of temperance instruction in the teachers' associations of the state to secure a more adequate and timely law, which shall not only require instruction upon the physical effects of alcohol upon the human system, but also upon the moral and economic effects of the traffic upon the individual and the community. This law has now been proposed, not as a substitute for but an amendment to the present law. This proposed law is being vigorously denounced by one section of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union as a measure aimed at the integrity of all temperance instruction. This seems an unfortunate attitude for the earnest women of this organization to take, as it arrays them at once against the large body of principals and teachers who are most anxious for the success of temperance instruction in the schools, and know that this is impossible under the present law.

No little surprise was occasioned last week by the report that the students of Princeton Theological Seminary had risen in a body to demand the resignation of President Francis L. Patton, the head of the institution. The grounds on which the demand was made were that the seminary under the leadership of Dr. Patton is not in harmony with modern methods of study nor modern point of view. The class-room work of some of the instructors, including the president himself, is declared to be out of date in substance and uninspiring in presentation. Princeton is one of the oldest and probably the most conservative of Presbyterian seminaries. While the University has been making excellent progress, the seminary has gradually declined in effectiveness in recent years. Many of its students left to attend Union Theological Seminary or other institutions which better met their ideas of a competent instructional program. Dr. Patton has been an interesting figure in the Presbyterian church for many years. He was formerly pastor in this city, one of the editors of The Interior, and instructor in the McCormick Theological Seminary. He was widely known in connection with the prosecution of Professor David Swing for heresy. Professor Swing was at that time the pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church. The trial was an event of no little moment. Professor Swing was acquitted of the charges against him, but Dr. Patton gave notice that he would carry the case to the synod of Northern Illinois, and before the second trial Professor Swing resigned from the Presbyterian Church, and organized the Central Church of this city, which has continued to be one of the most effective forces for righteousness in the central section of the city, and is now ministered to by Rev. F. W. Gunsaulus.

The Bible and Modern Scholarship

Professor George Adam Smith received recently the Byke-Acland medal for conspicuous services to biblical study at a meeting of the Society for Biblical Study at University College, Edinburgh. The occasion was notable for the number of leading Bible scholars present and for the character of the utterances. From the addresses of the notable men present the following excerpts are made. The Biship of Winchester said there had never been a time when there was so much reason to take courage with regard to the study of the Bible:

"Our generation has been singularly blessed in witnessing a wonderful move forward from the position of forty years ago. At that time young people were confronted with a drab material of homily and commonplace which served instead of actual interpretation of Scripture. There was too much application of allegory and typology, which, to irreverent youth, was an object of derision and to others of amazement. We have now passed into an entirely different atmosphere. We have made progress, and we desire to make more."

Dr. Ryle spoke of the many branches of Bible study, and the enormous interest associated with each one. "Our fathers," he said, "saw Layard bring from Assyria the results of his persevering researches. It was hardly realized that he had opened up a new chapter in Scriptural study. Even now we have only begun to realize what a field is opening in Assyriology. Egypt, also, is now disclosing new treasures. Men like Deissmann in Germany, and my fellow-student at Cambridge, Professor Moulton, are bringing fresh sheaves from unexpected harvest fields."

"The literature of the Bible," added Dr. Ryle, 'has been treated with courage, and we hope it always will be. We need not be afraid of audacity. It gets quickly corrected of it goes too far. We have more need to be afraid of timidity. On the whole, commonsense prevents people going too fast or too far. The general mass of scientific inquiry may be trusted to move steadily forward under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. You cannot have a sound interpretation of Scripture which does not rest upon the scientific treatment of texts."

Dr. Forsyth was the next speaker, "The Bible needs interpretation," said he. "It is fortunate that the Bible should be so difficult. This puts us on our mettle as simple books never can. The whole attitude of the Christian public to the Bible is being changed. The assured results of critical scholarship must be brought home to the people if their interest in the Bible is to be revived. The most alarming thing about the churches I know best is the private disuse of the Bible. Somehow you must regain the private, affectionate, intelligent use of the Bible. It is a book for the rank and file. It is the Christian soldier's pocket-book, not primarily a work for the officers, yet how it is neglected!"

One of the speakers most gladly heard was Professor Peake, of Manchester. His subject was the relation of the Society to Biblical scholars abroad. He mentioned that while German writers are employed on English theological undertakings, there is not the same reciprocity in Germany. Dr. Peake remarked that British scholars have been able to combine evangelical fervour with the higher critical learning. "At the same time, we have much to learn from the unflinching German loyalty to scientific ideals. What Germany thinks now is what we shall be thinking in a few years."

Dr. Smith, in accepting the medal, gave a most interesting address. Among other things he said: "People are frightened, and in some ways justly frightened, at the lengths to which the criticism of Scripture has gone. In our country we do not need to fear any extravagance. Time is the great prover and the great healer in these things. Even the extremists have done some good. Let us never forget that we are under the guidance of the Spirit of Almighty God—the Providence which overrules all things to the good of the Church. Many of us who are scholars would never have taken up Old Testament work but for the spiritual dynamic behind it."

Enthusiastic Finish of Springfield's Revival

A City Talking Religion—Triumph of Union Effort
Billy Sunday's Power Over Men

By Charles Clayton Morrison

Close to five thousand conversions, with a popular offering of ten thousand dollars to the evangelist—this is the one theme discussed at the breakfast tables in Springfield this, Monday, morning. For six weeks and two days Billy Sunday has held forth. He preached every night except Monday, three times every Sunday, nearly every week day afternoon and, during the last week, three times every day, having added to his afternoon and evening meetings in the tabernacle a noon men's meeting in the court house.

And when I heard him Saturday night he seemed fresher than when his meetings began.

A Whirlwind of Enthusiasm.

The big revival came to its finish in a whirlwind of enthusiasm. Having made everybody talk about Billy Sunday for four weeks, the evangelist finally got everybody talking about religion. In business hours, on street corners, in clubs and homes this has been for weeks the one theme of discussion.

Billy Sunday has made religion a live topic of common conversation throughout Springfield.

On the train going into the city some traveling men were discussing Sunday and his message. Groups of young men gather on street corners and talk it. Six young fellows in a drug store were engaged earnestly in a discussion of the question whether it is better to start the Christian life and fall back than never to start at all. One of their number taking the negative side seemed to out-argue the rest when Mr. Burnham the Christian preacher came in. They appealed to him. That night I saw the whole group, with nearly three hundred others, come forward and start the Christian life.

Invitation Extended in an Original Manner.

It was a thrilling scene. Nine thousand people were present. The invitation was given in a form I had never seen before. It approached very near to our good old fashioned Disciple way of doing it. There was no "personal work." The evangelist preached his sermon and prayed one of his extraordinary prayers. Then while the people's heads were bowed he asked who would be first to come forward and take him by the hand. All over the house men and women rose up. There was no singing yet. In the hush these people crowded forward, scores of them, and took their places on the front seats. Softly the choir began to sing while others came. Twenty rows in front were cleared of their occupants to make room for those coming forward. They were nearly all adults. The majority it seemed to me were young business men whose faces were familiar to me during my residence in Springfield.

Not Much Shouting in the Meetings.

One mother came bringing her husband, her two sons and their wives. She waved her handkerchief exultingly—perhaps this night was the answer to years of prayer. But there was no shouting. There were no "Amens" or "Hallelujahs!" There were few tears. The signs of hysteria were not present. Nearly everybody came with a smile on his face and grasped the evangelist's hand heartily. On one of my previous visits I counted twenty out of the eighty who were chewing gum when they came forward. I saw only one gum-chewer on Saturday night.

Mr. Sunday did no "exhorting" during the invitation. He was kept busy taking the hands of converts. The congregation manifested its approval in most unchurchly ways. I stated in a former article that hand-clapping is a feature of the meetings. The people applaud with their hands instead of saying "Amen" or "Glory to God." So when some person of prominence goes forward the crowd near him begins clapping and the whole audience takes it up.

Two doctors left the section reserved for physicians and started to the front. Instantly their fellow physicians sitting with them started applause which spread rapidly through the house.

Good Natured Congregations.

The normal sense of humor is not suppressed just because it is a religious meeting. Before the sermon began Mr. Sunday announced that Mr. Butler, the soloist, would sing. Now this Mr. Butler had married a Springfield young lady only ten days ago and they were just returned Saturday from their wedding trip. So when he climbed the platform steps he was greeted with a hearty round of cheering. But he was not prepared for what followed. He began to sing:

MEN'S MEETING SUNDAY AFTERNOON SUNDAY REVIVAL.

"Why should I be discouraged!
Why should the shadows come!"

And the crowd broke out in loud applause. When this had subsided he found voice to continue,

"I sing because I'm happy—"

At this their applause was so wild and irrepressible that the young man sat down.

The good natured normality of the crowd has impressed me every time I entered it.

"Get on the Water Wagon."

I found the people pointing back to the great Men's meeting of the Sunday before as the highest pitch of intense enthusiasm. Mr. Sunday preached to ten thousand men that day on "Booze—or Get on the Water Wagon."

The municipal election was to take place the following Tuesday. For the first time in Springfield's history a candidate of one of the big parties stood on a platform for the enforcement of the Sunday closing and midnight closing law. Ex-Lieutenant Governor Sherman, a Republican, was the candidate who ran on this platform. His opponent was non-committal which clearly meant to the community that in the event of his election things would continue as they had been.

The saloon forces were active. Never had there been such a scare in their camp. At one of his courthouse meetings Sunday prayed this prayer:

> "O Lord, fill me with ginger, and with pepper! And, Lord, fill me with tabasco sauce! And help me to give that Booze crowd the hottest time next Sunday afternoon they ever had. Lord help me to skin 'em alive. And Lord you know I can do it, too, if you'll only help!"

Stripped for the Fray.

Well, Billy made it hot for them and incidentally he got warmed up himself. He prepared himself for the fray in the presence of the applauding thousands. Just before his sermon began he pulled up his coat sleeves and, removing his cuffs, tossed them back on the piano. Then he pulled off his coat, then his vest, and threw them to Mr. Ackley, his assistant. Next he removed his tie and collar and unbuttoned his shirt band, rolling back the neck "decollette." Stooping down he turned up his trousers at the bottom and rolled up his shirt sleeves above the elbows. There he stood ready for the fight.

I shall not try to repeat the story of that sermon with its sensational climaxes, its fierce denunciations, its frank revealments of men's sins, its terrible onslaught upon the saloon. I could hardly do that without using the bizarre vocabulary of the daily newspaper reporter. The evangelist went wild and the men with him. Now he was lying prone on his stomach on the pulpit desk, kicking out his feet and waving his hands. Now he was trampling the red flag of anarchy under his heel. Now he climbed upon a chair and from the chair to the top of his desk waving "old glory" while the crowd yelled itself almost as hoarse as the preacher. Then as the sermon was closing he asked how many men would stand for purity and against drinking and the ten thousand rose up almost to a man. When the invitation was given two hundred came to the front.

Sunday's Appeal Primarily to Men.

Such a meeting was held again Easter Sunday. A special telegram from Springfield tells us that three hundred men confessed Christ at that meeting amid tremendous enthusiasm.

Sunday is a man's preacher. He has conducted only one meeting for women only against twelve or fourteen for men only. When he talks to women he talks to them about men and their responsibility for men. He captivates the imagination of young men especially. He uses their vocabulary; he meets them on the level of their habits; his athletic and forth right manner prepossesses their minds for his message.

But the cause was lost, you say, at the election. Yes, on the face of it that is true. Mr. Sherman was defeated. But Mr. Sherman was defeated by the narrow margin of 140 votes. In former years he would not only have been defeated on such a platform, he would have been buried. Indeed, in my judgment, the presence of the revival gave nerve to the Republican candidate to take his stand for enforcement of specific laws against the saloons. I doubt if he otherwise would have done it.

Springfield, as one of its citizens told me, is "politically sodden." Though Mr. Sherman was not elected, his defeat by so narrow a margin registers a tremendous change of popular feeling and reflects significantly the civic influence of the Sunday revival.

Raising the Mammoth Offering for Sunday.

The large offering of money Mr. Sunday usually receives at the close of his meetings is both a mystery and a problem to many. At Spokane he was given $11,000, at Decatur, something like $10,000, I believe. By many this is believed to betray sordidness on the evangelist's part. I inquired into the plans for raising the offering for him in Springfield. I found that each evening during the past week a pastor had made a short statement of the fact that the gifts for Mr. Sunday would be collected on Easter Sunday. The amount talked was $12,000. Personal work was being done by influential men in all the churches preparing the minds of Christian people to make good gifts.

In the factories where Mr. Sunday's assistants have held noon meetings special funds are being made up, I am told, by employers and employes. Grateful converts gladly give large sums oft times, if they are wealthy. There is no extraordinary pressure brought upon any, I am told.

For my part I can find elements in the situation that give me cause for graver inquiry than the fact that so large an offering is given the evangelist. Of his sincerity I have no doubt. Springfield does not talk today about his being a "grafter." That he has worked almost superhumanly hard no one can deny. That he could earn as much money in lecture work as he receives in evangelistic labor and with less effort, is stated for a fact. That he actually earns or does not earn $10,000 in the six weeks he has been in Springfield involves questions of political economy and ethics which no man can settle. So I say if people out of grateful hearts wish to give Mr. Sunday that much money, let the alabaster box be broken.

Next week it is my purpose to write of the manner in which the churches are following up the Union meeting. It is a big problem they have on their hands. The attempt to solve it reveals the wickedness of denominational divisions. It may reveal some other things, too.

Breaking It Gently

A Southern planter, on his return from a European trip, was met at the railroad station by his old darky servant.

"Well, John," said the planter, during the drive to his home, "what's happened since I've been away?"

"Jes' can't think o' nuthin', Boss," replied the darky, after slowly scratching his head, "'ceptin' dat de dog's daid."

"That's not very startling; though I'm sorry, of course. But he was getting quite old. By the way, John, what did he die of?"

"I doan know, Boss, for pos'tive, but I'se an idea dat he done eat too much roas' hoss flesh."

"Indeed! And where did he get the roast horse flesh?"

"Well, you see, Boss, de ole gray mare done got roasted to death."

"You don't say so, John! How did it happen?"

"Well, Boss, she war in de barn when de barn burned down."

"You don't mean to tell me that my barn has burned down? How did it catch fire?"

"Doan know, Boss, 'zac'ly, but we sort o' specks it ketched fire from de house when de house burned down."

"Oh, that's awful news! How in the world did the house catch fire?"

"Why, Boss, dat's a myst'ry; 'deed 't is. But I do heah 'em say as how some candles upset from roun' de corpse an' set fire to de house."

"Corpse, did you say, John? Whose corpse? Has anybody died?"

"'Deed dey has, sah; yo' mudder-in-law has done died."

"Oh, this is terrible! What did she die of?"

"Well, Boss, we couldn't see dat dere was anything de matter, but I did heah 'em say dat she died o' shock."

"Died of shock? For heaven's sake, man, what could have shocked her?"

"Why, Boss, I speck 't was 'o 'count yo' wife runnin away wid de coachman."—Lippincott's.

The Best Self

Much of the consciousness of defeat experienced by true souls is caused by the fact that they do not express the best self. The best self, unless constantly insulted, lingers beside the lower nature, never weary of whispering of the more excellent way; always pointing to a higher path above the dusty, worn one where men sell their birthright for gold, for popularity, or for power. It walks in white amid the foul places where sin goes hand-in-hand with suffering, without soiling even the hem of its garment. Sometimes the heat and clamor of the highway drives the lower nature into a cool, quiet spot where it sees in vision the old ideals of truth and beauty and realizes the possibility of grasping the meaning of the best. There if the longing soul would tarry would it not receive power to enter in and possess the best self?—Mary R. Baldwin.

CENTENNIAL STUDIES

Contributions of the Disciples to Religious History

The movement of the Campbells was preeminently a movement in the realm of ecclesiastical organization. It had direct reference to forms and conditions of Christian fellowship—how Christians were to stand related to each other and to conduct the worship and organization of the church. It was not primarily a movement in religious thought as Unitarianism, or in religious life as the Salvation Army, yet it was not lacking in distinctive doctrinal principles or in vital interests. But its distinctive doctrines all looked toward the practical issue of their bearing upon the "union and communion of Christians."

The doctrinal emphasis of the Disciples falls, therefore, in the field of ecclesiology, rather than in that of theology or of ethics. The first act in the movement was the organization of a society called the Christian Association of Washington; while the second act was the drawing up of a constitution for the new society and a declaration of principles, the first of which was a definition of the nature and constitution of the church. This is Proposition I of the Declaration and Address: "That the Church of Christ upon earth is essentially, intentionally and constitutionally one; consisting of all those in every place that profess their faith in Christ and obedience to him in all things according to the Scriptures, and that manifest the same by their tempers and conduct, and of none else; as none else can be truly and properly called Christians."

Distinctive Contributions.

What, then, have been the distinctive contributions of the Disciples? Let it be observed first of all, that the question is not, What have been the original contributions of the Disciples? Such a question would take us far afield and involve the historic study of all past religious systems; whereas we can shut ourselves up with the movement itself and ascertain its distinctive elements.

Two principles have stood in the forefront of all the thinking, preaching, and activity of the Disciples: (1) The authority of primitive Christianity, and (2) The obligation of Christian unity. These are the key principles of the entire movement. One or the other will account for every decisive turn of events, and for every peculiarity of faith or practice. The Disciples have been from the first severely and uncompromisingly scriptural, according to their interpretation of Scripture. Every new doctrine or undertaking has had to run the gauntlet of a test of Scripture; and a test that has been during the greater part of their history a literal rather than a spiritual test. The appeal to the letter of Scripture became an instinct with them. This quality in their temperament explains the most of their internal controversies. Every question that has come to issue among them has been first of all a question of agreement or disagreement with Scripture. This was not an original principle with the Disciples, but one which they felt had been partially forgotten by the Protestant Church. They thus became protestants of the Protestants in their insistence upon the authority of Scripture. In this they felt lay the hope of a united Christendom; here was general agreement among Protestants to begin with, and here was the ultimate bond of fellowship and unity among Christians.

The Bible and its final authority was the one thing all Christians already accepted and had in common. Nothing else was in common —neither their names, nor confessions of faith, nor methods of organization. It looked perfectly reasonable to Thomas Campbell to expect the Protestant world that professed sole allegiance to the Bible, to go to it for a common name, a common faith, common conditions of fellowship, and a common plan of church organization. For as he said in the Declaration and Address, "is it not as evident as the shining light that the Scriptures exhibit but one and the self-same subject-matter of profession and practice, at all times and in all places, and that, therefore, to say as it declares, and to do as it prescribes in all its holy precepts, its approved and imitable examples, would unite the Christian Church in a holy sameness of profession and practice throughout the whole world?"

This is how these two principles—the authority of primitive Christianity and the obligation of Christian unity—were expected to work together, mutually conditioning and promoting each other. They were two, but they were as inseparable as the two wings of a bird, or the two rails of a railroad. Both ran parallel, and in the same direction, and conducted to the same goal. If all the churches will return to the Scriptures, all will return to unity.

A New Discovery.

I have already said concerning the principle of Scripture authority that it was not original with the Campbells; the same thing must be said concerning the principle of Christian unity. In one form or another both of these principles have always been held in the church. Christians have always desired peace and unity and believed that they knew the way; and they have always looked back to the original records of early Christianity as possessing more or less authority. The thing that was new in the message of the Campbells was (1) the new emphasis upon the authority of New Testament faith and practice; (2) and the new use to be made of it, namely, the promotion of Christian unity. With what fervor the leaders proclaimed this new discovery, and with what confidence in their program as a solvent for the ills of Christendom! To them it was like the Copernician discovery. The religious universe seemed to them reorganized with a new center, richer harmony, nobler simplicity. They looked for the appearance of a new heaven and a new earth in the sectarian world. They expected their plan to make all things new. Law and order seemed breaking out of religious chaos, unity and strength out of sectarian weakness.

A Principle of Liberty.

We shall begin to appreciate the esteem in which they held their proposals if we regard them as they did, as a proclamation of emancipation. The authority of Scripture as they proclaimed it, operated under the religious conditions of the time as, (1) a principle of freedom; (2) and as a principle of inclusion.

They felt themselves and the entire sectarian world delivered from the tyranny of ecclesiastical courts and machinery, and from the bondage of theological opinions and authority. A new attachment to Christ and the New Testament had made them free. They called upon Christians in all the churches to assert the liberty which they had in Christ. They proclaimed it as their right to be bound only where Christ and the apostles bound them, and to be free where they left them free. "Nothing," they said, "ought to be received into the faith or worship of the church, or be made a term of communion among Christians, that is not as old as the New Testament"; "nothing ought to be inculcated upon Christians as articles of faith, nor required of them as terms of communion, but what is expressly taught and enjoined upon them in the word of God." But many doctrines or customs were required by the churches of the time as terms of communion that were not expressly enjoined in the New Testament; and these were the very things causing strife and alienation among Christians and perpetuating division.

Dangerous Heretics.

At a single stroke they freed themselves from the needless and galling tyranny of creeds and church councils, and affirmed the sufficiency of their personal faith in Christ and obedience to him in all things. Just how emancipating such a position was can scarcely be realized today. A hundred years have wrought a complete transformation of the terms of fellowship in the various churches. A proposal to say and do "none other things than those which our Divine Lord and his holy apostles have taught and enjoined to be spoken and done by his ministering servants," was looked upon in that day as dangerous heresy. And for proposing so licentious a program for the churches the Campbells were ostracised by the religious society of the time as dangerous adventurers, latitudinarians, and destroyers of the peace and prosperity of Christendom. It struck at the authority of the venerated confessions of faith, and made short work of the legislative power of assemblies and councils. The Campbells had suffered at their hands and knew from bitter experience how despotic they could be over the faith and life of a Christian minister. Their new position gave them all the abounding life and joy that came to those delivered from bondage, and they worked with untiring devotion to bring others into their glorious liberty. Their message came as a veritable gospel to spirits in prison.

Chapter in Religious Liberty.

The movement of the Campbells is thus to find its true place and appreciation in the history of religious liberty. It is an important but as yet unwritten and unread chapter in the struggle of the Christian soul for the freedom which is its birthright under Christ. It has made an actual and unquestioned contribution to Christian liberty. Luther used the authority of Scripture in the interest of liberty before the Campbells; he found in Scripture justification by faith in Christ apart from the absolution of priests and the Pope. The Campbells found in Scripture the fellowship of all believers by faith in Christ apart from subscription to the creeds and the authority of church tribunals.

Liberty Helps Unity.

This is where unity grows out of liberty. The appeal to Scripture was ultimately in the interest of a simpler, larger, and wider Christian fellowship; but before the larger fellowship, must come freedom from the narrower fellowship of human creeds. The appeal to Scripture proclaimed this freedom, and the same appeal yielded the basis of a larger fellowship. A return to the New Testament reduced the terms of Christian fellowship to simpler terms, and at once broadened the basis of union.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

An Easter Aftermath

Easter is the day of triumphant hope; and therefore the gladdest of all days. We need to use its message to the full, for surely we have enough to chill and make afraid. Death has had a long and mighty life. His conquests are undisputed. The prisons into which for ages He has cast his victims remain closed. There is no escape from his ruthless warfare. By our scientific study of his ways we fight him back for a time, but every victory is finally with him. His ways seem the ways of a heartless anarchist. He seems to delight in upsetting the plans of all. This whole world is his realm and in it there is no certainty of life. He stops the singer when her song is but half sung. He halts the artist with his half-finished production. He causes the writer to cease his book in the middle of a syllable. He allows the farmer to sow, but prevents him from reaping. He permits the builder to lay his foundation and then strikes him down. This Death seems not only an anarchist but a heartless anarchist. He makes millions of hearts bleed every day. After a mother has worked and sacrificed and prayed and agonized for her boy, and thus brought him to a splendidly promising manhood, death fells him to the grave. The mother lives on with her joy and life gone out.

Death the Breaker of Home.

The lover and his love build a cottage and sanctify it with their common life. It seems complete, almost divine. It is a newly made and newly consecrated home. It is well garnished, but best a spirit of cheer and laughter and fellowship and of God fills it. The two souls are happy in the security of each other. There seems no cloud in the sky.

But vain in there security death with his mighty stride enters, sweeps Cupid aside and bears away to his gloomy prison house one of the lovers. There is weeping and wailing, but death heeds not, nor leaves even one little expression of regret.

This anarchist, death, heartless in his ravages, respects not the economy of the poor. He robs an' invalid wife of the support of her hard-working husband; he takes from the widow her only boy and thus leaves her destitute. He seems to have no ethical appreciation of earth's needs. The poet he causes to die young. The voice of the prophet he stills when it is just beginning to be strong. He often passes by the shiftless and corrupting lives and takes the worthy and transforming ones. He heartlessly uses the cold forces of nature to do his bidding. He flashes his death-darts in the lightning; he homes himself in the earthquake; he secretes himself in the disease germ.

Useless to Cry Out Against Him.

So long has he been victor over our kind that we have strictly trained ourselves to his grim ways. We know the uselessness of crying aloud against him; and yet he strikes terror to our heart. He has about him the noiselessness of night. He apologizes not. Nor does he boast. He monopolizes all the ways that lead from this life. No matter by what trouble, catastrophe or disease we make our exit, it is death that controls, and the grave that finally embraces. Death holds the universal monopoly. He cannot be bought. He never forgets. He ruthlessly pursues every man. He is both frank and secretive. He gives everyone to know that the grave is the end of all; but he does not reveal the time when he shall call each to the grave. So amid laughter and tears, play and work, all humanity perseveres, knowing that the grave awaits them, but knowing not the time of their going.

Death is secretive, too, in that he withdraws not the veil from what lies within or beyond the grave. Many in all ages have tried to force him to give up the secrets of the land beyond the grave, but thus far he has guarded well the spirit land.

A Heartless Anarchistic Monster.

So death seems to me at times a heartless, anarchistic monster. In such moods I like Paul's phrase, "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." I like his term "enemy." I like Paul when he taunts Death, "O, Death, where is thy sting, O grave, where is thy victory." Paul likes to laugh at the overthrow of death.

Overthrow of Death! Yes! Easter conquered death. Christ broke its bars. The Divine man's life proved stronger than the universal death. The grave opened. Every grave, too, shall open. "It is not death to die." The grave is not the end. The song unfinished on earth is to be sung anew to heavenly harps. The artist is to "work for an age at a sitting and never be tired at all." The mother is to have her boy again. The lovers are to have builded beyond the reach of death a heavenly mansion. And all is to be well. Beyond death there is no death. Beyond the grave there is no grave. Beyond the tears here there is no tear. Beyond the pain of now no pain. Beyond the darkness of tonight, no night.

This is the message of Easter. It is that of joyful, soul-stirring emancipation. No wonder angels were about on the first Easter morning. That day was earth's great day. There can be no over-picturing of it. No words can exaggerate it. With that day at its inception Christianity is the world-conquering religion; without that day it is a religion, a system of morals, a guess though a sweet guess.

The Night Christ Was Buried.

Gordon did not overdraw the awfulness of the conflict when he wrote: "You know how vividly Bunyan personifies the events and incidents of our history under sin. He talks graphically about 'the terrible Captain Sepulcher and his standard bearer, Corruption.' I think I hear those two talking over the situation on the night that Jesus Christ was buried. Corruption says to Sepulcher, 'Hold fast to that man in Joseph's tomb yonder! There is a rumor that he proposes to break forth from the grave. Do not let him go till I can fasten upon him.' But Corruption fails to touch Him during all those hours in the tomb, because it had been written, 'Thou will not suffer thine holy one to see corruption.' Then Hell from beneath cries out, 'Hold fast to this man. If he comes out he will make a breach in the walls of death through which all the prisoners of Hades will escape.' And: 'he that hath the power of death, even the devil' exclaims in fright, 'If thou let this man go, thou art not Satan's friend.' But vain the seal, and vain the watch and vain the grip of death, and vain the doors of the tomb.

"As it began to dawn toward the first day of the week there began to be a mighty stir in Joseph's tomb; terrible Captain Sepulcher tightens his grip, but in vain. 'It was not possible that He should be holden of death.' He rises. He lives, even as saith the Scripture: 'For to this end Christ hath died, and rose, and revived that He might be Lord both of the dead and living.'"

Christ is the Christ for every man who faces death. He is not for a limited circle, but for all. His resurrection has made him dear to all frail humanity.

Christ's Resurrection as the Son of Man.

"And shall not I, too, rejoice, O Lord! Shall I not be glad that the resurrection life has broken the limits of Thy birth-life! No longer need I think of Thee as a child of a royal earthly line; the breath with which Easter morn inspired Thee accepts no human lineage. No longer need I view Thee as a son of Israel, the breath with which Easter morn inspired Thee is above principalities and powers. No longer need I look up to Thee as the glorifier of a chosen people; the breath with which Easter Morn inspired Thee glorified the common dust. Thy birth at Bethlehem narrowed Thee; it swathed Thee in bonds, it made Thee the Messiah of a special race, the reformer of a special time. But Thy birth on Easter Morn released Thee. It loosed the bonds; it set Thee free. No trammels of race enchained Thy resurrection life. The line of David faded; the tribe of Judah faded; the stock of Abraham faded. Palestine vanished from our view; temple services were swept from out of sight; priest and Levite met our gaze no more. Before Thee stood man—man universal, man of all ages, man of all climes. The bells of Bethlehem called the shepherds of Judah; but the bells of Easter call the sons of men. Thou art now neither Jew nor Gentile; Thou are human. We hail Thee no more as Son of David, but as Son of Man. We crown Thee no more as Israel's Messiah, but as Humanity's Saviour. We worship Thee no more as the ruler of the seed of Jacob, but as the Judge and Arbiter of the Kingdom of God."

Amusements

BY REV. F. B. MEYER

As to the question of Amusements generally, we are all agreed. There must be in every life times of recreation and relaxation. Golf and cricket, motoring and tobogganing, the tour of the world and the day in the country—all have their place. We must all be thankful to those who have the gift of humor, and are the laughter-makers of the world. I have no mission to dictate to my fellows on these questions, except to remonstrate when amusements are pernicious to public morals, or cruel to man or beast. If only the theatre and music-hall were kept clean, and golfers would not employ caddies on Sunday, and the shooting of battues of pheasants or the hunting of tame deer, and pigeon shooting, and rabbit coursing (as practiced on Sunday mornings in some big towns) were tabooed, we should have no right to interfere.

Similarly as to the Amusements in Institutional Churches. They serve a good purpose, when it is clearly understood that they are intended for those wno are in some way connected with the operations of the church and school. If the institutions and amusements are intended to draw people into our churches, they seem to me a mistake; but if they are intended to provide recreation for those who have been drawn from the world, and perhaps have no home of their own, there is no reasonable ground of complaint, provided always that they are under proper control. The Church is not called upon to amuse the world, but to recreate its own adherents, so far as there is need; it always being understood that the home-life must not be interfered with. But obviously again, care must be taken as to the sort of amusements which are associated with our church premises. I seriously protest against the setting-up a mimic theatre, with the footlights (as you may see them in some schools), because it inoculates teachers and children with a taste for the genuine thing. I would admit billiards, because it is a game of skill, and prohibit cards, because they are based on the chance of the deal, and are associated more intimately with money. I would urge for the Sloyd-process, gymnastics, boys' brigades, swimming, lawn tennis, chess, draughts, and even ping-pong, which combine recreation with healthy amusement.

But there is another practice which is rife, I lament to say, in many places, on premises belonging to the Church, of raising money for church purposes by public whist drives, followed too frequently by a dance. I confess that such practices fill me with shame and grief. For reasons which are obvious, I cannot rend my garments or pluck off the hair of my head and beard as the good Ezra did, but I have a lively understanding of the state of mind which led him to sit down astonished. It looks as though God has gone bankrupt, and could no longer run His Church, which must therefore send round a hat to the devil. My grandfather and uncles used to play whist; they said it was a game involving the highest intellectual qualities; but they never played for money. Surely there is a world of difference between a rubber of whist played under such circumstances, and a whist drive organized by church ministers on church premises for the support of Christian work.

Of course these remonstrances and protests are but a poor way of purging the churches. One breath of the South Wind of Revival would settle the matter. The spade freeing the pavement from the frost is a poor substitute for the touch of the sun. Still, until the day of Pentecost breaks, the scourge of small cords may have a place and serve a useful work.

OUR CHURCH MEN

By John R. Ewers

[Our church men will be interested in this graphic report of the great Laymen's Congress in Canada. Excerpts from a later communication of Mr. Macfarlane will appear next week.]

Canadian National Missionary Congress

By Secretary P. C. MacFarlane.

The congress is being held in the city of Toronto in the furtherance of the Laymen's Missionary Movement and is assembled, as the Honorable J. M. Libson, Lieutenent Governor of Ontario, said in his address of welcome "for the first time in the history of any nation to outline a missionary policy on the part of that nation." This statement was made and received in all seriousness. There are four thousand men in attendance, the majority of them laymen, and they represent every Evangelical communion in Canada, the Episcopalians being present in force and taking an earnest part in the Convention. The opening devotional exercises being conducted by the Bishop of Toronto.

Flags of the Nations United.

The Convention sessions are held afternoon and evening in Massey Hall, which seats four thousand people, or over, and very comfortably too. British flags predominate in the decorations, but the stars and stripes have an honored place on the platform above the speakers. The following are some of the interesting scriptures and legends on banners hung around the walls. In a central place this:

"He shall have dominion also from sea to sea and from the river unto the ends of the earth."

"The whole gospel to the whole world by the whole church."

"Not as little as we dare, but as much as we can."

"This is the only generation we can reach."

"Will Canada evangelize her share of the world?"

"The world for Christ in this generation."

On an open map of the two hemispheres showing the political divisions of the world, is printed in large letters, "Thy Kingdom Come."

The presiding officer of the convention is N. W. Rowell, an attorney of the City of Toronto, and a Methodist. He shows a striking familiarity with religious and missionary problems, and presides with a modesty and aptness that gives him an absolute grasp upon the convention that he is refreshing indeed when exhibited by a layman. After the address of welcome by the Lieutenant-Governor as mentioned above, the chairman introduced Sir Andrew Fraser, as the representative of the Layman's Missionary Movement of Scotland. Sir Andrew has just returned to his native land after thirty-seven years' service of the Crown in India, his last position there being that of Governor of Bengal. During all that time he has been a devoted churchman and is at the present time Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in India. He declared that the great need of India today is Christ, and that the Christian missionaries had done more for India than the British Government, much as that had done.

A Nation's Responsibility.

The Chairman, N. W. Rowell, spoke next on Canada's opportunity at home and abroad. He referred to Lyman Abbott as having said recently that "nature worship has given us Africa; agnosticism has given us China and pantheism has given us India; while Christianity has given us Europe and America. He declared that in Canada we had the greatest opportunity to build a Christian nation; that Canada contained but seven millions of people, while she had an area greater than that of the United States, including Alaska and had within her boundaries one-third the entire British Empire; that Dawson City was fourteen hundred miles north of Toronto and yet was farther south of Canada's northern boundary than Los Angeles was south of the northern boundary of the United States; that whatever might be said of the climate of the Dominion it was certainly not enervating; that the duty of Canadians was now, when the foundations are being laid; that they lay them upon that which is the only foundation of true civilization, Jesus Christ our Lord. This was the duty of Canada at home, abroad her interests were great, her Eastern ports were nearer Europe than those of the United States, and her Western ports were nearer Asia, and Canada must do her part to spread abroad the gospel of peace and love. He came to figures, and assuming Canada's share of the un-Christian world as forty million people, and stating that one missionary to twenty-five thousand heathen was necessary in order to evangelize the world in this generation, he argued that it would be necessary to increase Canada's missionaries on the foreign field from four hundred to sixteen hundred, which he said could be done, and to increase her foreign missionary offering from seven hundred thousand to three million two hundred thousand, basing this on a money cost per missionary, including helpers and equipment of two thousand five hundred dollars per year. In the end he computed Canada's pro rata of a world evangelization fund at four million and a half of dollars, which he said, from her nine hundred thousand communicants would be but five dollars per annum, or less than ten cents per week. Concluding he referred to the enthusiasm of the crusaders who went out from Europe in untold numbers to rescue an empty tomb, and declared that the present call was for crusaders to present to "dying men their risen and ascended Lord, not to kill but to make alive; to carry hope and new life to countless millions who sit in darkness."

In closing he said "the proposition which, as President of this Congress, it is my privilege to present to you is this 'Will Canada evangelize her share of the world and will she undertake this work now?'"

Canadian Audiences Responsive.

The reception accorded this address was hearty in the extreme. Somewhere I have read that British audiences were stolid. Nothing to it certainly, if this was a sample. These strong visaged men caught every shade of meaning. They chuckled at every bit of dry Scotch humor, they laughed at every joke, and they applauded every ringing period, the applause for President Rowell's address lasting fully five minutes and breaking into another ovation as he rose to introduce Robert E. Speer, who was to speak on the world's debt to the missionary. I take it that it will be unnecessary to review Speer's address. You know what he would say in the main. Enough that he was at his very best, and sufficient to call attention to two things that he emphasized as growing out of the missionary propaganda. The first of these was Church Union. He declared that the most vital force moving for church union today in the world was on the foreign field and declared that the day would speedily come when the party names of denominational Christendom would be absolutely unknown in foreign fields. This sentiment provoked hearty and long continued applause. He further affirmed that the missionary was a force for world unity; that he, among all God's workmen was moving mightily to teach the world Paul's great affirmation that God had made of one blood every nation under heaven.

Canadian Leadership in Church Union.

In concluding the report of the opening session a few reflections occurred to me. One is the position of leadership which these Canadians frankly assume in their pleas for Christian union, only "Church Union" is the phrase used. They proudly point to the coalition already working out here between Methodists, Congregationalists and Presbyterians, and President Rowell stirred his audience to a vast pitch of enthusiasm when he declared that "God has used the Romans to teach the world law, Greece to teach it art, the Hebrews to teach it religion, and perhaps in his good providence was to use Canada to teach the world church union." These Canadians evince a very kindly feeling towards the United States, but are intensely patriotic and proud of Canada, her accomplishments and her prospects; believing that she has a high mission to the whole Christian world. They are loudly loyal to all things British but most of all do they make patent in these sessions a deep reverence for Christ.

One thing more let me tell you. Last night I heard four thousand men join in the Lord's Prayer. Brethren, when ye pray, say "Our Father who art in Heaven."

ISN'T IT TRUE?

Mrs. Baker: "George is going off to get strong. I think he ought to stay a fortnight, but he says no, only half that time."

Friend: "You're right, of course. Seven days only makes one weak."—Lippincott's.

The Mournful Procession

By E. B. Barnes

Nothing tends to disturb the work of the congregation so much as the mournful procession of pastors, coming and going. Often the pulpit is vacant for months; the people are distracted; trial sermons make confusion worse confounded, and the congregation in despair, at last, takes a leap into the dark and engages a man whom they have never heard, in a hope of uniting those who were broken on the wheel of trial sermons. It is really wonderful, when we have in mind the frequent changes of pastors, that the congregations ever get down to business; they have been on the verge of ruin from inactivity, if from no other cause, and when they get back to the sure and certain ground of prosperous days, it is little short of marvelous that they can gather up the fragments that remain, and give the work the appearance of seriousness and sincerity. When the new pastor comes feuds are buried; the people seem anxious to make up for lost time, and to pay a tardy penance, perhaps, for their coldness during the closing months of the former pastor's administration. All looks promising for a good work, when lo! a cloud appears on the horizon; some one is offended; the number grows to two and three through sympathy; the edge of the dissolving day makes its appearance, and in a short time, the pulpit is declared vacant. The song is sung over and over again with variations; the church loses the esteem of the community, having come to be looked upon as a hard crowd to please; even the leaders of the congregation grow discouraged, and feel that theirs is one of the hardest fields in the state, and soon the fires burn low. If we had our way, we should supply some churches with preachers in car-load lots; otherwise, the pulpit will be vacant most of the time. It is ten thousand pities that the path to so many of our pulpits is worn bare by the passing of many feet.

Changes Not Due to Form of Polity.

What can be done? Very little, except to offer a suggestion or two; for as long as we are human, these conditions are likely to prevail. There are two sides to the question, and the problem is always complicated. There are pulpit changes which should be regarded as equivalent to an ingathering; there are others which are little short of a calamity to all concerned. Forms of church government avail little; even the Bishops are sighing for the days when unstable ministries and all their problems shall pass into other hands. Our congregational anarchy is to blame to some extent, but the strong hand of a centralized power is as inadequate in solving the problem as are pastors or boards. Matters could be helped if all the parties were more tolerant toward each other; if all would work for the upbuilding of the Master's cause; if the lust for ruling would give way to the passion for serving; if eccentricities would not be allowed to interfere with the carrying out of a worthy program; if the preacher did his best through the week, and prepared sermons that would inspire and bless; if the people came together as those who really hungered for the Living Bread and were determined not to go away without being satisfied, I am sure that churches that are now fruitful in pulpit changes would be fruitful in every good work, and the saving of souls. Let us as preachers bear in mind that no inspiration of the moment can atone for the lack of preparation through the week. The sermon is the great power of God in the Protestant pulpit. "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." And with the work of the pulpit supplemented by wise and consecrated effort, there would come a great dearth in the demand for the peripatetic preacher.

People Must Be Trained to Support Pastor.

The people must learn that the efforts of the pastor must be seconded by them in every way; they are the lights in their congregation to lighten their particular community; they must find it a joy to give body to the pastor's words, to cheer and encourage him while living, and they will have no trouble to keep his memory green when his voice is heard no more. That spirit would quiet the restless in every congregation; for there are those who pine for the sound of a new voice, and the sight of a strange preacher in the pulpit sends them into spasms of delight. They soon weary of the tried and the known, and are ready to plunge after the unknown. These are the sermon tasters with infinite faculties for sampling. Beware of them! Covet the friendship of the taster that blesses one with a fine discrimination; but the class who have dipped into sermons, until the dipping has become a disease, are the foes of the pulpit that would build for itself a loving monument of faithful service. As preachers, we must take the compliments and the criticisms with care, remembering the character of the critic and the spirit of the approval, distributing to our heart and mind a just proportion of both in due season. "Who said that you preached a beautiful sermon today," said the Bishop to his curate. "My sweetheart," was the reply. "Believe nothing that your sweetheart says about a sermon until she becomes your wife; then believe everything," was the Bishop's rejoinder.

Family Ideal Should Obtain in Church.

It would be well for pastor and people if we could bring ourselves to an ideal of fellowship such as the family relation. There the best construction is put on one's failings; there the mantle of love is always in evidence, and the skeleton closets are securely locked. There no capital is made of doctrinal or moral slips; we are ready to forgive and to forget. In the family, we have learned that its welfare depends upon loving and loyal partnership; the good of one being the good of all. We vie with each other in our efforts to make each other happy; we throw the windows of our souls open to let in the beautiful sunlight that dawns in the home with each new day to flood our souls, and wish that we had room for more. We all sorrow when a cloud appears. There in honor we prefer one another. There we cultivate the melody of speech; we know nothing of barbed-wire language. We have reserved that to tell of the loving kindness of God, and to explain his ways with the children of men. Ah me! from what heights we have fallen. How many pastors could relate experiences which suggested that maybe the church was presided over by the devil. Nay, brethren, that cannot be. But we can all cultivate the spirit of Him who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many. That weary procession of pastors, those vacant and restless pulpits are protests against the infirmities of the flesh, and some day we shall find the whole church on its knees in special sessions of prayer, that God may bless the pastor and his work, and the pastor will be so refreshed by such an occasion that he will be compelled to say, "Surely, God was here and I knew it not; this is none other than the house of God and the gate of heaven."

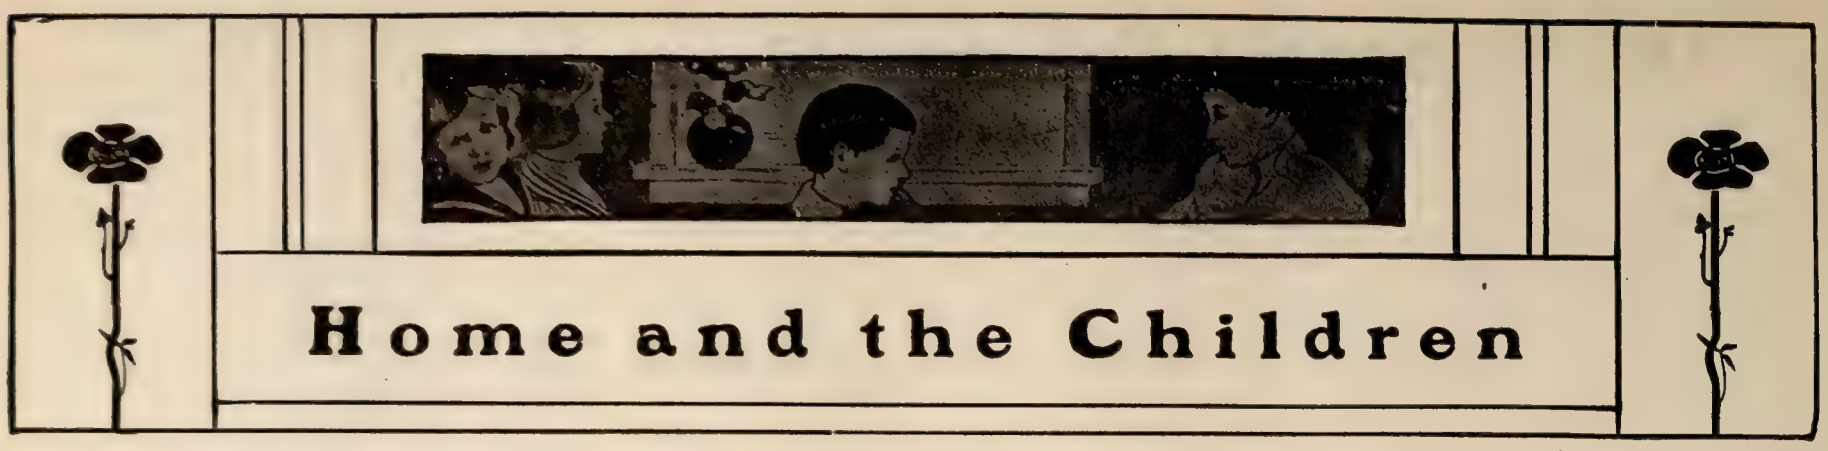
BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

Are you acquainted with the book called "The Aquarian Gospel of Jesus, the Christ"? If so, what do you think of it? Is its story of the early life of Jesus authentic? E. M. P.



Chicago.

The book purports to be "the philosophic and practical basis of the religion of the aquarian age of the world" (whatever that may be) "and of the church universal, transcribed from the book of God's remembrances known as the Akashic records, by Levi." The author of this volume carefully conceals himself, but is evidently a theosophist who wishes to harmonize all the different religions, especially those of the East, around the person of Jesus. In harmony with this fanciful idea, the book contains the alleged life of our Lord from his birth to the beginning of the Christian church. The interval of the thirty years previous to his baptism is filled with imaginary journeys to India, Tibet, Persia, Assyria, Greece, and Egypt. In these narratives the wholly apocryphal stories, such as the "Gospel of Issa," are incorporated with extensive quotations from the authentic Gospels regarding the teachings of Jesus. The book follows the general lines of the Gospels with frequent excursions into theosophic doctrines wholly foreign to the spirit and purpose of our Lord. The author frequently betrays his lack of historical knowledge and in other ways shows himself to be a man of miscellaneous reading but untrained in ability to discriminate the teachings of Christianity from those of the ethnic faiths of the East. The claim made by the unnamed author of the book that it was transcribed from certain occult records is merely a device to secure some interest in a document which otherwise would be passed by as a religious romance.

My dear Dr. Willett: Permit me to present a few thoughts on Luke 6:30. Jesus does not say, Give to every one that for which he asks. He says, Give, but does not say what. Jesus said, "Every one that asketh receiveth," but he does not say that every one receiveth what he asks for. If a man asks for a stone thinking it is a loaf, or if he asks for a serpent thinking it is a fish, God will not give him the stone or the serpent, but he will give him a good gift. Giving will always follow the asking but not always, indeed not often in the terms of the asking. The teaching that some prayers are answered is most pernicious. Every prayer, every longing of the soul is heeded and answered by our Father. Nowhere does Jesus promise that God will give what men ask for. The passages that are thought to teach that are misunderstood. So then every one that asks us should receive, not always what he asks for, but a good gift. As we learn more how our Father gives, we shall know better how to give good gifts. True, the individual cannot always give the right gift to the asker; but if society were Christian it could and would give good gifts, yes, spiritual gifts to every one asking. These thoughts suggested by your comment in the last Century are submitted for your consideration. Fraternally,

H. C. Garvin.

The Greeting

I.

The sky is warm, and bright, and clear!
  Oh what a balmy day!
The birdie swings on high and sings!
  Oh what does birdie say?
"Come out, dear children, one and all!
  For see! The woods are gay!
Come out, dear children, great and small!
  Come out, come out, and play!"

II.

The snows have melted in the night,
  The cold, rough days are done;
The bursting buds are full of life,
  And promise; every one!
The winds held conference in the night,
  Appointing early dew
To softly call each flower by name,
  Assigning each its hue.
Till dainty spring, dear lovely spring
  Lauged gayly: "That will do!
For every color decks the woods,
  From crimson, pink, to blue."

III.

So drop your spelling book and slate!
  For lessons, now, can wait.
And run and greet dear early spring,
  Before it is too late!
She hastened to thee, in the night,
  At melting of the snow.
So run and greet her, one and all!
  For she will quickly go!

IV.

For ere you know, hot summer comes,
  And hides away dear spring;
And tucks her in a June-bud's heart,
  And under robin's wing.
Till on the first hot summer's day,
  When all is soft and clear,
She flits away on summer's breath,
  To leave us for a year.
So drop your studies, one and all,
  This happy, happy day!
And run and greet dear early spring,
  Before she slips away!

Ophelia M. Tracy.

A Friendly Hand

EDGAR WHITE, MACON, MO.

When necessity drives who can choose? It was hard lines that drove Dan Harricote, evangelist, writer and church organizer, to seek a position as under accountant at $10 per week. But he needed the money for his little family and would have taken the job had it been to lift boxes and roll barrels in a warehouse.

A few years back he had been ambitious, this man who was young, but with a face that carried the trouble marks of age. In his home town he was regarded as successful. The people had read his work in the magazines, and had denominated him famous. When a man once broke into the publishers' good graces, as they saw it, there need be no further worry about such dross things as money. So Harricote himself thought—once. The truth came later. The winter had been hard, and he had worked hard, but luck was, it seemed, dead set against him. Under the bitter press of the exigency his work was not measuring up to the standard, and the keen editors saw it. But their duty was inexorable. Then a number who owed him money defaulted payment. The camel's back broke under the load. He had missed his calling. A fair trial had shown that. He would be a hewer of wood and a drawer of water; begin at the bottom of something else and work up. It was with something of a sob that he reached this determination. It was like walking on the ambition of a life-time. He had hoped—Ah! with a strength of faith he dared not consider—that it was his mission to deliver a message. By the candle's glow, night after night, he had wrought under that belief. And she, his young wife, with the tender light in her soft blue eyes, had lent the powerful aid of her faith in him—the one woman of the world he wanted to be proud of him. What would she say when he came home that night and told her he had sought a job of figuring—and was glad to get it? Would she turn her head and cry? That she would be loyal, whatever he did, he knew. But he dreaded lest he shatter her ambition for him. He didn't want her to feel pity for the wreck of his hopes. It would mean the knell of confidence in his capacity to provide.

As he thought it over he saw this was the most terrible thing about the situation. But what could he do? She had to have bread and clothes. Likewise the little ones. It was no time, with the winter winds moaning across the bleak earth, to be too fastidious about what he did.

As he hurried through the storm-swept streets afoot to save carfare he dimly realized that the Irishman digging a trench to repair a bursted pipe was looking at him with interest. He nodded, and was passing on, but the Irishman had something to say and he stopped.

"Thot was a foine piece, Misther Harricote, in th' Stharloight magazine—a mighty foine piece."

"Thank you, Jim," said Harricote, recalling in an instant the "piece" to which he referred, "I'm glad you like it."

"Oi didna know yez wuz such a foine writher," said "Jim;" "me daughter Mary, th' lame one, run across it last night, an' she be afther readin' it to me. She said only a good mon could write thotaway, an' Mary—she knows."

Harricote expressed his thanks again to his Irish friend, and went on. Somehow the wind didn't cut so fiercely after that, and there was a sudden feeling of content. This testimony from the hut of the lowly was too significant to be regarded lightly. Cultured friends might praise the literary excellence of his work, and compliment his style. And yet he might be a failure. But that lame Irish girl, an invalid for years—she knew! There must be something there to evoke such appreciation. He wondered why no editor had ever thought it worth while to discuss the healing qualities of his work. Had they done so he might have been encouraged to strive for higher results. He couldn't recall

RICHARD W. GENTRY, PREACHER

The Dusty Feet

"The Dusty Feet! The Dusty Feet!" This is what the boys and girls used to cry when the traveling merchants came to town. For in those days people didn't have stores with windows full of pretty things to see. But in the autumn time when "the frost was on the pumpkin and the fodder in the shock" it was fair time, and here came the merchants with boots and buckles and trinkets and toys, bringing them to the fair. Now they didn't have railroads and automobiles in those days either, and so the merchants came on horseback and on foot, tired and dusty from the road. Hence it was that the people called them "Dusty Feet."

And people will give names to you and me to suit our looks too. That is why some folks are called, "good fellows," "Merry Sunshine," and "Sunny Jim," while others are called, "Cross Patch," "Sleepy Head," and "Know Nothing." We must watch out for dusty faces and dusty feet, or people will begin to call us, "Touseled Haired Tommy," or "Dirty Face Dickey," or "Rag Tag Ruthie." That is one reason why tramps all have nick-names. They do not use soap. And when people meet us and say, "Good morning, have you used Pear's Soap?" they may be just saying in a polite way, "Your face doesn't look quite clean to me."

If we do not want the wrong kind of names we must have a clean face and body. And if we do want the right kind of names we must have a clean heart. But to have clean hearts we must say our prayers. "Cleanliness is next to Godliness." Let us, you and I, say that we will have them both. Then no one will have to ask us if we have used soap. Our faces and hands will show it in their fresh clean look. And no one will have to ask us if we have said our prayers. For it will shine out of our eyes, and our faces will have the look that Stephen's wore when "all those that sat in the council fastening their eyes upon him saw his face as if it had been the face of an angel."

one who had written him a kindly letter about the probable effect of his offerings. They had either taken and paid for them without remark, or returned them to him. How was he to know whether he was succeeding or failing? The observation of the invalid Mary was the first that had reached him from an absolutely unbiased source. It looked like an admonition to keep on. She couldn't be mistaken. Her judgment was unassailable on the point really worth considering. He had helped her and he knew the world had many such unfortunates as she. But it was safer to take the "figuring job"—that was sure. Writing was only a game after all, and you could never tell. Provisions cost real money, and the house-owner had no confidence in a "literary gent" with great expectations. Ah!—here was the big factory where he was to call at nine. By the clock on a tower he saw that he was fifteen minutes ahead of that hour.

"Only a good mon could write thotaway."

That's what Mary said, and she wouldn't have said it unless she knew.

"Here's yer mornin' Telegram!"

A muffled-up lad with laden arm made the announcement as he shuffled along the snowy street.

"The Morning Telegram!" His eyes traveled to the corner of the block where stood the great steel structure which was the home of the paper.

"Only a good mon could write thotaway."

The insistent voice repeated the words over and over. He wasn't quite due at the factory. It wouldn't take but a few minutes, and he would be no worse if he lost.

"Just at present every department is full," said the managing editor of the Telegram, not unkindly, "and we have a world of applications ahead." Then he added, with a friendly smile: "Never saw so many people anxious to break into literature."

"Perhaps you wouldn't mind listing me as an applicant, and I can wait my turn with the balance," suggested the caller.

"Of course, glad to do it," said the editor, pulling some paper toward him.

"Daniel Harricote."

"What?"

Harricote repeated his name.

"Did you write that sketch about 'The Children of the Poor' in the 'Starlight' of December?"

"Yes, sir."

"Here, sit down a minute, Mr. Harricote."

The editor went quickly through the private door, and was gone something like fifteen minutes. When he returned he was accompanied by a tall, fine-looking old gentleman whom he introduced as the proprietor of the paper.

"Mr. Harricote," said the editor, "I'm very glad you called. We've been considering a literary department on the Telegram for some time, and we're inclined to think you're the man to take charge of it. The duty will be to pass upon literary contributions, to get up two or three of your own each week and to pass upon the better quality of books submitted for review. You see, the position will be important and keep you very busy. The salary on the start will be $30 a week, with the assurance that it will be speedily raised if you prove to be the man I think you are. As to instructions about your work, I will simply say that we approve your philosophy as expressed in 'The Children of the Poor.'"

In a thatched cottage down the river bluff a brawny Irishman, his stout wife and lame daughter were gazing with delighted eyes upon the revealment of divers packages and boxes just left by the expressman. There were beautiful hothouse flowers, some dainty handkerchiefs and scarfs for Mary, warm gloves, shirts and socks for Jim and bright, serviceable dress goods, aprons and waists for "Mrs. Jim."

Mary's bright eyes danced with excited pleasure as she hobbled about the table examining the treasures.

"Ain't they good," she said, holding up the card that came with the presents, "but I wonder how they happened to think of us?"

"Whin Oi told 'im wat yez said about his sthory," explained Jim, "he smiled loike a mon does whin yez holds out a frien'ly hand.—The Advance.

Woman Suffrage Victory in Chicago

Woman suffragists of Chicago are rejoicing because of the great victory which they won in the charter convention Saturday, March 13. The convention, after a short debate, by a vote of 20 to 12, adopted the plank which provides for municipal woman suffrage. The question now goes to the State Legislature, and the suffragists will maintain a lobby at Springfield and go to the capital from Chicago and other parts of the state in full force when a hearing is granted on the measure. This municipal suffrage campaign has been admirably conducted, and has been of immense educational value. It has been supported by women representing the best thought of the city, prominent among whom are Jane Addams, Mrs. Charles Henrotin, Mrs. Catharine Waugh McCulloch and Mrs. Ella S. Stewart. Mrs. Stewart is the president of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association, an officer in the National American Woman Suffrage Association and the treasurer of the Woman's Municipal Campaign Committee. It is she who has raised the funds to carry on this work. Mrs. Stewart was also the most influential factor in the organization of the Men's League for Woman suffrage recently launched in Chicago and officered by some of the best known political reformers in the city. She is the wife of Oliver W. Stewart and with her husband, a member of the Hyde Park church of Disciples.

The Best Way to Do Work That Is Drudgery

Stewart Edward White has an interesting trick of weaving into his stories little moral lessons that "grown-ups" as well as boys would do well to profit by. No better instance of this is the following incident which is included in his story of "The Marshes" published in the American Magazine for April:

"Mr. Kincaid laid aside his gun and picked up the punt-pole.

"'Mustn't shoot much after sundown,' he told Bobby; 'if we do, there won't be any here in the morning. Nothing drives the duck off the marshes quicker than evening shooting.'

"He pushed the duck-boat out into the open. Instantly the weight of the wind became evident. Although on the lee side of the pond, the light boat drifted forward rapidly, and Bobby had to snatch suddenly for his cap. Mr. Kincaid snubbed her at the edge of the flock of decoys.

"'Pick 'em up,' said he. 'You'll have to do it, while I hold the boat.'

"Bobby lifted the nearest decoy out of the water, and, under direction, wound the anchor-line around its neck, and stowed it away. This was easy. Also the next and the next.

"But by the time he had lifted the tenth he had discovered a number of things: that a wooden decoy is heavy to lift at arm's length over the gunwale; that it brings with it considerable water; that the anchor-lines carry with them a surprisingly greater quantity of water; that the water is very cold; that said cold water causes the flesh to puff up, the hands to turn numb, and the fingers to ache. This was disagreeable; and Bobby had not been in the habit of continuing to do things after they had become disagreeable.

"'My! but this is awful cold work,' said he.

"Mr. Kincaid looked at him.

"'You aren't going to quit, are you?' he asked.

Bobby had not thought of it with this definiteness.

"When the issue was thus squarely presented to him, his replay, of course, was in the negative. But the night got darker and darker; the decoys heavier and heavier; the water colder and colder. Little by little the glory of the day was draining away. Mr. Kincaid, leaning strongly against the punt-pole, watched him for some time in silence.

"'Pretty hard work?' he inquired at last.

"'Yes, sir,' said Bobby miserably.

"'Why is it hard?'

"Bobby looked up in surprise.

"'Because the water is so cold, and the decoys are hard to lift over the edge,' he answered presently.

"'No, it's not that,' said Mr. Kincaid. 'It's because you're thinking about how many more there are to do.'

"Bobby stopped work in the interest of this idea.

"'If you're going to be a hunter—or anything else,' went on Mr. Kincaid after a moment, 'you're going to have lots of cold work, and hard work, and disagreeable work to do—things that you can't finish in a minute, either, but that may last all day—or all the week. And you'll have to do it. If you get to thinking of how long it's going to take, you'll find that you will have a tough time, and that probably it won't be done very well, either. Don't think of how much there is still to do; think of how much you have done. Then it'll surprise you how soon it will be finished.'"

In Memoriam

A radiant seraph is the angel Death,
And yet to mortal vision he denies
The glory of his presence. Oft-times sighs
The weary heart to feel his soothing breath,
But this he must withhold.

Yet his immortal grace we sometimes feel
When wistful gazing o'er the sunlit snows;
Or charmed no more by summer's dewy rose,
A calm celestial o'er the pulses steal,
And passions cease to thrill.

In moments when the spirits searching gaze,
Shall turn to read its own beatitudes;
Forsakes the paths of anxious multitudes,
And in the silence, penetrates the maze,
That vails the love of God.

Then on the soul is poured the vision bright
Of Christ asleep in Joseph's sculptured tomb,
And yon bright seraph in the transcient gloom
Unbinds his cearments in the waxing light
Of love's victorious morn.

Ah! then the angel comes with touch of balm,
And to our eyes doth give immortal sight;
Yet vails his presence in the effulgant light,
That beams from realms of celestial calm,
Those mansions of the blest.

And ofttimes to the couch of mortal pain,
He will reveal the secret of his peace;
"I am content for days on earth to cease,"
And so the weary soul turns home again,
Rejoicing in his grace.

Dear angel, strong in mystery and power,
No fear of thee the spirit doth oppress,
For love hath taught us evermore to bless
Thy matchless beauty, and the mystic hour
When thou shalt call us home.

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XI.

Maud Barrington's Promise.

Daylight had barely broken across the prairie when, floundering through a foot of dusty snow, Winston reached the Grange. He was aching from fatigue and cold, and the deerskin jacket stood out from his numbed body stiff with frost, when, leaning heavily on a table, he awaited Colonel Barrington. The latter, on entering, stared at him, and then flung open a cupboard and placed food before him.

"Eat before you talk. You look half-dead," he said.

Winston shook his head. "Perhaps you had better hear me first."

Then he fixed his eyes upon his host as he told his story. Barrington stood very straight watching his visitor, but his face was drawn, for the resolution which supported him through the day was less noticeable in the early morning, and it was evident now at least that he was an old man carrying a heavy load of anxiety. Still, as the story proceeded, a little blood crept into his cheeks, while Winston guessed that he found it difficult to retain his grim immobility.

"I am to understand that an attempt to reach the Grange through the snow would have been perilous?" he said.

"Yes," said Winston quietly.

The older man stood very still regarding him intently, until he said, "I don't mind admitting that it was distinctly regrettable!"

Winston stopped him with a gesture. "It was at least unavoidable sir. The team would not face the snow, and no one could have reached the Grange alive."

"No doubt you did your best—and, as a connection of the family, I am glad it was you. Still—and there are cases in which it is desirable to speak plainly—the affair, which you will, of course, dismiss from your recollection, is to be considered closed now."

Winston smiled, and a trace of irony he could not repress was just discernible in his voice. "I scarcely think that was necessary, sir. It is, of course, sufficient for me to have rendered a small service to the distinguished family which has given me an opportunity of proving my right to recognition, and neither you, nor Miss Barrington, need have any apprehension that I will presume upon it!"

Barrington wheeled round. "You have the Courthorne temper, at least, and perhaps I deserved this display of it. You acted with commendable discretion in coming straight to me—and the astonishment I got drove the other aspect of the question out of my head. If it hadn't been for you, my niece would have frozen."

"I'm afraid I spoke unguardedly, sir, but I am very tired. Still, if you will wait a few minutes, I will get the horses out without troubling the hired man."

Barrington made a little gesture of comprehension, and then shook his head. "You are fit for nothing further, and need rest and sleep."

"You will want somebody, sir," said Winston. "The snow is very loose and deep."

He went out, and Barrington, who looked after him with a curious expression in his face, nodded twice as if in approval. Twenty minutes later, he took his place in the sleigh that slid away from the Grange, which lay a league behind it when the sunrise flamed across the prairie. The wind had gone, and there was only a pitiless brightness and a devastating cold, while the snow lay blown in wisps, dried dusty and fine as flower by the frost. It had no cohesion, the runners sank in it, and Winston was almost waist-deep when he dragged the floundering team through the drifts. A day had passed since he had eaten anything worth mention, but he held on with an endurance which his companion, who was incapable of rendering him assistance, wondered at. There were bits of deep snow the almost buried sleigh must be dragged through, and tracts from which the wind had swept the dust covering, leaving bare the grasses the runners would not slide over, where the team came to a standstill, and could scarcely be urged to continue the struggle.

At last, however, the loghouse rose, a lonely mound of whiteness, out of the prairie, and Winston drew in a deep breath of contentment when a dusky figure appeared for a moment in the doorway. His weariness seemed to fall from him, and once more his companion wondered at the tirelessness of the man, as floundering on foot beside them he urged the team through the powdery drifts beneath the big birch bluff. Winston did not go in, however, when they reached the house, and when, five minutes later, Maud Barrington came out, she saw him leaning with a drawn face very wearily against the sleigh. He straightened himself suddenly at the sight of her, but she had sufficient, and her heart softened towards him. Whatever the man's history had been he had borne a good deal for her.

The return journey was even more arduous, and now and then Maud Barrington felt a curious throb of pity for the worn-out man, who during most of it walked beside the team; but it was accomplished at last, and she contrived means of thanking him alone when they reached the Grange.

Winston shook his head, and then smiled a little. "It isn't nice to make a bargain," he said. "Still, it is less pleasant now and then to feel under an obligation, though there is no reason why you should."

Maud Barrington was not altogether pleased, but she could not bind herself to facts, and it was plain that there was an obligation. "I am afraid I cannot quite believe that, but I do not see what you are leading to."

Winston's eyes twinkled. "Well," he said reflectively, "I don't want you to fancy that last night commits you to any line of conduct in regard to me. I only asked for a truce, you see."

Maud Barrington was a trifle nettled. "Yes?" she said.

"Then, I want to show you how you can discharge any trifling obligation you may fancy you may owe me, which of course would be more pleasant to you. Do not allow your uncle to sell any wheat forward for you, and persuade him to sow every acre that belongs to you this spring."

"But however would this benefit you?" asked the girl.

Winston laughed. "I have a fancy that I can straighten up things at Silverdale, if I can get my way. It would please me, and I believe they want it. Of course a desire to improve anything appears curious in me!"

Maud Barrington was relieved of the necessity of answering, for the Colonel came up just then, but, moved by some sudden impulse, she nodded as if in agreement.

It was afternoon when she awakened from a refreshing sleep, and descending to the room set apart for herself and her aunt, sat thoughtfully still a while in a chair beside the stove. Then, stretching out her hand, she took up a little case of photographs and slipped out one of them. It was a portrait of a boy and a pony, but there was a significance in the fact that she knew just where to find it. The picture was a good one, and once more Maud Barrington noticed the arrogance, which did not, however, seem out of place there in the lad's face. It was also a comely face, but there was a hint of sensuality in it that marred its beauty. Then with a growing perplexity she compared it with that of the weary man who had plodded beside the team. Winston was not arrogant, but resolute, and there was no stamp of indulgence in his face. Indeed, the girl had from the beginning recognized the virility in it that was tinged with asceticism and sprang from a simple strenuous life of toil in the wind and sun.

Just then there was a rustle of fabric, and she laid down the photograph a moment too late, as her aunt came in. As it happened, the elder lady's eyes rested on the picture, and a faint flush of annoyance crept into the face of the girl. It was scarcely perceptible, but Miss Barrington saw it, and though she felt tempted, did not smile.

"I did not know you were down," she said. "Lance is still asleep. He seemed very tired."

"Yes," said the girl. "That is very probable. He left the railroad before daylight, and had driven round to several farms before he came to Macdonald's, and he was very considerate. He made me take all the furs, and, I fancy, walked up and down all night long, with nothing on but his indoor clothing, though the wind went through the building, and one could scarcely keep alive a few feet from the stove."

Again the faint flicker of color crept into the girl's cheek, and the eyes that were keen as well as gentle noticed it.

"I think you owe him a good deal," said Miss Barrington.

"Yes," said her niece, with a little laugh which appeared to imply a trace of resentment. "I believe I do, but he seemed unusually anxious to relieve me of that impression. He was also good enough to hint that nothing he might have done need prevent me being—the right word is a trifle too difficult to find—but I fancy he meant unpleasant to him if I wished it."

There was a little twinkle in Miss Barrington's eyes. "Are you not a trifle hard to please, my dear? Now, if he had attempted to insist on a claim to your gratitude you would have resented it."

"Of course," said the girl reflectively. "Still, it is annoying to be debarred from offering it. There are times, aunt, when I can't help wishing that Lance Courthorne had never come to Silverdale. There are men who leave nothing just as they found it, and whom one can't ignore."

Miss Barrington shook her head. "I fancy you are wrong. He has offended, after all?"

She was pleased to see her niece's face relax into a smile that expressed unconcern. "We are all exacting now and then," said the girl. "Still, he made me promise to give him a fair trial, which was not flattering, because it suggested that I had been unnecessarily harsh, and then hinted this morning that he had no intention of holding me to it. It really was not gratifying to find he held the concession he asked for of so small account. You are, however, as easily swayed by trifles as I am, because Lance can do no wrong since he kissed your hand."

"I really think I liked him the better for it," said the little silver-haired lady. "The respect was not assumed, but wholly genuine, you see, and whether I was entitled to it or not, it was a good deal in Lance's favor that he should offer it to me. There must be some good in the man who can be moved to reverence anything, even if he is mistaken."

"No man with any sense could help adoring you," said Maud Barrington. "Still, I wonder why you believe I was wrong in wishing he had not come to Silverdale?"

Miss Barrington looked thoughtful. "I will tell you, my dear. There are few better men than my brother, but his thoughts and the traditions he is bound by, are those of fifty years ago, while the restless life of the prairie is a thing of to-day. We have fallen too far behind it at Silverdale, and a crisis is coming that none of us are prepared for. Even Dane is scarcely fitted to help my brother to face it, and the rest are either over-fond of their pleasure or untrained boys. Brave lads they are, but none of them have been taught that it is only by mental strain, or the ceaseless toil of the body, the man without an inheritance can win himself a competence now. This is why they want a leader who has known hardship and hunger, instead of ease, and won what he holds with his own hand in place of having it given him."

"You fancy we could find one in such a man as Lance has been?"

Miss Barrington looked grave. "I believe the prodigal was afterwards a better as well as a wiser man than the one who stayed at home, and I am not quite sure that Lance's history is so nearly like that of the son in the parable as we have believed it to be. A have looked for it."

The eyes of the two women met, and, although nothing more was said, each realized that the other was perplexed by the same question, while the girl was astonished to find her vague suspicions shared. While they sat silent, Colonel Barrington came in.

"I am glad to see you looking so much better, Maud," he said, with a trace of embarrassment. "Courthorne is still resting. Now, I can't help feeling that we have been a trifle more distant than was needful with him. The man has really behaved very discreetly. I mean in everything."

This was a great admission, and Miss Barrington smiled. "Did it hurt you very much to tell us that?" she asked.

The Colonel laughed. "I know what you mean, and if you put me on my mettle, I'll retract. After all, it was no great credit to him, because blood will tell, and he is, of course, a Courthorne."

Almost without her intention, Maud Barrington's eyes wandered towards the photograph, and then looking up she met those of her aunt, and once more saw the thought that troubled her in them.

"The Courthorne blood is responsible for a good deal more than discretion," said Mrs. Barrington, who went out quietly.

Her brother appeared a trifle perplexed. "Now, I fancied your aunt had taken him under her wing, and when I was about to suggest that, considering the connection between the families, we might ask him over to dinner occasionally, she goes away," he said.

The girl looked down a moment, for realizing that her uncle recognized the obligation he was under to the man he did not like, she remembered that she herself owed him considerably more, and he had asked for something in return. It was not altogether easy to grant, but she had tacitly pledged herself, and turning suddenly she laid a hand on Barrington's arm.

"Of course, but I want to talk of something else just now," she said. "You know I have very seldom asked you questions about my affairs, but I wish to take a little practical interest in them this year."

"Yes?" said Barrington, with a smile. "Well, I am at your service, my dear, and quite ready to account for my stewardship. You are no longer my ward, except by your own wishes."

"I am still your niece," said the girl, patting his arm. "Now, there is, of course, nobody who could manage the farming better than you do, but I would like to raise a large crop of wheat this season."

"It wouldn't pay," and the Colonel grew suddenly grave. Very few men in the district are going to sow all their holding. Wheat is steadily going down."

"Then if nobody sows there will be very little, and shouldn't that put up the prices?"

Barrington's eyes twinkled. "Who has been teaching you commercial economy? You are too pretty to understand such things, and the argument is fallacious, because the wheat is consumed in Europe; and even if we have not much to offer, they can get plenty from California, Chile, India, and Australia.

"Oh, yes—and Russia," said the girl. "Still, you see, the big mills in Winnipeg and Minneapolis depend upon the prairie. They couldn't very well bring wheat in from Australia."

Barrington was still smiling with his eyes, but his lips were set. "A little knowledge is dangerous, my dear, and if you could understand me better, I could show you where you were wrong. As it is I can only tell you that I have decided to sell wheat forward and plow very little."

"But that was a policy you condemned with your usual vigor. You really know you did."

"My dear," said the Colonel, with a little impatient gesture, "one can never argue with a lady. You see—circumstances alter cases considerably."

He nodded with an air of wisdom as though that decided it, but the girl persisted. "Uncle," she said, drawing closer to him with lithe gracefulness, "I want you to let me have my own way just for once, and if I am wrong, I will never do anything you do not approve of again. After all, it is a very little thing, and you would like to please me."

"It is a trifle that is likely to cost you a good deal of money," said the Colonel dryly.

"I think I could afford it, and you could not refuse me."

"As I am only your uncle, and no longer a trustee, I could not," said Barrington. "Still, you would not act against my wishes?"

His eyes were gentle, unusually so, for he was not as a rule very patient when any one questioned his will, but there was a reproach in them that hurt the girl. Still, because she had promised, she persisted.

"No," she said. "That is why it would be ever so much nicer if you would just think as I did."

Barrington looked at her steadily. "If you insist, I can at least hope for the best," he said, with a gravity that brought a faint color to the listener's cheek.

It was next day when Winston took his leave, and Maud Barrington stood beside him, as he put on his driving furs.

"You told me there was something you wished me to do, and, though it was difficult, it is done," she said. "My holding will be sown with wheat this spring."

Winston turned his head aside a moment, and apparently found it needful to fumble at the fastenings of the furs, while there was a

"Then," he said, with a little smile, "we are quits. That cancels any little obligation which may have existed."

He had gone in another minute, and Maud Barrington turned back into the stove-warmed room very quietly. Her lips were, however, somewhat closely set.

Summary of Anti-Saloon Work in Congress

The general growth of temperance sentiment and the increasing strength of the State Anti-Saloon League organizations made the recent short session of Congress most fruitful. In addition to certain measures originally promoted by the Anti-Saloon League, such as prohibition of the canteen in Soldiers' Homes and the appropriation (increased this year) for the enforcement of liquor laws among the Indians, which went through this time without special effort, the Legislative Department of the National Anti-Saloon League reparts the following specific things, showing the enactment of one important measure, the defeat of one highly dangerous bill and much valuable general preparation for the future:

1. The selection of Hon. James M. Miller of Kansas as the new congressional leader of the Anti-Saloon forces.

2. The reorganization of Anti-Saloon League affairs in the District of Columbia so that the National League directly represents the churches of the District, thereby practically assuring legislation for the District next time.

3. The defeat of the bill for a commission to investigate the liquor traffic, which, while ostensibly a temperance measure was to be used by the liquor interests as an excuse for delaying further temperance legislation in Congress and the various states until the commission reported.

4. The incorporation into the Penal Code of the United States of an inter-state liquor shipment amendment which prohibits C. O. D. shipments and delivery to fictitious consignees, and requires packages of liquor to be so branded as to show the contents, which is a marked step in advance and recognizes the principle that the federal government should use its power to help the states in the enforcement of their own laws.

5. Finally, the preparation and introduction of the League's own inter-state shipment bill which prohibits shipments from outside the state where such shipments cannot legally be made from a point within the state thereby obviating constitutional objections.

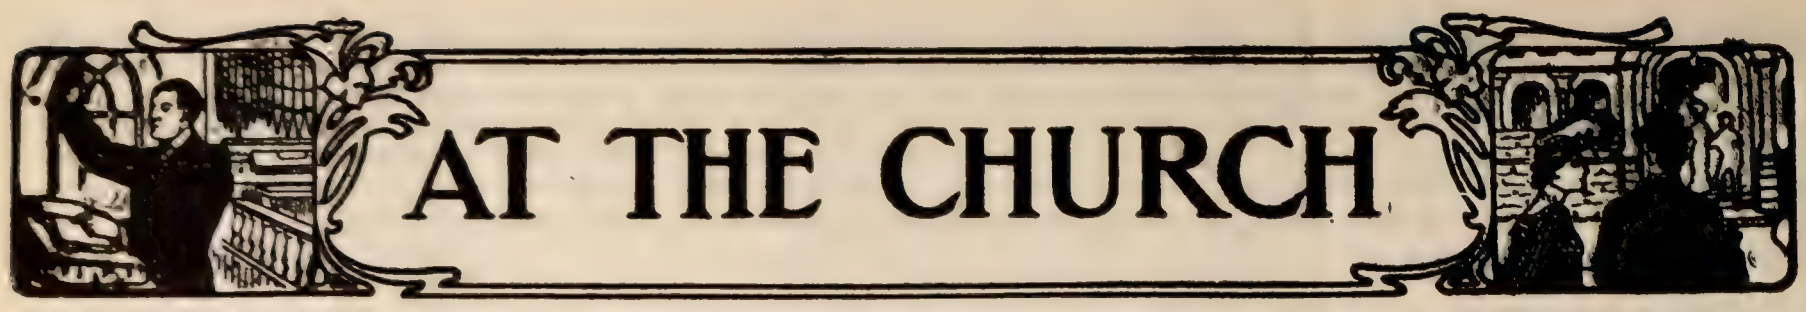
Lincoln



John Vance Cheney in the Atlantic.

Earth held to him. The rough-hewn form,
Looming through that unnatural storm,
Hinted the rude, mixed mould
Ere chaos loosed her hold;

A lone, wind-beaten hilltop tree,
His that pathetic majesty;
Forlorn even in his mirth,
His roots deep in the earth.

Earth's is he yet. When from the hill
The warm gold flows, and hollows fill,
The sunlight shines his fame,
The winds blaze Lincoln's name.

Ay, Earth's he is; not hers alone.
Blood of our blood, bone of our bone,
Love folded him to rest
Upon a people's breast.

The New Capital and the New Name*

Christianity had three capitals during the first century of its history. The first was Jerusalem, where the Jewish phase of the gospel was proclaimed; the second was Antioch, where the problem of the admission of Gentiles to the church was faced in its first application to church life; and the third was Ephesus, where the broader problems of world evangelism occupied the attention of the apostles Paul and John in the closing period of the first century. Three apostles are directly identified with these two capitals of early Christianity: Peter with Jerusalem, Paul with Antioch, and John with Ephesus. In a very true sense, therefore, Antioch was the second strategic point in the progress of the Christian faith, and its relation to the work of the Apostle Paul as a base of supplies and a point of departure renders it deeply interesting to the student of Christian origins.

Antioch.

Antioch was situated on the river Orontes, about one hundred and twenty stadia from the Mediterranean. It was founded by Seleucus Nikator, one of Alexander's generals, at the breaking up of the Macedonian Empire about 330 B. C. It was an important political and military center in the apostolic age and was the recipient of important favors both from its own kings of Syria and from those of Jerusalem. Herod the Great made important contributions to its beauty to secure the favor of its citizens. Josephus described its wealth and importance with enthusiasm, and readers of "Ben Hur" will remember the description of the city and the neighboring Grove of Daphne.

The Refugees.

The persecution of disciples in Jerusalem during the period previous to Saul's conversion had scattered the friends of Jesus in all directions. Many of them had gone northward, and their residence in the Phœnician cities, Tyre and Sidon, and in Cyprus, and even as far as Antioch, had resulted in the establishing of churches in these cities. As has been noticed hitherto, these unofficial evangelists felt a natural hesitance in preaching to any but their Jewish brethren. But presently this sense of reserve was forgotten in the passion of the missionary spirit and they openly preached the gospel to the Greeks, as well as to Hellenists or Jews of the dispersion and to their own countrymen. Whether this change of policy took place before or after Peter's admission of the Gentiles at Cæsarea, we do not know. It was probably in harmony with the broadening spirit of the community of believers in the face of such wonderful opportunities.

Delegate From Jerusalem.

When news came to the leaders of the church in Jerusalem that a group of disciples had been formed in Antioch, they felt it wise to send a delegation to report upon the character of the work and its prospects. This had been done already in the care of the Samaritan evangel of Philip (Acts 8.) On that occasion Peter and John were the delegates; now Barnabas was sent, a man who was highly esteemed as a member of the Jerusalem church. He was a native of the Island of Cyprus, who had distinguished himself not only by his piety and activity, but also by his gifts to the cause (Acts 5.) This good man came to Antioch and looked over the field. He found that the situation was most promising and conditions were in every way satisfactory thus far. Jews and Gentiles lived on terms of perfect equality in this church, the first instance of such a condition. His own influence upon the new church was salutary, and though there were men of gifts in the congregation, Barnabas was recognized as leader in its work.

Need of a New Leader.

However, he was not wholly satisfied with the work that was being done. It seemed to him that wider possibilities lay before the young church. What was needed was the kind of leadership which could organize an aggressive campaign not only for Antioch itself, but for that great Gentile world of which it was in some sense a representative. No such leader was at hand. It might have seemed natural for Barnabas to think of Peter, who had already been so active and prominent in the first years of the faith. Peter's consecration and courage could not be questioned. Was he not the appropriate man for this new phase of the work? Perhaps the very fact that his leaning toward the Gentiles in the case of Cornelius had brought him somewhat under suspicion at Jerusalem would have been the very reason why he could fulfil the duties of this new task with greater success. Probably if human judgment and experience alone had influenced Barnabas, this would have been his decision.

Barnabas and Saul.

But such was not the case. There was another man who impressed him as the very one needed for the new occasion. Some seven or eight years before he had met the young Tarsan named Saul, whose recent change from radical and persecuting Judaism to fellowship with the disciples was one of the astonishing incidents in the history of the Jerusalem church. Barnabas had greatly admired this young man and had in a way stood sponsor for him when he was under suspicion in the thought of the Christian leaders in the holy city. Indeed he had saved his life on that occasion by sending him forth to Tarsus when a plot was made against him. Surely such a man would be the very one for the new occasion. Barnabas lost no time in making the journey around the northeastern point of the Mediterranean Sea to the province of Cilicia where Saul lived.

Silent Years.

Those years since Saul left Jerusalem are silent years in the history of his life. How much we should give to know what tasks had engaged his attention! To us it seems that they must have been only years of preparation and waiting for the great ministry to which he was to devote himself. Yet to him they may have seemed the fulfilment of this ministry, and perhaps he had no anticipation of further work than that which had already fallen to his hands. That he had used these years in evangelistic service seems to be clear from the fact that Barnabas did not find him at once. At least the phrase "When he had found him," is suggestive of a search through the regions about Tarsus. Moreover, when Paul and Silas set out from Antioch on the second missionary journey, we are told (Acts 15:41) that they went through Syria and Cilicia "confirming the churches." Who planted those churches in Cilicia? Probably no other than Saul himself in these unrecorded years since he and Barnabas parted.

The New Name.

When Barnabas had found Saul he easily persuaded him to return with him to Antioch. From the city of Tarsus, which plays so interesting a part in the history of antiquity and which is now the scene of a most interesting missionary enterprise in which missionaries are being trained for the entire region, he came to Antioch on the Orontes, where a year and more was spent in delightful and successful Christian work. The new leader was adapted in every way to his task. Barnabas was free to remain as his companion, and the results of their combined labors were inspiring. So notable had become the new community that it was the occasion of public remark on the streets of Antioch, and here were first heard that name "Christian" destined to become the most precious in the annals of religion. It seems not to have been adopted by the disciples themselves, but to have been hurled at them, perhaps in ridicule of their constant use of the name of their Master, the Messiah of Jewish hopes, the anointed of God, the Christ of history. The term "Christian" is used but three times in the New Testament. It seems not to have been the common name employed by the believers themselves, who spoke of each other familiarly as brethren, disciples, saints. But it is the great name which has survived as thoroughly descriptive of all who follow the Christ. The other New Testament references to it are Acts 26:28, where Agrippa laughingly says to Paul: "You would like to persuade me to be a Christian off-hand," and I. Peter 4:16, where the ill-repute of the name and the persecution to which it almost invariably led are ragarded as proofs of loyal character in the believer who bears it.

Relief Brought to Jerusalem.

Soon afterward it became evident that the church in Jerusalem was in trouble. Its members had been frequently persecuted. Many of those who survived had been impoverished by losses, the result both of the disfavor into which they had fallen and perhaps of their experiments with a common fund. Famine had fallen upon the region. It seems likely that this is the significance of the statement of Agabus, rather than a world-wide famine, to which there is no reference in the records of the time and which would have left Antioch as great a sufferer as Judea. But the disciples in the Syrian city determined to send relief to their brethren in Palestine and this they did, committing their offerings to the hands of their two most trusted leaders, Barnabas and Saul. These men made their way to Jerusalem and gave to the leaders of the church there the funds that had been gathered. They must have remained there for some time. This visit is not reported by Paul himself in his account of his journeys to Jerusalem (Galatians 1 and 2.) But perhaps he considered it as merely incidental, and it may be that it fell at the very time when he had no chance for conference with Peter who was imprisoned by Herod. The episode is concluded in the last verse of Chapter 12, where we are informed that after Barnabas and Saul had finished their embassy, they returned to Antioch taking with them John Mark, the son of Mary of Jerusalem. If, as was hinted in our study of Peter's escape from prison, the prayer meeting recorded in Acts 12 was attended by Saul and Barnabas on the eve of their departure for Antioch, we have a further reason for the vividness of that narrative and the possibility that from the very home where that prayer meeting occurred, their young companion, Mark, who was yet to be the evangelist of the second Gospel, went with them on their homeward way.

Evangelism Among the Disciples of Christ

Topic April 21. I Cor. 3:5-17.

The Disciples of Christ have made it their aim to commend themselves to the conscience of the world by the manifestation of the truth. The truth which they have felt called to manifest is contained in the holy scriptures. Wherein they have been inconsistent with the teachings of the scriptures they have been untrue to their profession of faith. But they have insisted that intelligence shall be used in the interpretation of scriptures. Their best evangelism is therefore a teaching process. The professional exhorter has never been recognized among them. Exhortation means nothing unless men have first been instructed concerning their duty. Men are bidden to rejoice in that they know God and have a disposition to do his will. It is not true that the Disciples have no use for the emotions in evangelism but they believe that emotion should exhaust itself in very definite actions which have meaning for individual and social righteousness.

Paul and Apollos.

Paul and Apollos had each his own way of testifying to the grace of God. Perhaps Apollos emphasized some things that Paul had not made prominent and said little about other things made emphatic in Paul's preaching. The Corinthians, having no adequate conception of the many-sidedness of the gospel, begin to form themselves into factions. One faction avowed that Paul had taught all the truth and another that Apollos had told everything there was to be known. Paul rebuked them for their folly and urged them to accept all the truth that came to them, whether through him, or Peter, or Apollos, or through nature and experience. His purpose was to bring men to Christ, not to gather about himself a party bearing his name and professing to represent him. Nowadays a church is said to be a one-man church. If it is not misrepresented, it accepts the gospel from one man and refuses to see any truth not preached by him. Many of its members will not come to church except when this man is to preach, and if he happens to be an evangelist they appear for worship once in two or three years. It would be hard to imagine sectarianism of a more hurtful kind than that displayed by these worshippers of the evangelist. If the evangelist delights in their homage, he is no true representative of the evangelism of the Disciples.

The Test of Fire

The evangelist and the church are in the end tested by the character of those who are persuaded by them to confess their faith. Hay and stubble may count at the close of the meeting, but they are not in evidence after a year or two. The fire of experience will reveal what sort of material has been gathered and built into the church. What are the converts doing for themselves and the church? Have they left off criticising spitefully everybody and everything? Are they honestly striving to pay the grocer and the butcher? Have they money for education, missions, and benevolences as well as for automobiles and social functions? How do they vote? Are they more concerned for the success of their party than for the defeat of wickedness? Is the home life improved so that the motto "There is no place like home" does not provoke a smile? The great evangelists among the Disciples are not indifferent to these matters of character. They suffer loss when men are converted only in name. But may not the best of evangelists forget himself at times and give too much importance to the numbers reported at the close of his meetings? Since he is human, we should not be surprised to find in him a love of success that disturbs his judgment.

The Temple of God.

Evangelism is for the purpose of building the temple of God. To the Disciple the temple of God is the body of Christian people. With him the organization is secondary. He has a wholesome fear of ecclesiasticism. His church is a democracy. If it shows signs of becoming aristocratic he protests vigorously. His faults comes from his democracy. If he follows a local ecclesiastical tyrant, it is because he thinks he is exercising his freedom. If he refuses to co-oporate with his brethern, he thinks he is resisting tyranny. So it comes to pass that he often dishonors the temple of God. He does not always come into the church with a spirit of teachableness and co-operation. A true evangelism creates reverence for the church of God and makes it difficult for people to live in ignorance of its mission.

A Morning Prayer

"O Lord, I pray;
That for this day
I may not swerve
By foot or hand
From thy command,
Not to be served but to serve.

"This, too I pray;
That from this day
No love of ease
Nor pride prevent
My good intent,
Not to be pleased, but to please.

"And if I may,
I'd have this day
Strength from above
To set my heart
In heavenly art,
Not to be loved, but to love."

The Bible College at Bolenge, Africa

A. F. Hensey.

Some things regarding the mighty church at Bolenge hardly need to be told again. They have become the property of the Christian Church. Whenever one hears of the coming of the Kingdom, he thinks at once of this marvelous church on the banks of the Congo. And when we would remind ourselves of our one great task in the world, we ponder of the burning zeal of that church for the evangelization of the "region beyond."

And to hear the name "Bolenge" is to think of that band of men, who with a burning passion have carried far and near the Gospel out of which this church was born—the Bolenge evangelists. These, too, are no longer to be classed among the unknown. In many homes their names have become household words. In these latter days men speak of Iso Timothy and Lokangi as they speak of Pastor Shi or Joseph Hardy Neesima, and it is almost a confession of ignorance to acknowledge not having heard of crippled Joseph or the silver-tongued Ikoko.

Therefore, when you read the heading of this article, you do not think that such a school is needed because the Bolenge church has no preachers. Bible Colleges may be needed at some places because of the scarcity of preachers, but not so among the palms and orange trees of Bolenge. From the beginning every Christian has been a preacher. Every school child as soon as he confesses the name of Jesus before men, commences to lift Him up before young and old, and more than one old man has learned the way of Life from the lips of his grandchild.

In October of last year we had a remarkable protracted meeting at Bolenge. For four weeks we had two great evangelistic services every day, and no preacher preached twice, nor did we hear one really poor sermon! Can any church in the homeland equal that? And we could have carried on that meeting twice as long with no repetition of preachers, and with only a little poorer grade of preaching.

A Bible College is needed at Bolenge, not so much to produce more preachers, but better preachers. We need more, most assuredly, for the reapers are far too few for that whitening field. And more we will have for that church does not try to live on one missionary sermon a year. It reminds itself about once a week that it has no right to keep for its selfish enjoyment the Life indeed. It prays ever and often that the Holy Spirit may abound in its membership in proportion as it sets apart its best preachers to carry far abroad the gospel. But a training school is an imperative need, because the time has come when we must have a cultured, trained ministry. The present evangelists are pioneers, and they are of the pioneer type. Right royally have they "blazed the way." With a splendid enthusiasm and an almost unparalleled audacity of faith, this uncultured ministry has proclaimed the gospel of the Son of God in hamlet, town and village. Everywhere little bands of Christians have been formed. These must be carefully shepherded and taught. Each one must become a "little Bolenge."

It is in this, the higher are of the ministry, that these pioneer evangelists, unsurpassed in zeal and heroism, must be taught and trained. They are unprepared for their unfinished task. They must be made pastors as well as heralds, shepherds as well as pioneers.

These men have proven themselves worthy of higher things. It is for you, therefore, to give them the opportunity to fit themselves for their God-appointed service.

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY.

Lesson XVI. Attention and Interest.

I. ATTENTION DEFINED. Before we can see an object clearly through a telescope we must get it in the field of vision, and work the mechanism until it is focused there. Attention is to the mind what working the telescope is to the eye. It is the power whereby the mind makes and keeps an object or an idea, or a train of thought "FOCAL IN CONSCIOUSNESS" We listen and look attentively; we feel carefully; we think hard. All these are forms of attention. When we try to decipher difficult hand-writing, or to locate a sound, or to name a subtle odor, or to think through a difficult proposition—we are attending to these several things.

II. KINDS OF ATTENTION. Attention is of two sorts—spontaneous and voluntary. (1) SPONTANEOUS ATTENTION is that which the mind accords to an object naturally without any effort of will. It is that which the infant gives to the rattle, the reader to the fascinating book, the sailor to the weather signs, the broker to the market fluctuations. In a less sustained form it is that kind of attention we all give to a sudden sound or a strange experience that challenges our curiosity or irritates our nerves. (2) IN INVOLUNTARY ATTENTION the mind holds the object or idea focal by a conscious act of will. It attends to it not as in spontaneous attention instinctively and for its own sake, but deliberately and for ulterior ends. When the student pores over a difficult problem, or the bookkeeper looks for an error, or the child "has to" pay attention to the teacher in school, or when one compels one's thoughts to "follow" a dull sermon—voluntary attention is being exercised.

III. INTEREST. Interest is the mother of attention. It is the welcome accorded by the mind to certain objects or ideas rather than to others. I am interested in a thing when it attracts me—when I like to look at it, hear about it, think about it. When I am not interested in a thing it is because its presence in consciousness is either in different to me or gives me positive pain. The child is interested in the new toy; the boy is interested in base-ball; the scientist in X-rays.

IV. KINDS OF INTEREST. Like attention, interest is of two sorts. (1) IMMEDIATE OR NATURAL INTERESTS are those that nature provides as part of the mental "make-up" of every individual. They are the spring of all other interests and activities. They appear in a regular order and have their periods of ripeness and decay. Thus the infant is interested in its "pacifier;" the kindergarten child in simple toys and games; the primary child in dolls, fairy stories and mechanical toys; the boy in boon companions, co-operative games, and stamp collection; the adolescent in ideals of love and heroism, and in sport as such; the adult in the practical things of life, in business, in "hobbies," etc. (2) MEDIATE OR ACQUIRED INTEREST is that which does not belong to the thing or idea in itself, but is borrowed by it from some natural interest. The pupil gets interested in a difficult lesson because he wants to win the prize or beat a rival—the interest of means to end; the boy is interested in the "man with the row-boat" —the interest of association; the scholar is interested in a hard lesson because it brings out an old fact in a new light—the interest of recognition. In these cases, the prize, the row-boat, the old fact are the primary interests out of which the acquired interests grows.

V. USE OF INTEREST IN TEACHING. There can be nothing taught without attention, but attention depends upon interest natural or acquired. Some would identify the two but their real relation is that of cause and effect. Given interest, attention follows. The first duty of the teacher, therefore, is to make the lesson interesting. Where the leson touches directly some natural interest of the class, the lesson is said to "teach itself." More frequent, however, it has to be MADE INTERESTING. It is then the business of the teacher to develop the lesson out of some natural interest of the class. The natural interest out of which the acquired interest springs is called the POINT OF CONTACT.

VI. ILLUSTRATIONS. Thus in teaching the lesson of Goliath to the primary class, their curiosity will be excited and their attention held by linking the Bible story on to the tales of giants and ogres with which they are already familiar. A lesson for a class of boys on obedience and discipline might very well be begun by speaking of the Saturday afternoon's base-ball or foot-ball game. In the adult class a lesson on Paul's instruction in Ephesians to master and servant could be made interesting at the very outset by relating it to the problem of capital and labor in modern society. Where no other point of contact can be secured, one can always be secured by friefly recapitulating the last day's lesson and making the new one appear as a sequel and development of the old.

VII. ORDER OF INTEREST. The instinctive interests appear as already said, in a regular order. They are nature's periodic "distress signals," indicating what powers of the growing pupil are needing attention at a given time, and what functions of the mind are ripe for use. Prof. James says: "In all pedagogy the great thing is to strike the iron while hot and to serve the waves of the pupil's interest in each succeeding object before its end has come, so that knowledge may be got and a habit of skill acquired—a head-way of interest in short secured on which afterwards the individual may float." The great problem of teaching is, therefore, to discover what interests ripen at what times, and to regulate the mental diet of the pupil accordingly. Every interest should be utilized when it appears, or it will either become abortive or later on break out in it become abortive or later on break out in its an interest before its time is the sure way to make a "prig" and a nuisance out of an otherwise bright child. This is the bane of all doctrinal catechisms and pietistic lectures and "Elsie books" in the Sunday-school.

LITERATURE: DuBois', "Point of Contact"; James', "Talks to Teachers"; Gordy's, "The New Psychology"; Fitch's, "Art of Securing Attention"; Gregory's, "Seven Laws of Teaching"; Adams', "A Primer of Teaching."

QUESTIONS: (1) What is "attention"? Illustrate your answer; (2) Distinguish between the two kinds of "attention," giving illustrations of each; (3) What is "interest"? Give illustration; (4) Distinguish between "natural" and "acquired" interest; (5) What is the educational significance of "interest"? (6) How can a lesson be made "interesting"? (7) What is the "point of contact"? (8) Give some illustrations. (9) What is meant by saying that "the instinctive interests appear in a regular order"? (10) What significance has this for (a) the arrangement of a Sunday-school curriculum, and (b) methods of teaching? (11) What danger is there in feeding an "interest" before it is ripe?

Our Best for the Kingdom in America

By W. F. Rothenburger.

The path traveled by our American Christian Missionary Society is as interesting as its plea today is commanding. Along the way are marks which tell of heroic efforts against tremendous odds. The lack of precedent in liberal giving due, for the most part, to a lack of such means as render liberality possible; the newness of the scheme; the difficulties incident to pioneering; these things and many more made the task undertaken a most difficult one. It was an enterprise among us that moved toward its goal, not like a Twentieth Century Limited over a perfectly prepared road bed, but rather, it was like the slow moving of our pioneer fathers over the prairies and through the forests, where obstacles were encountered at every advance.

Happily for us today, the situation is quite changed, and our condition as a people demands greater things for the Home Work. The splendid accomplishments of the past under the most adverse circumstances force upon us a vision of our possibilities under conditions comparatively auspicious. The marked increase of wealthy among us has emboldened our leaders to plan widely, and to think in terms commensurate with the age, while a phenomenal growth numerically has caused us to aspire to some thing worthy of our numerical strength. Thus we are face to face with the last opportunity and the last appeal for this great department of our Missionary Propaganda in the first hundred years of our history, and the religious world watches with eagerness to see the faith we shall display in our Primitive program, while God himself waits to see a million and a quarter of his children put forth their greatest efforts in the extension of his kingdom in America.

The Needs of the Field a Challenge.

The needs of the field are such as challenge us to do our best, and if every Disciple were as conscious of the situation in many of our worthy fields as are our secretaries, nothing less thcan a great offering would be assured on the first Sunday in May. From the State Secretary of Louisiana come the words, "Not only have Alexandra and Ruston been compelled to give up their preachers for lack of funds, but we have been compelled to call in our state evangelist, to the great detriment of the work, for the same reason. We beg you for $800 that we may put a man in the field to at least strengthen the weak places." Listening again, we hear a representative from Washington saying to the Home Board, "I regret to come to you with these appeals for I know your heart is heavy and your treasury empty. But to whom shall I go if not to the American Christian Missionary Society? Oh, that these cries that ring in my ears while I try to sleep might he passed to to a sleeping brotherhood who could supply their needs." And so, from staid old New England to new and formative Oklahoma and on to the far western coast, these appeals pour into the office of our secretaries. Is it any wonder that these servants of the brotherhood have set the mark high, and in turn make their appeals to the rank and file, when they realize that the amount of funds at their disposal demands that they refuse and disappoint nine out of every ten of the struggling congregations who thus seek aid? The wonder is, that they have been so gentle with us in their appeals, and that they have waited so patiently while we slowly awaken to our opportunity. The Lord help us to crown this great year with our best efforts.

The Decreasing Supply of Ministers.

We have been lamenting the seeming scarcity of young men for the ministry, and perpetual appeals have been made for recruits to close up the ranks. This is a most commendable plea on the part of those who make it, but unless the brotherhood rallies to the support of those who are still able bodied and anxious to bury themselves in the greatest work in the world, the appeal is both illogical and criminal. The last number of the American Home Missionary points out not a few churches whose ministers have been dismissed from duty for lack of funds, while a number of ministers have been forced into a business career to supply their families with the necessaries of life. The solution of the problem does not lie with the churches thus circumstanced, but rather with us who have not yet taxed our abilities, and with others who have heartlessly ignored the call. Our secretaries assure us that if we rise to the occasion in May, "it will mean fifty men re-entering the ranks of preachers." We dare do no other than our best.

Again, the new fields from which many of the appeals come are commercially in the formative stage. The choicest sites in some of these new and rapidly growing cities which can be had now for a small sum, will, in a single decade, be out our of financial reach, or will be purchased at the risk of a heavy debt. A recent report from the brethren at Bartlesville, Oklahoma, accounted the purchase of a lot for $5,000, which "six or seven years ago could have been purchased for as many hundred." Another property in the same state costing a nominal sum a few years ago is worth today "from $15,000 to $20,000." The business instinct of even the pseudo business man among us forbids our doing anything but our best, under multiplying circumstances like these.

The Responsibility of a Rich Brotherhood.

What a work could be accomplished if even a million Disciples did their best; what a stride the kingdom would take in America! It has been roughly estimated that after living comfortably, and allowing $10,000,000 for luxuries, the Disciples have an annual surplus of over $40,000,000. If the church at Bolenge, whose members less than two decades ago were partially clad cannibals; if these Disciples so recently hewn out of the solid rock of superstition and ignorance; if this little band of five hundred whose male members receive a daily income of less than ten pieces of copper (ten cents), gave last year 6,000 pieces of copper ($600), for the extension of the kingdom outside of Bolenge, what should we American Disciples, separated from such a state by centuries, with incomes that forbid comparison, and with our boasted Christian civilization, what could we do, if we did our best? God help us to do it.

Evangelistic Methods Among Chicago Disciples—Various Methods Adopted—No Open Sesame Yet Found

By O. F. Jordan

During the past winter we have spent much time visiting the evangelistic meetings conducted by the Disciples in and around Chicago. We have been anxious to learn from every source how the task of city evangelization might best be carried on. There has been an impression abroad that Chicago churches are not evangelistic. That impression is created, no doubt, by the absence of telegrams to the leading papers from Chicago announcing large ingatherings. It is certainly not true that the Chicago churches of the Disciples are indifferent to the problem. With stubborn tenacity, they have clung to the program of evangelizing Chicago with mid-week services even when the facts seemed to be all against them.

This past winter, almost every type of evangelism has been tried in the Chicago churches. Pastors have held their own meetings more frequently than formerly This has been the case at Maywood, Harvey and Evanston. Visiting pastors have held meetings as at West End Church, and this coming week at Sheffield Avenue Church. Professional evangelists have held meetings as at Metropolitan Church, where Evangelist Brown has just closed a meeting. The winter's experience so far has shown that no type of evangelism has been devoid of result, but on the other hand no type has produced any telegrams for the journals. If any advantage in results is to be shown, perhaps this year shows larger audiences hearing our Chicago pastors than those listening to visitors.

Chicago Churches Determined to Grow.

Since we have evangelism in Chicago and a stubborn determination upon the part of every church to grow, why the small number of additions? Why do not men turn to the Lord by hundreds here as in smaller cities? Since we have ourselves been engaging recently in evangelism, we wish to offer a few suggestions in answer to these questions.

First of all, the social conditions of the city make the problem different. People in rural districts go to church because there is no other place to go. Here the gossip is exchanged and visiting indulged in, along with genuine religious interest. In Chicago, we see men every day. We have no need of fellowship of a certain sort but at times even hunger for solitude. Men work harder here and therefore are the more hungry for play. The theater is on every hand to retail moral and social theories or their opposites in sugar coated doses. As we went to a revival on the West side recently we had to go through a line of two hundred people who were waiting for a chance at the box office. At the service we attended there were fifty people present to hear the gospel preached. The people in that long line were tired; they wanted amusement more than they wanted religion.

Keen Interests of men in the City.

Then the city man has keener life interests than his country brother. Competition in all lines is fiercer. Whether in the labor market or in the sale of commodities, the weaker vessel is continually broken and thrown aside. Men have to give more thought to their daily work to succeed in a place where no workman has a monopoly in his line. This concentration of attention on the material side of life has an unquestioned effect on religion.

Furthermore, it cannot be denied that wickedness is more thoroughly entrenched in the city than it is in smaller places. There are more saloons, brothels, gambling hells and other evil resorts. Human wreckage is to be met at every turn. If the world, the flesh and the devil is to be fought everywhere, far more here.

It will not do, however, to say that it is simply social conditions that have made the building of great churches most difficult. There are a few great churches in every great city. The Disciples have none in the three largest cities of the country, but that is only to say that they have not yet learned how. Other factors must be accounted as elements in the situation. Among these, we would mention the ministry.

Preachers of Varying Types Come to Chicago.

We have every kind of preacher come to Chicago. Almost without exception every man is a good fellow who comes to Chicago. He has courage, at least, or he would not come. But these men come with many illusions concerning the nature of the task. One man came to evangelize Chicago by preaching against the Higher Criticism. "Jehoiakim's Pen-knife" was one of his star sermons. He fulminated till even his ears grew red with fervor. It was wasted, for that audience had not even so much as heard whether there be a higher criticism, much less did they have their faith in jeopardy over it. Another preacher comes to Chicago to appeal to the city man's emotion. He weeps at every service and reminds his audience that this is Christ-like for Jesus is reported to have wept often. The city man was cold enough to insinuate that they did it better in the neighborhood theater. Another man comes and determines to be very simple in his preaching to be sure of reaching his audience. He will trust in nothing but the simon-pure gospel. He preaches faith, repentance and baptism at every service with but little exposition, for he assures us he was not commissioned to invent a gospel but only to preach one. His audience turns aside from him as "narrow." He cannot understand why a message that has always brought results presented in this simple way should so utterly fail.

There is the type of preacher also who believes he must be very scholarly if he is to reach the city man. He reads up thoroughly on the Philosophy of Religion and proceeds to define the Christian religion in the terminology of the latest philosophy. He is amazed to find that a genuinely intelligent audience is yet not familiar with his terms and is unkind enough to think he is showing off. There is the man who is very much afraid he will be regarded as narrow or conservative and proceeds to prove his liberality by telling what he does not believe, as though liberality was to be measured by the number of dogmas rejected. From this sort of man, the city-dweller turns wearily, for he has doubts enough already and is wanting help in them rather than a surfeit of new problems.

City Evangelism Yet in Experimental Stage.

Not only is the evangelism of the city experimental, and so far for the most part not effective for the task. but we find some reasons in the churches themselves for the failure to win converts. The city man scrutinizes the church very closely before joining it. He wants to know if it furnishes friendship. He wants to know if it ministers to social needs. He feels that it ought to at least have as much interest in social problems as the saloon. He asks, however, above all, if it has real religion. He hungers for this more than for all else and seeks out fellowship where the contagion of real religion will help him in the solution of his problems. Many times he is disappointed. He finds the church full of ugly quarrels between rival factions instead of exemplifying the religion of Jesus Christ. He finds men in the lead of things not so spiritual as he could wish. He finds the church more anxious to raise its budget than to do unselfish service to the community. In that ease no evangelism can win him. The church must get right first before it can make its appeal to a soul-hungry man who is looking for the real thing in religion.

Let it not be supposed, however, that all of our churches and ministers fall short of the standard. Churches are being built in Chicago in spite of everything. Our growth in Chicago the past ten years will compare favorably with the growth of the brotherhood at large for the corresponding period. We believe it can be shown that Chicago churches have a larger percentage of growth than the churches of Illinois outside of the city. Our growth is like that of the leaven in the meal but none the less sure for all that.

Chicago Growth Compares Favorably With State.

How are we growing? Certainly in few cases is the chief element the personality of a great evangelist, though many good ones have aided us. Our greatest evangelistic agency is our Sunday-schools and auxiliary educational processes. Some of our most useful Disciples are of native growth. It will be increasingly so. Some of our churches are winning men with social agencies that command sympathy and induce them to come into the church in the regular work.

We shall continue to have the old line evangelism, then, with the mid-week meetings, because of force of habit and because some are reached in this way who would not be in another. We are being driven steadily, however, to the view that the ultimate evangelization of the city will have an educational background, as with the Catholics, or a social background, as with the Salvation Army. Our evangelism will not be complete until every means is taken to win the perishing city population from the thralldom of sin.

Chicago Church Notes

C. E. Rainwater has resigned at the Garfield Boulevard Church. He has been at a most difficult task.

The Jackson Boulevard Church has not yet secured a pastor. We hope a man may soon be found to take up the work laid down by the lamented Parker Stockdale.

A wave of evangelism is passing through our churches. Many of our churches hold meetings during Lent because the places of amusement are less active at this period.

The Douglas Park Church has rented a neighboring hall and will try hall meetings for the coming month. The first Sunday evening of the experiment has shown most favorable results.

The Harvey Church is in a meeting with home forces. The pastor, W. D. Endres, is enough in the hearts of his community that he is securing good audiences to hear him preach evangelistic sermons. This type of evangelism brings very permanent results.

The Sheffield Avenue Church is to have a former pastor, Bruce Brown, of Valparaiso, hold a short series of meetings. We shall watch this effort with interest. Why should not former pastors come back after they have had time to reflect on their experiences and give the church the benefit of their experience?

Alva W. Taylor is safely installed at Irving Park, and on Friday evening, April 16, a reception will be given him. His predecessor, W. F. Rothenberger of Cleveland, will spend a week with him on the field to properly introduce him to the possibilities of the situation developing under the former pastorate. This fraternal act is most commendable.

The Evanston Church is in the midst of a three-week meeting, with the pastor preaching and Mrs. L. H. Tobey a member of the church, leading the music. The last three Sunday nights the audiences have averaged three hundred and fifty by actual count, in a church with a membership of one-third that number. The mid-week audiences have been much smaller, however. There have been two confessions to date and much good will created that will bring later fruitage.

Kentucky State Work in March

G. B. Swann preached every Sunday. No additions.

The work of William Gross in Laurel county was without visible results.

There were five added by reclamation in the Big Sandy Valley by J. L. Hall.

W. P. Collins did some very good work in Johnson county. Eighteen additions.

G. H. Thomas baptized eleven and added five otherwise in second London district.

J. W. Masters was in Laurel and Whitley counties, baptized four and added ten otherwise.

R. B. Aker preached fifteen sermons at three points in southeast Kentucky. Five added.

Springfield is doing well and W. A. Wolte is getting matters in better condition all the time.

Three added at South Louisville and J. B. Lockhart says the work is progressing very satisfactorily.

Three baptized by D. G. Combs and eight other additions. He was hindered much by bad weather and roads.

W. P. Walden and the Lebanon work are making good progress. The meeting by W. J. Cocke did much good.

W. L. Lacy preached twenty-four sermons and five added. A big campaign planned for the remainder of the year.

Z. Ball had an excellent month. Twelve baptized. Eight other additions. Good work done and plans for yet greater.

H. C. Runyon and Latonia continue to do good work together. He held a short meeting away from home with seven added.

J. B. Flinchum had a good month in Breathitt county. Six baptisms; three other additions. House at Morg to be completed in a little while and paid for.

L. A. Kohler was at Bromley two Sundays and preparations are made for W. J. Hudspeth's meeting to follow the splendid meeting at Ludlow, of which we have no report as yet, except that great good is being done.

A Sanders reports a state of affairs at Louisa, county seat of Lawrence county, that is gratifying. A house and lot bought and a tabernacle to be put on lot, the house on it being a residence. Good Sunday-school and matters doing well. Paintsville also doing very well. Seven added in a meeting held.

H. W. Elliott was at work all the month at home and abroad. He spent eight days preaching for the little church at Worthville. No additions. Some better organization effected and we hope that permanent good was done. Receipts away below our needs; only $326.54. Not half enough to pay the month's expenses. We urge every church and friend that can do so to come to our help now. We are not sending out letters as usual, on account of foreign and home offerings. Letters are written to such places as we have reason to think have made provision for the work, or expect to take combined offering. Without increased receipts we will soon lose all the gain we have made and be woefully in debt.

W. J. Cocke has scored another victory in a county seat. Albany, Clinton county, was the scene of his labors. F. H. Cappa and wife were with him as singers of the gospel. The work had about ceased. The church is reorganized with seventy-nine members, including those baptized and added in other ways. W. L. Smith, a grandson of Raccoon John Smith, is installed as preacher and money raised for his support.

The May Offering Is for Just Such Work As This

Here in this teeming valley from Niles to Pittsburg, this center of the iron industry of America, this place of bustling cities swarming with foreigners it seems that the chief business of the Home Missionary Society is to do something for the foreigners. Something must be done. Only yesterday the ministers of New Castle, Youngstown and Sharon met and faced this problem. Through the generosity of Thomas W. Phillips of New Castle, who volunteers to pay one-half the salary of a foreign worker, such a man will be employed. Fortunately again we have the man. He is a Croatian. He speaks seven languages (did you ever see a foreigner who did not speak seven?), and he will most probably be set to work at once by the combined contributions of the churches of this valley. We propose to do this through the Home Society and to collect the amount over and above the regular contributions to this society.

As a brotherhood we are not touching the fringe of this problem. Other communions are doing great work and are getting wonderful results. Two-thirds of the 75,000 people in Youngstown are foreigners. One social settlement, one Italian mission and several kindergartens comprise the whole work for these thousands. Can these people be won? Yes, by the hundreds. Do they make good Christians? Indeed they do. They can teach us some things. All the money gathered by the Home Society could easily be spent in this way alone and then hardly a beginning be made. We are living in great days and if we are worthy we must be awake to our duties. With all my heart I speak this word in behalf of our foreigners.

WITH THE WORKERS

Revival at Fairmount, Ind.

The writer has just closed a meeting at Fairmount, Ind., of four weeks duration, with seventy-eight additions, fifty-five of which were heads of families. In many respects it was a remarkable meeting and shows the possibilities of mission work in Indiana. About a year ago W. A. McKowan of Marion, Ind., came on the field and began work. He had no financial backing, but had plenty of faith and earnestness. About sixty were gathered together and with those who came in during the year there were seventy members when these meetings began. We have no church building, but met in a small U. B. church. We had no place to baptize here and this handicapped us greatly. This is a town of 2,500, has a Friends church of 1,100. The Grant county churches backed the meeting, but the offerings almost covered the expense. A chorus of forty voices was organized and drilled by H. W. Schwan of Gas City, who came over several nights and led the music. A good lot for a new building on the main street has been purchased and a building will be put up in the near future. Much of the success is due to the faithful colors of Brother McKowan. I go to Rockford, Ill., to assist W. D. Ward in a meeting during April and to Baltimore, Md., during May, where J. Ross Miller will join me as singer. Austin Hunter.

New Mexico Letter

George Fowler Roswell.

In this far southwest land we are trying to do a little towards the success of the Centennial gathering at Pittsburg. We are so many miles distant from the center of disturbance that we have felt only a ripple or so. We are enjoying more and more the weekly visits of "The Christian Century." We have decided that it is about the best paper in our brotherhood.

Nearly one year ago, we arrived from a five year pastorate in Southport, England, the congregation where the splendid sons of the late Timothy Coop, one of the first men in our ranks who taught us the art of giving, worship.

We came to this land of almost perpetual sunshine for the better health of our only son, who, I am glad to say has regained his health and is now attendingg the Socorro School of Mines.

We left one of the very best people and found a splendid congregation waiting to be led into larger things.

Every part of our work is prospering. Just closed a meeting of a little less than three weeks with fifty-eight added. We did the work with home forces. The meeting is said to be one of the best in view of the fact that Hamlin and Daugherty under the pastorate of C. C. Hill held a meeting with seventy-five added eighteen months ago.

We have received into membership thirty-one prior to our revival, making eighty-nine since assuming the pastorate eleven months ago.

We have attained one of our Centennial aims in raising thirty-five hundred dollars and wiping out our building debt. We have now one of the best auditoriums in the territory, but lack Sunday-school accommodation. That is our next undertaking.

Brother Arthur Stout closed a meeting with the church in Artesia, where he is pastor, with nearly fifty added. They have paid their building debt and are heading for enlargement. Brother Stout is with the church at Hagerman in a meeting. They have just finished a neat building, which will be dedicated during the revival. Brother F. F. Grin, our hustling secretary, held a good meeting at Carlsbad, locating a good man, Brother Passmore from Texas with them. We welcome our brother to our territory. Brother Dutt is stirring up things at Les Vegas and is getting ready for a campaign with Violett in June. We are preparing for a good convention at El Paso, where Brother Robinson ministers. Our territory has been refused statehood so many times that we have annexed a portion of Texas making El Paso the center of our activities.

We are now lining up for home missions. If our people could see the urgent need for money in this great and rapidly growing southwest, our secretaries would be gladdened with a great offering. The Baptists are putting in hundreds where we are putting in dollars. These people in this new land know how to give. It would do some of our old wealthy congregations good to see the generosity in the Master's cause in this far southwest land.

This beautiful clime is destined to become the great health resort of the Republic. No other part of the broad America is so perfect the year round.

OVER HIS HEAD.

Home Mission Notes

The churches being supported by the American Christian Missionary Society gave to Home Missions last year $3,700, and to Foreign Missions $3,500. Yet there are those who ask "does it pay?" Mission churches are always missionary churches and generally can put to shame the older and richer churches of the East by its measure of their sacrifice and service.

The cowboy is being driven from the face of the earth. The farmer is taking his place. People by the thousands rush to the western states. The church of Christ ought to be in every county, every township, every city, every village, every cross-roads, possessing the land for our Lord. Our Home Missionary Board is waiting the results of the May offering before it can give any more assistance. If we want to celebrate the Centennial the best way, let us equip the American Christian Missionary Society for entering every open door in the great West.

It is a sad fact that many of our evangelists on the frontier dare not organize churches where there can be no assurance of immediate self-support. They cannot promise financial aid from the Home Board. The work is already in advance of the brotherhood's liberality. The only thing to do is to wait till the churches catch up with the vision. These facts suggest the necessity for an offering May 2 that shall surpass the record.

The Price of Goodness

The goodness of Uneeda Biscuit is not a matter of cost to you. It is assured by the careful selection of the best materials for Uneeda Biscuit; by the skill of experts who bake nothing but Uneeda Biscuit; by the perfect cleanliness and appliances of great bakeries built expressly to bake Uneeda Biscuit; and, finally, by the perfect protection of a package that excludes all dust and moisture.

All this has resulted in quality out of all proportion to the price.

WITH THE WORKERS

H. R. Ford, Ennis, takes the work at Midland, Texas.

May 2 the centennial offering for home missions. Every church in line for 1909.

The church at Bryan, Texas, takes the pastor from the church at Haskell, J. N. Thomas.

Sumner T. Martin has changed his address from 111 1-2 Carrillo to 1033 Castillo, Santa Barbara, Calif.

The total receipts of the Foreign Society from October 1, 1908, to April 7, amounted to $93,814, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $23,710.

C. P. Craig is to become pastor of the church at Denison, Texas, where M. M. Davis had been supplying since the close of the work of George W. Lee.

Let our churches remember the day for the annual offering for American missions. The home board is hard pressed. The work was never so oppressive. We must hurl our best forces into the west at once, if we are to save men and money in days to come.

It is reported that G. L. Bush has resigned the pastorate of the Dixon St. Church, Gainesville, Texas, to accept a call to the church at Carrolton, Mo. Mr. Bush has had a long and successful pastorate at Gainesville and is everywhere recognized as one of the best pastors in the state.

A joint reception was recently held by the churches in Portland, Oregon, to welcome the three new ministers who have just come to our churches there. They are, W. F. Reagor, First Church; Thomas G. Picton, Rodney Ave. Church; and George Patterson, the Woodlawn Church.

The church at Long Beach, Calif., to which F. M. Rogers, of the Second Church, Springfield, Ill., recently became pastor, has entered the Living Link class. Two hundred and eighty people had part in the offering. The Sunday-school has an attendance of 400.

During the past week, the Foreign Society has received three gifts of $500 each on the annuity plan. Two of these gifts came from friends who had before given on this plan. The society is receiving a larger number of gifts than at any time in the past.

During the first seven days of April the receipts of the Foreign Society amounted to $12,463, a gain over the corresponding time in 1908 of $2,962. The churches gave $10,336, a gain of $2,826. There was also a gain of seventeen contributing churches during the week.

Only one-tenth of the churches made any contribution to the work of home missions last year. And yet these church gave $60,772.97, an axerage of almost $60 apiece. If we can persuade two-fifths of the churches to fall into line this year at the same rate, we shall easily raise $250,000 for home missions. Surely we ought to do this much for our cause in America.

C. A. Young, formerly editor of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY, now doing successful work as pastor of one of our best California churches, is holding a meeting for the new church at Fruitvale, Calif. where R. L. McHatton is pastor. This young church is under the care of the State Board, but it has already had a remarkable growth and is expected to continue in a very rapid development. The service of the present pastor is most highly commended.

S. J. Robins of Lancaster, England, a Baptist minister, whose relations with the Disciples in England have been most friendly, is coming to America in May to engage in pastoral work in this country. Conferences with Disciples have led him to believe that he would be glad to work in one of our churches. He is spoken of in high terms by both Baptists and Disciples in England. Churches wishing to communicate with him in reference to supply work or pastoral duties may address him in care of the Christian Century.

C. S. Smith has been called as pastor of the church at Morristown, Ind.

The Third Church, Topeka, Kansas, has called W. H. Scriven as pastor.

George B. Stewart, the pastor of the church at Warrensburg, Mo., is leading the church into larger things.

C. F. Ladd began work with the church at Farmer City, Ill., April 4. There were two confessions at the first service.

The church at Auburn, Ill., is being assisted in a meeting by Evangelist F. A. Sword and Charles McVey, singer.

The church at Tarkio, Mo., is to lose its pastor, J. M. Grimes, who has accepted a call to the church at Holton, Kansas.

The annual meeting of the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, Ohio, where W. F. Rothenburger is pastor, was held the last week in March.

N. Douglas Webber, pastor at Providence, R. I., reports twenty-three additions to the church there since January 1. He preaches half time at Manton, R. I.

Dr. B. B. Tyler on April 5 gave an address upon "The Kind of Preaching for This Age, as to Manner and Matter," before the Ministerial Alliance of Denver, Colo.

F. E. Mallory has begun work with the church at Parsons, Kansas. J. N. Crutcher supplied the pulpit of this church until Mr. Mallory could take up the work.

E. J. Church will close a three and one-half year ministry with the church at Grandy, Mo., April 15, and will at once begin work with the church at Dexter, Mo.

J. P. Myers has the work in fine shape at Shelbyville, Ind. The church has the largest Sunday-school in the city and the largest men's class in the history of the church.

The Washington State Convention is to be held in Seattle, June 20 to 24. A strong program is being prepared. W. J. Wright and G. W. Muckley are among the speakers.

The Kansas Ministerial Institute meets at Manhattan, April 13, 14, 15. There is a strong program. F. D. Power is chief speaker, and is to speak each forenoon and evening of the meeting.

J. M. Kersey, who has just begun work with the First Church, Omaha, is directing his attention to the development of the Sunday-school. He has organized a normal training class.

H. H. Peters, Field Sec'y of Eureka College, recently presented the work of the College at Pleasant Plains, Ill. The pastor, G. W. Zink, speaks enthusiastically of his address there.

Z. E. Bates is successfully carrying forward the work at Atchison, Kans. There were nineteen additions to the church during the month of February and in March the pastor held a revival meeting.

The Hiram Glee Club is to give an entertainment at the First Church, Warren, Ohio, April 28. The purpose of the church is not to make money but to bring a fine attraction within the reach of all.

A. C. Smither announces a series of nine Easter-week sermons in the First Christian Church, Los Angeles, Calif. A large number of our churches are holding such meetings this year. This indicates a tendency.

The church at Pomona, Calif., is under the leadership of their minister, M. D. Clubb, erecting a $50,000.00 building. At the same time they have this year increased their offering to missions from $850.00 to $1,400.00.

"The Legion of the Cross" is an organization in the First Church, Warren, Ohio, each member of which pays a definite amount each week for missions. The plan is highly commended by Stephen J. Corey, and W. R. Warren.

"Easter Mission" is the name applied to the Easter-week meetings of the Portland Ave. Church of Christ, Minneapolis, by Pastor P. J. Rice. On different evenings sermons will be delivered by the pastor, Benjamin Franklin, A. D. Harmon and G. B. Barnes.

Andrew P. Johnson removes from Fayette to Bethany, Mo.

Gov. Folk is to appear in the lecture course of the First Church, Tacoma, Washington.

The church at Cadillac, Mich., J. G. Wilson, pastor, has purchased a lot and is pushing for a new building.

H. D. Williams, pastor, did the preaching in a meeting held by the church at Kalamazoo, Mich., in which there were nine additions to the church. He was assisted by O. J. Marks, Canton, Mo., as leader of song.

J. T. McGarvey, pastor of the Woodward Ave. Church, Detroit, Mich., says, "At our annual dinner and congregational meeting, held on March 9, the reports showed 39 per cent net gain in membership and 137 per cent net gain in Sunday-school attendance.

The Douglas Park Church, Chicago, is now holding its Sunday evening meetings in a large and comfortable hall, about two blocks from the church. The first evening in the hall more than doubled the attendance and the church believes that it is about to enter upon a new ear of its history.

Bruce Brown, pastor of the church at Valparaiso, Ind., delivered the address before the Chicago Christian Ministers' meeting last Monday afternoon. His subject was "The Ultimate Ground of Right." The address was greatly enjoyed by the preachers, and was followed by a very lively discussion.

G. L. Garvin, First Church, Seattle, Washington, announces the following series of "Centennial Sermons" for the month of April, "Where We Stand," "What We Face," "How We Fight," "When We Win." This church is in perfect harmony and every department of the church feels its responsibility for the entire work, and is forging ahead in a most encouraging way.

H. J. Loken, pastor at Alameda, Calif., is preaching a series of sermons on religion and health Wednesday evenings. The first of the series was, "Teaching and Practice of the Early Church." Then followed "The Teaching and Practice of Modern Times." The third in the series dealt with "The Relation of Mind and Body." The fourth and last will be "A Practical Application of the Truths of Ancient and Modern Times."

CLEVER DOCTOR.

Cured a 20 Years' Trouble Without Any Medicine.

A wise Indiana physician cured a 20 years' stomach disease without any medicine as his patient tells:

"I had stomach trouble for 20 years, tried family medicines, patent medicines and all the simple remedies suggested by my friends, but grew worse all the time.

"Finally a doctor who is the most prominent physician in this part of the state told me medicine would do me no good, only irritate my stomach and make it worse—that I must look to diet and quit drinking coffee.

"I cried out in alarm, 'Quit drinking Coffee!' why, 'What will I drink?'

"'Try Postum,' said the doctor, 'I drink it and you will like it when it is made according to directions, with cream, for it is delicious and has none of the bad effects coffee has.'

"Well that was two years ago and I am still drinking Postum. My stomach is right again and I know Doctor hit the nail on the head when he decided coffee was the cause of all my trouble. I only wish I had quit it years ago and drank Postum in its place."

Never too late to mend. Ten days' trial of Postum in place of coffee works wonders. "There's a Reason."

Look in pkgs. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WITH THE WORKERS

Claris Yeuell is doing some evangelistic work in England. He has been assisting J. H. Versey at Swindon. He reports twelve accessions.

M. D. Adams, missionary of the Foreign Society, is just recovering from a painful surgical operation recently performed at Battle Creek, Mich.

The churches in Woodford county, Ky., are planning to combine their offerings to support a missionary on the foreign field through the Foreign Society. This is a decided step forward.

The church at Capitol Hill, Des Moines, Iowa, H. E. Van Horn, minister, becomes a living-link in the Foreign Society. This makes twenty-one new living-links since March 1, and there are others.

During the first six months of the current missionary year, there has been a gain in receipts for foreign missions from every source, churches, Sunday-school, etc., except bequests. This is an exceptional record.

Wednesday evening, March 31, H. H. Peters gave his popular lecture on "The Land of Tomorrow," at Washington, Ill. Mr. Peters was formerly pastor of the church at Washington and his visit was greatly enjoyed by the people and the pastor, E. H. Reed.

The Sixth (Illinois) District Convention has been changed from Bement to Rantoul. Time, June 2-4. We have had no public meetings here for the past three weeks on account of scarletina. We resume regular services next Sunday.

J. Will Walters.

The English congregation of the Christian Mission at Monterrey, Mex., enjoyed a week's visit from Evangelist O. P. Spiegel and wife. The series of sermons delivered by Mr. Spiegel encouraged the little band of Disciples to greater efforts. J. H. Fuller is pastor.

H. H. Peters, Field Sec'y Eureka College, occupied the pulpit of the Christian Church in Eureka, Sunday, March 28. In the morning he spoke on "The Plea of the Disciples and Christian Education"; in the evening he delivered a popular lecture on "Booze and Business."

Indianapolis, Ind.—First quarter's work at the Seventh Christian Church resulted in twenty-eight additions to the church. $82.00 for Foreign Missions against $15.00 last year. All departments of the work growing. Sunday-school is being graded and three adult Bible classes organized. Yours respectfully, Clay Trusty.

The church at Greensburg, Ill., last year raised for all purposes over $9,000. The growth of the Sunday-school was remarkable. The Ladies' Aid raised over $1,000. Including one annuity, over $700 will go to Foreign Missions. The Auxiliary is alive and aggressive. W. G. Johnston is the enterprising pastor.

The church at Evanston, Ill., is holding a meeting, with the pastor, O. F. Jordan, doing the preaching, and Mrs. Tobey, a member of the congregation, in charge of the music. Large audiences are in attendance, and much good is being accomplished, both in regard to present additions to the church and in getting the message of the church before the community. They have given special attention to advertising, even paying for a display ad in a local paper. Much other work was put out from their own printing press.

Austin Hunter will begin evangelistic services in the church at Rockford, Ill., Easter Sunday. They have made thorough preparation, and have high hopes for a splendid meeting. Prof. Axel W. Titus, their choir director, will have charge of a choir of about twenty-five voices, and will furnish the special music. A Men's Brotherhood, with thirty-five charter members, has been organized and will be affiliated with the national Men's Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ. They have twenty-one subscriptions to "Christian Men." W. D. Ward is pastor.

Telegrams

Connersville, Ind., April 11.—Herbert Yeuell meeting closed tonight. Twelve days invitation one hundred thirty-two added, a large number for this well gleaned field. Fifteen husbands and wives came forward together. Methodists and Presbyterians held meeting previous to Yeuell's coming, with very few additions. Yeuell succeeded his description in sermon on "Babylon" tonight; best I ever heard.—J. C. Burkhart.

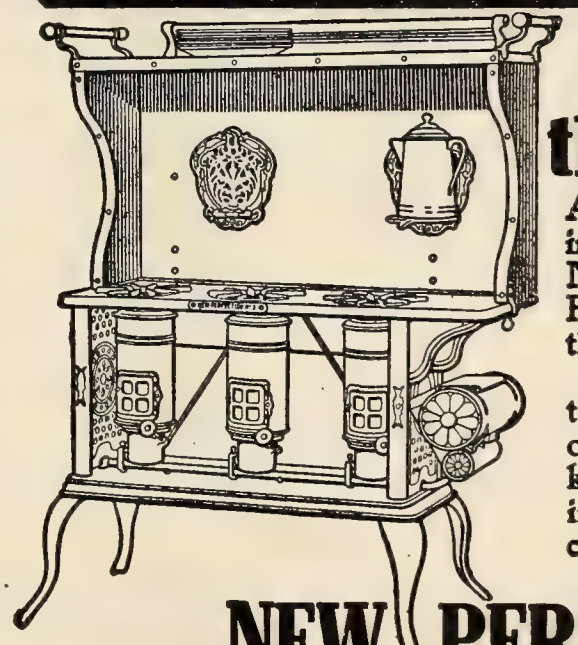
SOME GOOD NEWS.

In deep humility, but with joy, we announce that the Christian Woman's Board of Missions reached the aim set for the number of new societies during the second quarter—180—an average of two per day.

The receipts for the quarter were $86,503.82. Two new Living Links and one Life Line were secured. A friend in Beatrice, Nebraska, takes the support of Mr. Elsam, of Bina, India, and the Auxiliary at Plano, Texas, chooses Mrs. J. H. Fuller, of Monterey, Mexico. Palestine, Texas, becomes a Life Line in the support of evangelistic work in the homeland.

A number of friends of the work have made large gifts, and others have announced their purpose to do so.

We pray the Father to keep us in the line of sustained effort until all is accomplished.



Mrs. M. E. Harlan.

OUR MARCHING ORDERS.

The very next forward movement for our church must be in the interests of our home mission work. Since the last bugle note called us to the home mission campaign, every other interest has had its opportunity,—church extension, ministerial relief, benevolences, C. W. B. M. and various missions have all had their day, each in turn. The order now is for every captain of every ship of Zion to clear his decks for a general engagement in the interests of home missions. Let every church get a good ready. From now on the columns of all our papers will be replete with ammunition for the home missionary campaign. At this time every leader among us should know that the May offering in Southern California takes the place of state missions and that every cent raised for the A. C. M. S. in this offering is returned to our treasury to be expended in the missions in Southern California and Arizona.

A single year or two does not suffice to rightly estimate the true work of an organization nor to measure the work it does. Like the kine in Pharaoh's dream, some years are fat and some are lean. Only the mother who makes its clothes knows how a baby grows from month to month, but the casual tourist who has not seen him for five yars is startled at the development of the sturdy lad. So with our missionary society. In the last five years the annual income of our society has increased from $2,040 to $10,307.12. During this period we have organized twenty-five churches, and helped maintain pastors in forty-four places and have seen twenty of our missions grow to self-support. Our work enjoys the entire confidence of the churches and our opportunities to extend the kingdom were never so many nor so great.

Grant K. Lewis, Secretary.

Centennial Bulletin

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

Ahead of Time.

J. T. Nichols, the enterprising and devoted editor and manager of the Christian Union, Des Moines, Iowa, has been in Pittsburg viewing the Centennial Quadrangle, and reserving hotel accommodations for some of the Iowa brethren. Many others have written us for reservations.

Those desiring to stop in hotels rather than private homes may make their reservations as soon as they desire. The rates in the best hotels are from $1.00 per day up, on the European plan. Even the high priced houses make this rate where two or more use the same room. Literature giving information in detail will be ready next month.

The first of the Centennial roll books was sent in last week. Of course it contained simply the names of members and officers of the church with no cross after any name. The statistical page was also filled out.

A Free People.

We are delighted to find our brethren making use of the roll book according to their own ideas. This first arrival contains all that is necessary. If any congregation doesn't wish its members to go on record as to their participation in the work, they are at liberty to leave out the xs. Of course they have the same liberty to send in the book at once, though we should much prefer to have it held long enough to show the names of those who come into the Kingdom during the next five months. We miss one of the advantages of the plan if we fail to use it as an evangelistic agency.

The same commendable liberty has been exercised by another church in writing in the names of its members who have entered into their eternal rest. Still another is recording the names of scholars in the Bible-school. Of course in each case it will be necessary to carefully indicate any who are not actual members of the church at the present time. But we want every church to feel free to use the book in such a way as best to stimulate its own life and service.

God of the Living.

This desire of some to show at the Centennial the names of both deceased and prospective members is a recognition of the continuity of the church's life. "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." The illustrious men who inaugurated this restoration movement, and the charter members of all of our congregations are alive for evermore. In a very real sense they are still members of the churches in which they labored and worshipped. Among the most valuable assets of these churches are their accumulated inheritances of faith and righteousness and grace. And even so the innocence, the laughter and the enthusiasm of our children have their legitimate place in the church of Christ. Blessed is the church which in this Centennial year makes the most of its three or four generations.

Four Generations.

In the magnificent pictorial presentation of home missions now being made with stereopticons by the touring parties of the American Christian Missionary Society, nothing is more impressive than the successive meeting houses of the same congregation. Many of our historic churches that now occupy splendid modern buildings show on the walls of these pictures of their earlier structures. But between the erection of these church houses a generation passed.

Things are moving faster in the twentieth century. In rapid-fire line we behold the tent of the home missionary, the small frame church, the larger brick and the superb stone temple. But instead of generations, we are told that periods of only two to five years have elapsed in this marvelous progress. So it was in East Orange, N. J., Pensacola, Fla., and many another field.

Last year the preachers of the American Christian Missionary Society organized 158 congregations at stragetic points. The number can be doubled in this Centennial year if we will but double the resources. Formerly America had a thin frontier line on the west. Today it is frontier all over for the New Testament plea.

The Incoming Tide.

The million-a-year flow of immigrants which was cut down last year to a quarter of a million is now running in even greater volume than before. The United States authorities are inspecting the arrivals more closely than ever, and most of us are learning that even the south of Europe is furnishing splendid raw material for American citizens. Who was not impressed by the intelligence and gratitude of our New York Italians' response to the assistance sent to the earthquake sufferers?

Seeking the old Paths.

In the Centennial city twenty converts have already been won among our foreigners in the year and a half that Basil S. Keusseff has been among them. Three or four of these are preparing to preach. Their zeal for the New Testament standards repeats that of the pioneers a hundred years ago. The same intense loyalty is manifest among the Scandinavians of the Northwest, and the Russians and Jews of New York city. A new era for home missions is dawning with the Centennial. Let our Centennial offering the first Lord's Day in May show that we appreciate the magnitude of our opportunities.

From the Centennial City

And now the Centennial secretary, W. R. Wane, backed by the W. P. C. M. S. will publish a weekly paper until after the Centennial. Then it is the hope of the promoters that enough of grip will have been secured to keep the paper going. For such a time as this, a paper is absolutely necessary in order to keep the forces united and awake to the demands of the hour. "Centennial Harbinger" is suggested as the name of this new paper.

A pastor is to be secured for Butler and $650 devoted to that field. New Kensington is to be cared for by the C. W. B. M. G. A. Maldon has done a fine work at Big Run, closing his meeting with fifty-six additions. Percy A. Davis has a grip on Duquesne that counts. From a disorganized and ineffective body when he took hold he has succeeded in the first three months of this year in adding ninety new members and above all in inspiring the dispirited body with a new hope.

Evangelist Percy H. Wilson quits his work in the state July 1, 1909. A clean, strong man, he will do a substantial work wherever he goes.

Beaver, Beaver Falls, Charlevoi and Turtle Creek are in a contest. It is provoking all to do their very best. We will have occasion to speak of it later.

A home rally at East End Christian Church took the place of the usual Monday preachers' meeting. O. H. Philips.

Bissell Block, Pittsburg, April 6, 1909.

Centennial Bible School

One of our Centennial aims is "All the church and as many more in the Bible-school." Have we lost sight of it?

A Centennial Bible-school is one that enrolls twice as many as appear on the church books ,and this double enrollment must include all the actual members of Christ's body, but not necessarily those who have a name to live and are dead. The following are reported as "Centennial Bible-schools": Bolengi, Africa; Tabernacle, North Tonacanda, N. Y.; Bellefontaine, Ohio; Alexandria, Ind.; Fourth, Akron, Ohio; Cameron, W. Va.; Jubblepore, India; Rowland Street, Syracuse, N. Y.; Third, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Camo Washington, Cincinnati, Ohio; Tuxedo, Washington, D. C.; Santa Barbara, Cal.

Do you know of any others? What school will be the next on the list? What others have done, you can do. What will you do?

The first thing that the church in Jerusalem did was to resolve itself into a Bible-school, for, "they continued steadfastly in the apostles' teaching." This whole church was in the Bible-school. Shall we not begin where they began? Shall we doubt that they were guided in this matter by the Holy Spirit? Shall we accept the fact as indicated by the Holy Spirit and ordered by the Lord? If so, our duty is plain. The first concern of the church is to get every member into the Bible-school to study the word of God.

At a recent conference of state Bible-school superintendents with the National superintendent in St. Louis, it was agreed that we should renew our emphasis upon this Centennial aim, and to urge that a multitude of schools realize it before the Pittsburg convention. The organized adult class is helping to make it possible. Are you ready to make this aim the first concern of your church? Report your success to the undersigned.

Marion Stevenson,
National Superintendent of Bible-schools.

A Springtime Wish

Isabel Ecclestone Mackay in April St. Nicholas.

O, to be a robin
In the Spring!
When the fleeting days of April
Are a-wing,
And the air is sweet with knowing
Where the nidden buds are growing,
And the merry winds are going Wandering!

O, to be a robin
With a nest
Built upon the budding branches—
East or West!
Just to swing and sway and dangle
Far from earth and all its tangle,
Joining in the gay bird jangle
With a zest!

O, to be a robin—
Just to sing!
Not to have the pain of hating
Anything—
Just to race the foremost swallow
Over hill and over hollow—
And the joy of life to follow
Through the Spring!

SICK DOCTOR

Proper Food Put Him Right.

The food experience of a physician in his own case when worn and weak from sickness and when needing nourishment the worst way is valuable:

"An attack of grip, so severe it came near making an end of me, left my stomach in such condition I could not retain any ordinary food. I knew of course that I must have food nourishment or I could never recover.

"I began to take four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts and cream three times a day and for two weeks this was almost my only food; it tasted so delicious that I enjoyed it immensely and my stomach handled it perfectly from the first mouthful. It was so nourishing I was quickly built back to normal health and strength.

"Grape-Nuts is of great value as food to sustain life during serious attacks in which the stomach is so deranged it cannot digest and assimilate other foods.

"I am convinced that were Grape-Nuts more widely used by physicians, it would save many lives that are otherwise lost from lack of nourishment."

Absolutely the most perfect food in the world. Trial of Grape-Nuts 10 days proves. "There's a Reason."

HOME MISSIONS, MAY 2nd.

Every church in our great brotherhood should make an offering for Home Missions this year. The future success of the Disciples of Christ depends upon our attitude toward the opportunities of the hour. Sixteen western states are being repopulated. Two hundred and fifty millions of acres of arid land are being prepared for settlement under the irrigation projects of the Government.

There never was a time of greater opportunity for the Church of Christ. To enter now means prestige, cheap building lots, economy of men, money and labor. To neglect means irreparable loss. To delay means increased cost when we essay to enter later. To enter now means the multiplication of resources. 162 Mission Churches in America sent $8,000 to our Missionary Boards last year. Multiply the churches and you multiply the receipts for all purposes.

We can only enter the East by way of the West. Missionary work in the East is expensive, very expensive. It takes longer to get a footing; it takes more money to buy property. While building up one substantial mission in the crowded East we can build three or a half-dozen in the West. Multiply the churches in the West, where men are growing rich in a day, where the enterprises of the church are intimately related to the community life, and the money will flow back to the Home Board for the evangelization of the East.

But East and West, North and South, the heroic bands of pioneer brethren cry importunately for the brotherhood's help. Two hundred and fifty claims upon our fellowship and sympathy—they were on file in the office of the Home Board February 1st. Every week the number increases. Carrying on work already begun in almost every state of the Union and in nearly every province of Canada, The American Christian Missionary Society feels that these clamorous appeals from the new fields should be laid upon the consciences of the whole church. We are unable to give any hope of succor to these struggling brethren. Unless the May Offering shall far exceed the receipts from the churches last year, many, if not all applicants from new fields must be denied this year.

Can we afford to inspire the cause so much? Dare we take a step in retreat? Shall we not be held responsible for what we are able to do and do not undertake? Our Centennial year should be marked by some signal undertaking that emphasizes our plea and our potency, bringing up every church and enlisting every Disciple. To establish a thousand new churches in the West would mean more to our cause in the next five years than any single undertaking.

The "Home Board" appeals for $250,000 for the stupendous million-dollar enterprise committed to its hands. Will the preachers and the people answer the appeal the first Lord's Day in May? Letters upon the subject and all remittances should be sent to

The Christian Century

Vol. XXVI. CHICAGO, ILL., APRIL 22, 1909. No. 17.

Is Protestantism a Failure?

It is one of the commonplaces of Protestant utterance in our generation that the Roman church is failing to accomplish satisfactorily the work of Christianity in the communities where it holds sway. The character of its ministry, the formal nature of its worship, the ignorance in which it tends to hold its people, the divisions within its own ranks, and the conservatism of its teaching on most of the questions relating to biblical truth and Christian doctrine, all lend themselves as arguments in support of the Protestant contention. When to this is added the perception of Rome's constant effort to secure additional privilege and authority, it is not strange that Protestants should be uneasy and feel that the price of liberty is constant vigilance in their contention with the Roman church.

At the same time it must be conceded that Rome has almost an equally valid thesis against Protestantism. It is not simply the fact that Rome has never forgiven the almost fatal blow that the Reformation struck. It is rather the fact that Rome remains unconvinced that Protestantism has ever accomplished the things it set out to do or that these anticipated reforms were really of value in the doing.

It is a well known historical fact that many wise men in Europe, who were quite out of sympathy with the corruption of the Roman church in the days when Martin Luther raised his protest, were still of the firm belief that time and the spirit of God within that church would remedy these evils. Erasmus was of this number, as we know, and ceased not to regret to his dying day that a breach had been made in the wall of Christendom by forces from within the church itself. He wrote in 1521: "Luther has made a prodigious stir. There is some slight hope from Pope Leo; but if the enemies of light are to have their way we may write on the tomb of a ruined world 'Christ did not rise again.'" To his mind it was clear that the church always contained enough vital reformatory spirit to correct her own defects and eradicate her evils. He pointed to the great forerunners of the Reformation, Wycliff, John Huss, Savonarola, and others, as the best proofs that Rome could never settle into sluggish superstition and sloth without being aroused by her own militant prophets to a sense of her duty. This thesis seemed in a measure sustained by the fact that Rome's greatest argument against the Lutheran Reformation was the Counter Reformation of Ignatius Loyola and his followers, who wrought within the Roman church reforms of far-reaching and astonishing character.

The one primary and fundamental charge which Rome has ever brought against Protestantism is that of the sin of disunion. This sin, in the mind of the Roman Catholic Church, is the heresy of all heresies. It broke into fragments that apparently impressive and beautiful unity which the church had enjoyed from the second century onward. This fact Rome can neither overlook nor forgive. And still further does it urge the futility of Protestantism in the fact that the original schism created by the Lutheran movement has been successfully followed by a multitude of others by which Protestantism has dissipated its strength and created the spectacle of a hopelessly divided church.

But these are not the only signs of weakness in Protestantism. It is an easy thing to reply to Roman Catholic taunts that divisions, caused by Protestantism and probably inevitable after the Protestant claim to freedom of conscience was admitted, have been but trifling as compared with the advantages gained from the destruction of that tyranny which Rome had imposed upon the spirit of Christendom. And this is the true answer. Better the tragedy of division than the unity of death. Protestantism has no apologies to make for its insistence on the right to think freely and clearly concerning the program of Christianity. The corruption and ecclesiasticism of Rome made the Protestant revolt inevitable, as it seems to unbiased students of history.

But Protestantism has more serious charges to face than those which Rome is hurling at her. And one of the most promising features of the situation is that her critics are of her own household and therefore are committed to the task of her redemption.

There are certain outstanding weaknesses of the non-Catholic churches which every observer must recognize. One of them is the lack of authority in the Protestant churches. This is not merely the absence of a central and strong organization. The day for that kind of authority is past and forever past. There is no longer any authority that can rule safely and permanently in the church of Christ that is not based upon recognition of fundamental harmony with the spirit of truth and enlightenment. But the point at which the loss of authority among the Protestant churches is most keenly felt is in their failure to duly impress the modern age with a message containing a note not only of persuasion but of command. Protestantism to too large a degree seeks to gratify, amuse, entreat, cajole, and sometimes, though rarely, to threaten the modern mind into acquiescence. Seldom does it rise with a sense of supreme and divine testimony to an authoritative note in its proclamations. No one can fail to recognize this lack in the preaching of today. Rome has still the semblance of an external authority with which to compel obedience. Protestantism, lacking this, must have a vital note of urgency or else totally fail to accomplish its purpose.

Again Protestantism does not unify the family in the service of God. It has been the glory of the Roman church and of the Jewish synagogue that both have laid constant and insistent emphasis upon the family as a unit in the church. Protestantism has most signally failed at this very point. To be sure, the Pedobaptist churches recognize the child as having some share in the regard and oversight of the church even from his earliest years. Even this element of family concern is missed by Baptists and Disciples who in their protest against the unscriptural admission of infants into the church by baptism have practically cut off all the earlier years of the child from the obligation of Christian nurture by the church. At the best the Sunday-school can be only a device and a partially successful device if the church as such forgets its obligation to the little child.

Once more Protestantism loses hold of the child in his maturer adolescence at the very point where he is most needed and most capable of direct instruction. That moment at which the average child is likely to drop out of our Sunday-school is the moment of crisis in his spiritual life. Romanism has long recognized this. Protestantism is slowly awakening to the enormous losses it has sustained from it lack of interest in the family as such.

And this leads promptly to the third weakness which is found in its almost total neglect of religious education outside of the church proper. Romanism has always insisted that the child's education must be religious and not merely secular and, therefore, it has been at pains and expense to maintain schools in which, on however incomplete a scale, this religious instruction is provided. Protestantism, while insisting upon a higher grade of secular instruction, has been content to allow the religious element to fall almost tatally out of account, so that the Bible is more and more regarded as an impossible book in the curriculum of the public school, and any attempt to incorporate direct religious or even ethical teaching in the ordinary school is frowned upon as likely to be sectarian and bigoted. The result is that the younger generation of Protestant life tends to comply almost ideally with the demands of the secularist, the agnostic, and the atheist who wish to have no instruction whatever in the field of morals or religion.

When to these facts, too patent to be ignored, there is added the open scandal of division in the Protestant churches, a division which is not only uneconomical but absolutely piratical in the rivalries it breeds and the losses it entails, it may be easily seen that if Protestantism is not doomed to ultimate failure and extinction by its very wastefulness as well as by its other failures which are draining its life, it must pass out of its present imperfect and devitalized condition into some more adequate expression of the church of Jesus Christ in the world. It has lost its first passionate and protestant mood which gave such power in its early days and which, in a measure, has given power to each of the denominations as they have arisen to protest against current conditions and to point the way of return to the primitive and essential church. It is now in the attitude either of passive and selfish enjoyment of its inherited estate or of weak and petulant complaint against the spirit of an age which it finds itself no longer capable of meeting and mastering. It is clear that this cannot be the end of the matter. The future of the Christian faith does not lie with Romanism. It takes an optimist of the most confirmed and incorrigible nature to believe, on the other hand, that that future lies with the present ineffectual and divided Protestantism. There must be a more excellent way. Perhaps the modern spirit in the Roman Catholic church and desire for unity in Protestantism point the direction in which the future of our faith lies, a future not divided but unified, not impotent but commanding.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

THE ELIXIR OF FRESH AIR

We are discovering that the real elixir of life is fresh air. It is curing tuberculosis and proving the sovereign remedy for that most terrible of quick maladies, pneumonia. It is the sick room's first medicine and the ounce of prevention that is worth pounds of cure. We are told to avoid heated rooms and never leave the windows unopened. "Catching cold" is really catching hot. The art of medicine is becoming less a specific and more a prophylactic. The Chinese pay their doctors, it is said, so long as they are well and stop the fees when they get ill. We shall soon be doing more of something like that. We will spend our money for sanitation more than for medical practice. We will have more Woods Hutchinsons to tell us how to keep healthy by avoiding the pitfalls of disease. And before all else comes fresh air. To keep warm we do not need to keep fetid. We will build our homes so they will warm fresh air and save the drug bills instead of rewarming poisoned air to save coal bills. We will build our churches about a system of ventilation and acoustics instead of tossing those requisites in as an afterthought and using whatever money is left to provide for them. No eloquence can cope with the anæsthetic of carbon dioxide. The best antidote for stupor and drowsiness is found to be, not a nap but a deep breath of fresh air. Sunlight and fresh air are poison to the germs of most diseases.

A SOCIAL MIASMA

Here is the problem of the city. Children born in and bred in East London are far below the normal in physique. The crowded tenement is the plague spot of modern civilization. Some day we will look upon the slum as we today look upon the mosquito infested swamps and pools of the yellow fever regions. When sociology has finally convinced us that we perform the first public duty by preventing ills and that any governmental measure is good that compels men to provide against the laws of disease, we will abolish the slum. How we will abolish it we may not know but we do know that if it is a menace it can be done, and that it will be done when we consider its abolition of more consequence than any or all of the things which operate to make it possible. It may strike hard at private ownership and speculation in city lots and at the five cent fare, but once it is made a police power all scruples will flee before the necessity of action just as it had to flee before Uncle Sam's sanitary engineers in Havana.

CHARITY THE FORERUNNER

It is the task of philanthropy to lead the way. Once the public is convinced of the betterment it will relieve charity of the task and make it a legitimate act of government. The cities are providing play-grounds today. Five years ago the social settlements provided them altogether. Jacob Riis arose to the eminence of a social inventor when he turned Mulberry Bend into a small park, but soon the cities will be providing them at any cost and within walking distance of every child. Pingree was laughed at when he originated the "potato patch" idea, but everywhere cities are turning to the unemployed with some such scheme to use the vacant lot.

One of the latest is the work of Hull House in providing "Summer Gardens" near to crowded quarters and teaching city folk to raise their own garden vegetables and flowers on vacant tracts set apart for the purpose. They have twenty acres near the McCormick factories, provided by the assistance of the Harvester people, and 100 acres more will be available. A bungalow will be built for tools and shelter, a gardener will be employed to teach the uniniated, grass borders will set apart the plots, and out of doors recreation, with an eye to usefulness, will be encouraged. John Ruskin thought it conducive to moral as well as physical health to dig and delve in mother earth.

WHEN CHICAGO SOLD HER BIRTHRIGHT

Chicago was flung by the fates onto a swampy lake shore. She has turned the swamp into a city of healthfulness, made the sluggish rivers "run swiftly up hill" by turning their polluting currents from the beautiful lake into cleansing streams, by them opened the way for the commerce of an industrial empire. But she sold her birthright. She allowed a railroad to monopolize her lake front. In her youthful days she did no city building; like Topsy, she just grew. Her fathers little realized what the future would bring. Today they are planning a subway for a future of six millions. But the birthright, the beautiful lake front, is in the hands of the crafty Jacob of commerce. He shuts off communication with it, stifles its pure air with smoke, makes its pleasant sands terrible with the rumbling wheels of freight trains, and claims, by legal right, as his own what nature designed for all the people and for the beautification of the city.

Thus it comes about that the city must spend millions to fill in the lake beach and make an artificial park. To make poor recompense for the sandy beach she will doubtless build expensive piers out into the waters she has driven back into the deep. If ever she compels the railroad to go underground and claims the right of way into her newly builded recreation ground it will cost her other millions for she cannot confiscate property she has legally surrendered.

Many prints have shown us pictures of Rio Janerio's sea front. She has turned her natural opportunity into a thing of beauty and joy forever. One wonders whether or not she has shut off considerable portions for the benefit of those alone who can ride in soft tired vehicles and dress in silks and satins and feast sumptuously every day.

THE BIAS OF THE JUDGES.

Appellate judges are not necessarily more learned than those on humbler benches. Yet they reverse the decisions of the humbler interpreters of the law constantly. Appeal is warranted where jurisdiction requires it or where the calmness that a remote tribunal brings may take a question of law out of the hands of untrained jurymen and put it into the hands of competent barristers. Questions of strict interpretation also need that expert construction which the eminence of the supreme bench is supposed to guarantee. But how often is appeal simply for the purpose of wearing out justice with superior ability to spend money or to merely get another chance by casting a dice on the judicial velvet of varying opinion.

In these days it is notorious that a corporation prefers its case be finally settled in a federal court. State judges are near the people and they hear their master's voice and reflect the opinions and desires of the citizenship. Federal judges are eminent lawyers or lawyer politicians who have been corporation attorneys. This will be found true in a large majority of cases. They may be ever so honorable and high minded, but a man will reflect the bias of his associations and interests. Corporations engage the best legal talent and their ability to pay big fees gets for them the best. Then the best legal talent is chosen for high judicial position and the eminent attorney who was a corporation lawyer becomes the eminent judge and brings his conscious or unconscious bias with him and sits on the same kind of a case he was wont heretofore to defend. So the government fails before its own courts.

A striking recent case is afforded in Judge McPherson's ruling in the Missouri Two Cent Fare Case. The State Railroad Commission investigated thoroughly and reported that with the exception of one or two short lines the railroads of the state had made larger profits under a two than a three cent fare. Judge McPherson rules that these same rates are confiscatory and nullifies the law. The difference was in the basis of judgment. McPherson thinks the railroads should have 6 per cent over and above all bonded indebtedness and on watered stock and all. The Commission thought a lower profit requisite.

Another recent illustration of the bias of the judge is given us in the Standard Oil Case. Judge Landis so ruled regarding the admission of evidence that the jury easily found guilt, and the judge thought the famous $29,000,000 fine not only legal, but hardly adequate to the measure of the offense. Judge Anderson takes the same case with the same evidence and so rules out evidence that it is impossible for the jury to make a finding of guilt and the corporation is legally justified in what the other judge and practically the entire public believed to be a gigantic conspiracy in restraint of trade.

What is the remedy? This at least is obvious. The judges elected by the people are more responsive to that popular demand that makes law and knows what it intended the law to be. If the spirit that demanded a law is reflected in the law, then the spirit of the judge who interprets the law will be safer if it too is a reflection of the spirit of the people. With the trend toward non-partisan judicial elections would it not be better and more American to elect all our judges?

EDITORIAL

Through a misunderstanding the next article in the series on the Springfield revival was last week announced to appear in this issue. Our purpose, however, is to wait until next week to make report of the way the churches of that city deal with the great problem created by the Sunday campaign.

* * *

The American churches must provide the men and money for the evangelization of the world from this time forth. The more churches we establish in America, the more money and the more men we have for the task given us in the uttermost parts. Every church established on American soil becomes an instant supporter of every missionary agency. It pays to establish the cause of Christ in America.

The Home Missionary Secretaries of the United States in general council have adopted the uniform letter head showing America as the radiating center of tremendous influence reaching out to the uttermost parts of the earth and bearing the words "America a Field—a Force." No more splendid motto could be adopted. America is today the ripest missionary field upon the globe. Money spent in America brings immediate and permanent returns carrying ever-increasing potency of American Missions into the farthest reaches of the earth.

We do not like to "point with pride" too often to the work of our department contributors, but we cannot allow any careless reader to overlook the work of Mr. Maclachlan on Teacher Training without giving warning that he is missing a series of most important and illuminating articles. The chapters now being printed on the psychology of teaching, present this difficult aspect of the subject in the most lucid way we have ever seen. Any reader who may not be expert in the science of psychology will find Mr. Maclachlan's statement an ideal one to begin with, rendering as it does into simple terms the subtle and difficult principles of this highly interesting science.

The Biblical World for April opens with an editorial on Religious Education and Social Duty, a comment upon the recent Convention of the Religious Education Association. Professor Irving F. Wood, whose "Biblical Doctrine of the Holy Spirit" is well known, writes on the relation of this theme to present religious life. Professor C. W. Votaw discusses the conversion and early ministry of Paul, covering the ground of the Sunday-school lessons for the current month. Other interesting articles are "The Spirit of Freedom in the Law," by A. R. Gordon; "Communion With God in the Bible," by Professor McFayden; "Aenon near to Salim," by Professor Bacon of Yale, and "The Nestorian Tablet," by Professor Goodspeed.

"Charities and the Commons," the journal published by Professor Graham Taylor and his colleagues in the interest of social uplift, has changed its name. "The Survey" is the new title. One of the very notable achievements of this journal during the past few months has been the industrial and social report on the city of Pittsburg. The results of this great task were published in the January, February, and March numbers of Charities and the Commons. These numbers are among the most interesting materials that have been submitted for the consideration of social workers in the generation. They are profusely illustrated and are not only full of information of the most timely character, but are works of art in themselves. Other cities, profiting by the splendid results of this survey, are preparing to have similar work done. It is only the trained and disciplined sociologist who is competent to undertake such an exacting task. But that it has been done with splendid skill and accuracy in the case of Pittsburg no one will question who looks over these fascinating pages.

The Secretaries of the Home Board report that they have now on file more than 200 applications for help on the Home field, and which they are unable to give favorable consideration. At the height of prosperous times the work of the Home field was greatly enlarged, but when the panic overtook us it was found necessary to adopt a rule declining to make any new appropriations until money was more plentiful. For this reason it is not possible to answer the appeals which come from every part of the country early in the missionary year. The Secretaries are looking forward to the Home Offering in May when they hope that such a hearty response will come from the churches that not only these appeals, but all others made during the current year may be promptly answered.

A correspondent who strongly dislikes Billy Sunday, the evangelist, and regards his work with cynicism, writes to criticise us for giving so much space in recent issues to the Springfield revival. He says there are other cities in which great revivals are held, why give such prominence to this particular one? Our answer is simply that Springfield is a typical city, that it is near enough for us to visit often, that we are acquainted with religious and civic conditions there, and are thus in a position to write with confidence of the things we see and hear. Were Des Moines as accessible as Springfield we probably would have chosen to furnish our readers with a story of the great Scoville meeting held there recently. From the many letters on the other side of the subject we are assured that our readers are following the Springfield articles with the keenest interest.

"Religious Education" is now issued in an improved and enlarged form and contains not only articles on the usual themes to which that journal has devoted itself for the past two years, but gives as well a portion of the addresses delivered at the recent Convention of the Religious Education Association held in this city. It is now the policy of "Religious Education" to include its Convention addresses in the journal rather than to publish them in a separate volume, although they may be secured in bound form by the members of the Association who desire them. The April number of "Religious Education" contains the President's Address of Professor Peabody; The Annual Survey of Progress by Professor Coe; Miss Jane Addams' paper on the Reaction of Modern Life upon Religious Development, and more than a dozen additional addresses delivered at the Convention. In addition there is given one of the most valuable features ever included in the publications of the Association. This is an index to all the literature printed by the Association since February, 1903. This index is an indispensable help to the satisfactory use of the annual volumes of the Association.

The name of a writer in the Hibbert Journal for April, would have passed into historic renown had he lived in the days of the Nicene Fathers or even at the time the Westminster Confession was made. Sadly these divines had to confess that their doctrine of the Trinity was both true and incomprehensible. That the three persons are each Almighty and yet together constitute but one Almighty, that each of the persons is equal to the one composed by all, were propositions which faith had to accept against the protests of reason. This current writer brings what he calls "a message from mathematics to theology," undertaking to show that the venerable creed is rigorously thinkable. He does even more than is asked, by showing that if the one were asserted to be, instead of a trinity of persons, a multiplicity of order 4 or 7 or n, the proposition would still be mathematically provable. Happily for us, faith today does not concern itself vitally with the doctrine of the Trinity and, therefore, unhappily for this ingenious writer, his contribution is too late to bring him the fame his ingenuity deserves.

The Immortal Life

Leading Thinkers of Today Re-enforce Faith in the Life Hereafter

By Edward Scribner Ames

Several influences conspire to lessen emphasis upon the subject of immortality in our day. The tendency is to occupy ourselves with the actual world of tangible and definable experience. Not only natural science and materialistic commercialism does this, but our practical institutional type of religion does it. The Ingersoll Lectureship at Harvard has contributed several little books upon immortality.* They are all by scientists and philosophers, and they all deal with the subject in full consciousness of the modern world and in sympathy with its spirit. Several of the lecturers confess only slight interest in the subject, but deal with it because they are requested to and because evidently many people want to know what thinking men now-a-days can say about it. It is noticeable that none of them seek to settle the matter by scriptural teaching. They prefer rather the "dry light" of reason and science. Yet none of them takes a stand against the claims of the future life. It is at least significant of the true scientific temper here displayed that it does not conceive that to be impossible which cannot be positively proved. Indeed, those who are accustomed to regard all philosophy and science inimical to the belief in immortality may be quite surprised to find so much sympathy with the doctrine, and in some cases, actual endeavors to remove objections held against it in the name of science.

Views of Three Harvard Professors.

I will indicate here in the most summary fashion only, the views of three Harvard professors, two of whom appeared in the lectureship referred to, while the third, Professor Munsterberg, published an article on the subject recently. Professor Munsterberg, Josiah Royce and William James are conspicuous writers in the fields of psychology and philosophy. James and Royce are probably the most notable figures in psychology and philosophy in this country today.

Professor Munsterberg is an experimental psychologist. His treatment is in the form of a conversation with a friend as they sit before the fire after returning from the funeral of a companion. The argument is perhaps the most abstract and the least persuasive of those to be mentioned here. It proceeds upon the idealistic doctrine that space and time are forms which our consciousness gives to the world of material objects. But consciousness itself, which employs these forms, is above them, and is itself neither in time or space. In our truest nature, in our thought, and in the exercise of our wills, we are already beyond the limitations of time. "The personality which shapes the objects in its thought creates not only the conception of causality, but in that same act the form of time which is to embrace all causal processes of the world. Past, present and future mean simply attitudes of the personality toward its objects." The world of values, of our appreciation, is thus represented as independent of the biological processes of birth and death. In our conscious world of moral values we possess absolute reality, secure against all changes of cause and effect, of time and space. "In eternity," therefore, "lies the reality of our friend, who will never sit with us again here at the fireplace. I do not think that I should love him better if I hoped that he might be somewhere waiting through space and time to meet us again. . . . The man we love was not in space and time; he fought his life of strife and achievement as a subject which calls not for our perception with its standards of causality, space, and time, but for our interpretation with its standard of agreement, of values, of ideals.

Royce Emphasizes Individual Uniqueness.

Professor Royce also presents an argument in terms of idealism but in a somewhat different way. His argument is elaborated in terms of the uniqueness of the individual. This uniqueness is not disclosed in sense perception. We are never able to express completely what it is that makes one face different from another. In the world of personalities the uniqueness is still greater. There is a kind of "hermitage of the soul" which baffles all intimacies and all efforts at self revelation. We not only are puzzled by the queerness of strangers but of our friends. And it not only escapes our power of explanation and remains a kind of ultimate fact for our thinking—it is also something in which our affections and our wills rejoice. The mother says, "There is no other child quite like my child," and the lover says, "There is no other love like my love." Still one cannot state in terms of science just the ground and nature of this exceptional being. It is not conformable to knowledge or to science. It is something experienced in our will. The real world of our experience is a world in which objects are means or ends for will. They can only be understood with reference to its purposes and intentions. From the standpoint of the will, things have individuality and meaning. And the philosopher seeks to show how the ends which our wills create involve a system of reality in which individuality is ultimate and unique. Each person finds himself in this view carried over to a conception of an infinite Being in whom and for whom he exists

Simply stated, it may be put thus: the world is a unique whole for God. But every part of a unique whole must itself be unique. Therefore each individuality has ultimate and final meaning in the total scheme of things. "Just as, in case a given cathedral is unique, and has not its equal in all the world of being, then every stone and every arch and every carving in that cathedral is unique, by having its one place in that whole, just so, too, in the universe, if the whole is the expression of the single and absolute will, every fragment of life therein has its unique place in the divine life,—a place that no other fragment could fill."

Professor James' Pragmatic Standpoint.

Professor James deals with two objections to belief in immortality. One is founded on the modern discovery of the correlation of consciousness with brain action. It is now a commonplace that a disturbance of the brain function affects consciousness. A blow upon the head may put an end to it. A cup of coffee stimulates cerebral activity and one's wits. Drugs, such as alcohol and ether, likewise have marked results for mental action. The localization of different kinds of consciousness in different brain centers confirms the theory and fortifies the objection. That is, when one center is stimulated, one has visual consciousness or sees things. When another center is aroused, one hears. It is accordingly contended that the action of the brain produces consciousness, and therefore when the brain is destroyed, consciousness ceases.

But James insists this is not the only view of the possible relation between the brain and consciousness consistent with all the known facts of physiological psychology. He holds that it is just as logical to suppose that instead of being productive the brain is really transmissive of consciousness. As the prism transmits light in beautiful colors, so the brain may be precisely the organ through which consciousness streams. Or again, it may be like the action of the keys of the organ which, when pressed, release the air from the air-chest and produce sound.

In this view, then, it is at least conceivable that the individual is surrounded by a vast sea of consciousness, and that the brain is the point at which the veil is thin, the place where the supersensuous world of thought penetrates into the dim sphere of our existence. In times of intense brain activity, under the control of normal conditions, the great sea pours its waters into our little life most freely. The demands of science are held not to be compromised or ignored by this view, though of course it is presented only as an hypothesis and not as a demonstrated fact. Its force is great enough, however, to effectively check the dogmatism of a negative view.

Immortality of Sub-human Beings.

The other objection is that which arises with the discovery of the vast number of beings to whom immortality must be allowed if it is claimed for ourselves. The modern historical sense, aided by a new estimate of the age of the human race and of the world, overpowers the imagination with a realization of the incalculable number of human beings who have lived. The doctrine of evolution requires one to take into account countless savage ancestors of all civilized races. And they are not altogether lovely beings. The notion that all the Hottentots, Australians and Chinamen who have ever lived should be admitted to our heaven,—or even to our hell—is too much. And the result is that many people, paralyzed by such a mass of human beings, conclude it is impossible. They regard the generations of men as the leaves of the human forest, which return in their own time to the earth. "Life is a good thing on a reasonably copious scale; but the very heavens themselves, and the cosmic times and spaces, would stand aghast, we think, at the notion of preserving eternally such an ever-swelling plethora and glut of it."

But after all, this objection, according to Professor James, rests upon a certain blindness in human nature—that blindness by which we are so often unable to appreciate the inner life of other people. Because peoples' dress, language and customs are different from our own, we fail to discover the inner warmth and aspiration of their lives. Our imagination is dull and unresponsive toward these foreigners. But in reality they have a very lively and eager interior life. "Each of these grotesque or even repulsive aliens is animated by an inner joy of living as hot or hotter than that which you feel beating in your private breast."

We easily fall into the error of supposing that some law of the conservation of energy applies to the mental life. But this can hardly be. It is not true that the balance of just a specific amount of consciousness must be kept in the world. It does not happen that every time a man wakes up another has to go to sleep; or that when one is born another must die. Spiritual life does not crowd and jostle like cattle at the gate. The world never seems sated with an oversupply of conscious life, but on the contrary "the demand for the supply is there the moment the supply comes into being, for the beings supplied demand their own continuance." As theists, the author says, we can say that God has so inexhaustible a capacity for love that his call and need is for a literally endless accumulation of created lives. "He can never faint or grow weary, as we should, under the increasing supply. His scale is infinite in all things. His sympathy can never know satiety or glut."

A Democratic Heaven.

This leads to a more democratic view of the hereafter. It is a striking fact that religious ideas of the future have been quite exclusive and aristocratic—only Christians, and then only our particular brand, could be sure of eternal life. The poor heathen and the naked savages were ignored or only vaguely considered at all. But now our heavens must undergo a kind of Copernican and Galilean expansion like that which has set the cosmic spaces out into such abysmal vastness and immensity. "Let us put our hand over our mouth, like Job, and be thankful that in our personal littleness we ourselves are here at all. The Deity that suffers us, we may be sure, can suffer many another queer and wondrous and only half-delightful thing. . . . If we feel a significance in our own life which would lead us spontaneously to claim its perpetuity, let us be at least tolerant of like claims made by other lives, however numerous, however unideal they may seem to us to be. Let us at any rate not decide adversely on our own claim, whose grounds we feel directly, because we cannot decide favorably on the alien claims, whose grounds we cannot feel at all. That would be letting blindness lay down the law to sight."

Good Citizenship

By Jasper Seaton Hughes.

Good citizenship is something that every good man esteems from his heart. It is quite impossible to entirely divorce our Christian life from the civil obligations which Providence has laid upon us. The democratic idea of government, rising from the people, makes it as important that the people should know the truth and avoid deception as it was that kings should know the truth, which was of seldom occurrence, for liars, called courtiers, were always several layers deep around their courts. Besides, as the people have more sentiment and feeling than kings have, it lays them also liable to the deceptions of demagogues and so endangers civil ruptures and bloodshed, of which our new country has been made fully aware and had a taste.

Take an illustration. There is now going on all over our country the beginnings of a revolution of which 90 per cent of our church members are densely ignorant, and in addition are deceived into believing it is a mere side show, an incident, a temporary affair.

The real contest is going on between the liquor power as a national, political and commercial organization, and the nationally organized anti-license or prohibition men.

There are more than 90 per cent of Christian men who never read a journal on either side of the question. Most of them do not know that there are great journals published by the synagogue of the stills, nor read those of the patriots of good will to men, who oppose the license sin.

They all hear much of a superficial skirmish going on between "wets" and "drys," a designation of the saloons that makes water dry and alcohol (the very dryest thing), wet, and they read the superficial newspaper accounts of it and the faint imitation of the secular press in church journals.

But the newspapers are on neutral grounds, and so are 90 per cent of the church members, and to the main question at stake, even those who vote out the saloons are also on neutral grounds in fact, though they may not know it, and even deny it.

The church press shows no strong disposition to set Christian men right and influenced on this question. It has in it "the depths of Satan" and the fight at the bottom is not seen and can not be seen or understood from Christian journals that get their ideas from neutral, or what try to be, sources. I hoped when a number of bright young scholars joined themselves to THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY, able and glad to give us the best thought on religious matters within the accepted program, that they would also be equally brave and well influenced on a matter of so great concern to the church and nation as the leagued forces of the "poisoners general," and would give expert information that would lead honest men to consider their duties in the light of Christian citizenship. Up to date this hope has not been realized.

No man nor newspaper has any right to play the coward as against party prejudice any more than he would against personal lust. No man has any right to have or to hold party prejudice. He can not be honest and do so any more than he can have religious prejudice to hate his brother man.

No brave man has any inclination to pay any respect to any such prejudices. That the churches are full of prejudices may be so, but if so they have not repented of that dire sin which leads to all kinds of sin. If the press and the pulpit are going to preach let them preach repentance toward God and faith in Jesus Christ, who never had any prejudice and never can save any man so long as he is the slave of the demagogue or of the devil, whose mission it is to poison men's minds against the truth. There is no repentance outside the church and never can be till there is repentance inside, for judgment must begin at the house of God.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

Alexander Whyte's Message to the Soul

My correspondence deeply impresses me that there is among Christians a widespread hunger for knowledge and for piety. Our minds are made with far outreachings, and our souls are made with quenchless thirstings for God. Many write as to books and especially devotional books. A book is the tabulation of ascertained knowledge, or the record of the findings of a soul in its investigations and explanations.

What is a devotional book? Not a weak book. Not a sentimental, sloppy book. Not a book of lurid illustrations. Not one of pious platitudes. Not one written by an author who does not feel the stress and storm of life. Not by a saint who, having ceased to be tempted, writes patronizingly to the rest of mortals.

Devotional Book's Positive Strength.

No; far from all this! A great devotional book is one that makes a strong, direct, religious and personal appeal to the inner soul of the reader. The writer must have the most intimate possible fellowship with God, and he must also know well the spiritual nature of man. The average devotional book is likely to lack proportion; but the good devotional book never distorts life. It is true to man.

The devotional book does not argue. It wins its way by presenting the generally recognized virtues. It appeals to the universal heart, avoiding usually the partisan controversies of its day. Its word is the abiding eternal word. In it, deep calls unto deep. A few of the world's great devotional books have been the avenues of God's spirit to countless hearts. The really good devotional book has an abiding place in the church of Christ. Though creeds change, the devotional message of Augustine, of Law, of a' Kempis, of Taylor, of Pascal, of Theresa, of Bunyan, of Shepard, and that of each of the other ageless writers abides. Contentions are always temporary, prayers are enduring.

Gratitude to Favorite Writers.

A correspondent asks me to give the names of two or three of the best modern writers of devotional literature. This I gladly do. It is a joy to praise your friends. It is equally a joy to tell of those writers from whom you have received help. The cause of gratitude obligates us, too, to pass along the names of writers who have done us a great service.

We will do well to remember, however, that our tastes, works, degrees of preparation are very different. After several embarrassments in commending books to my friends I am growing a little chary of that exercise. I have learned long since that others will not measure their enthusiasm over any book by mine. What in books gives joy to one will sometimes give pain to another, or at least uneasiness.

Whyte First, Then Matheson.

Nevertheless there are some devotional writers that I think ought to and do speak to the common heart of the church. First among these I would place Alexander Whyte and second George Matheson.

There are four fields in which a great devotional writer should be strong. He must know the spiritual wealth of the Bible; he must know the spiritual wealth in the history of the church, with its long array of saints; he must know the workings of the soul, and he must know the ways of the comings and goings of God's spirit. In all these fields the venerable Alexander Whyte is at home. No other current devotional writer so grips me. Matheson is suggestive, but the waters of Dr. Whyte seem to come from a deeper fountain. In his studies he is no skimmer. I wonder if he was ever tempted to review books. That is one of the devil's pitfalls into which some of us have lost our souls; at least for thoroughness in meditation. Dr. Whyte masters his line of study. He studies and writes upon one character till he has exhausted him.

Proportion and Balance in His Writings.

Wonderfully well proportioned is he in his writings. He has the training and spirit that always keep him balanced, and he never loses himself to take a fling at any class of theologians of his time.

What shall I say of his writings? How shall I analyze his work? I shall but attempt it. Whenever I write of him I feel that I ought to simply quote him and to keep on quoting. What shall I quote? To choose is difficult. Here before me is his article or sermon entitled, "It is the Heart that makes the Theologian." I quote the opening sentences.

"Pectus facit theologum—that is to say, it is the heart that makes the theologian. Not the head. Not talent. Not learning. Not power of speaking. Not power of writing, Other men may be made without much heart. Men of scholarship may be made without much heart. Men of science may be made without much heart; but not men of religion. Not men of science even, according to Dr. Newman's eloquent argument entitled 'The Philosophical Temper first enjoined is the Gospel.' But be that as it may it is indisputable that it is the heart that makes the true theologian. Take Paul, the first and the best of theologians, take Athanasius the father of Christology, take Augustine, and take Luther, take Hooker, take Chalmers, and it was their heart, above all things else, that made them all what they were.

"But to begin with, what is a true theologian, and how does his heart come to make him what he is? Well, a theologian, a true theologian, is just that man whose whole discourse is of God. God is the greatest and the best of subjects on which the mind and the heart of any man can discourse. For God is love. And the seat and the throne of love in God and in man is the divine and the human heart. And consequently the more love any man has in his heart, the better able he will be to know God, and to discourse concerning God."

This is all the more valuable because it is from the pen of one who has a great brain. How true are his words.

A Bruised Conscience.

Here again is a discourse on the Latin proverb that God takes only the vilest and most worthless of men to make his greatest experiments upon them. There is with him no palliation of evil. Read this:

"But neither the mind nor the will, nor anything else that is within us, is so wounded, and so bruised, and so putrified as is our sinful conscience. Our sinful conscience makes our country desolate like Isaiah's country; and our city to be burned with fire like Jerusalem; it makes our city to be almost like Sodom to us and almost like unto Gomorrah. Now, I will speak to the man with the most torn and tortured conscience in this house of God this night, and he will hear me. What was it, sir, that so tore your conscience to such wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores as these? Come, and let us reason together—what was it? What was your very worst and most conscience-exasperating sin? Was it your breaking somebody's heart: somebody whose name for long years has been written in letters of hell-fire on your forehead? Was it ruining somebody's life? Was it beggaring some man that trusted you? Was it bringing your father's and your mother's gray hairs with sorrow to the grave? Or was it some still more scarlet and crimson sin than all these? For the sinfulness of some men's sins is simply unspeakable and unthinkable to any one but themselves and their victims. Well sir there is only one ointment in all the world that will close and bind up and mollify such a conscience as yours. But, blessed be God, there is such an 'ointment.' And Paul entrusted the name of that ointment to the elders of Ephesus; and perhaps he did so because there may have been one man like you in that session of saints who needed that ointment every day he lived. And the name of that conscience-healing ointment is nothing less than the Blood of God."

Light on all Great Subjects of Faith.

Space will not permit of more quotations. Of course he touches all the great subjects of our faith, such as God, sin, Christ, the soul, pain, prayer etc., and flashes upon them again and again much light. His pleadings for especial times to be given to prayer and meditation are numerous and happy. There is depth to all his writings, but not gloom. There is searching, personal preaching in them all, going terrifically after the evil in the individual heart, but nowhere is there bitterness or scolding, but rather sympathy and tenderness. Always he makes me to feel that the good is eternal and tremendously worth while.

There may be too much of Calvinism in his theology; but the important thing is that the spirit of God mightily breathes in the words of his pen. Long has he labored to enthrone Christ's will in the lives of men. The following lines are favorites with him:

"I worship Thee, sweet Will of God!
And all Thy ways adore,
And every day I live I seem
To love Thee more and more.

Thou wert the end, the blessed rule
Of Jesus' toils and tears;
Thou wert the passion of His heart
Those three and thirty years.

He always wins who sides with God,
To him no chance is lost;
God's will is sweetest to him when
It triumphs at his cost.

Ill that he blesses is our good,
And unblest good is ill;
And all is right that seems most wrong,
If it be His sweet Will!"

CENTENNIAL STUDIES

By Dr. Errett Gates

The Influence of the Disciples Upon Religious Life

In a previous article I cited the organic growth and numbers of the Disciples as an evidence of their success. But the success of a religious movement is very often represented by its influence upon either religious or national life and thought, rather than by its numerical strength.

In fact, no separate religious movement succeeds permanently until it becomes a part of the whole Christian movement; not until its characteristic contributions have become the common property of Christendom. So long as the faith and life of a religious movement remain peculiar and distinctive, just so long it fails of success. Christianity as a whole finds itself succeeding because it is being taken up into the social, political and ethical life of Western society. In other words, society is being Christianized, and that is the final confession of surrender to Christianity. No other victory could be so conclusive, and in proportion as Christianity enters into society, the distinction between the Church and the World fades out. As Professor Seeberg remarks: "So the work of the Church develops to a widely extending activity that enters into the most manifold provinces of life. In this lies the ground of the Church's entering as a whole into a permanent historical connection with the surrounding world. It experiences a history so far as it takes part in the collective life-and-culture-movement of mankind."

Not Converts but Influence the Real Test.

In other words the progress of Christianity is to be estimated not alone by the statistics of converts to the Christian religion, but by the response of the world's thought and life to its influence. Christianity would have only partly succeeded if it had built itself up in isolation from the world.

Before attempting to estimate the influence of the Disciples it was necessary to inquire first of all as to what they set themselves to do. In an earlier study it was pointed out that they proposed a reformation of Christian society in order to put an end to sectarian strife and division. To accomplish this purpose they set before themselves two guiding principles—the authority of Scripture and the obligation of Christian unity—the one as means, the other as ideal end.

Program of the Disciples.

In the application of these principles to the New Testament they came to the following general conclusions, which represent a common agreement in the midst of all variations and the working basis of the movement:

1. That the New Testament contains either in principle or precedent all that should be required as terms of Christian fellowship or as conditions of salvation.

2. That faith in Jesus Christ and obedience to him was the bond of union in the primitive church, and is a sufficient bond of union among Christians for all time.

3. That the churches of Christ everywhere should adopt the one test of fellowship and basis of union of the primitive church, that there may be unity among all the people of God.

Stated more briefly these conclusions resolve themselves into the following principles:

I. The Supremacy of Christ.

II. The Simplicity of Christian Discipleship.

III. The Obligation of Christian Unity.

These have been the dominant notes in the message of the Disciples—the recurrent themes and anchor principles of all their work and teaching.

The Supremacy of Christ.

The question which now confronts us is, "How far have these principles become dominant in the thought and life of religious society in America during the last hundred years?" First of all, "What of the supremacy of Christ?" Has faith in Christ and obedience to him taken the place of creeds as tests of Christian fellowship? One hundred years ago the Philadelphia Confession, a kind of Baptist edition of the Westminster Confession of Faith, was used everywhere among Baptist churches as a test of fellowship. Today, the name of that confession is scarcely known to the rank and file of Baptists, and is never named in the examination of persons for membership in their churches, or of young men as candidates for the ministry. Profession of faith in Christ is now a sufficient test of fellowship in most Baptist churches.

The same thing is true of the Presbyterian churches. The Westminster Confession has no place in the reception of persons to membership in their churches. All the great American denominations require little more now than a profession of faith in Jesus Christ. One hundred years ago the Campbells would have looked in vain in any part of the orthodox religious world for a church that would have received them to fellowship on a simple confession of faith in Christ; while now their followers would look in vain to find a church that would not receive them upon such a confession.

Campbell a First, Solitary and Dangerous Example.

When Alexander Campbell, in 1812, at the time of his immersion by a Baptist minister, refused to make more than a simple confession of faith in Jesus as the Son of God, as a prerequisite to baptism, he violated all Baptist custom and stood as a first, solitary and dangerous example of apostolic custom in the modern religious world. It was unheard of before his day, and universally repudiated, as a method of Christian discipleship.

The past one hundred years of history have witnessed a complete transition in principle, and a partial transition in practice, to the position of the Disciples. It has followed that new discovery of Christ in the last century, of which Principal Fairbairn became historian and philosopher in his great work, "The Place of Christ in Modern Theology." His was a study of the supremacy of Christ in modern theology; another study needs to be made of the coming of Christ to supremacy in Christian Discipleship.

Christ in Modern Theology.

Christ has come to supremacy in the modern world in a way never anticipated by the fathers of the movement. There was no support either in the theology or the practices of the churches of their day for the place they gave Christ. Hence they repudiated speculative theology in favor of a biblical theology. The theology of the present time is going just where the Campbells went for its normative authority and materials—namely, to the New Testament and the teaching of Jesus.

To observant Disciples this modern trend toward Christ in theology has confirmed their historic position, and they have welcomed it as a most wonderful testimony to the foresight and religious genius of the fathers. Many a Disciple has read his conviction of the central place of Christ in the great books of modern religious teachers, and has heard it echoed from all the pulpits. And he has wondered why the religious world has not come all the way to the message and program of the Declaration and Address, after coming so far on the way.

The familiar appeal of the Disciples to Christ has become the universal appeal of Christendom; not quite in the same way or with the same end in view. But it is the same appeal, "Back to Christ;" at one time to him as normative experience and content of theology, at another time as ethical teacher, at another as social reformer, but always to him as supreme in the religious thought and life of the Western world. This has been most gratifying and reassuring to the Disciples—this finding of their central thought made the common property of Christendom. The great books that have voiced this trend of things they have read in preference to their own special literature, and with greater inspiration and profit. In fact many of the most widely read ministers and students of the Disciples have found these outside books more truly representative of the Disciples than much of their own literature.

Obligation of Christian Unity.

What of the feeling of obligation in the modern religious world toward Christian Unity? One hundred years ago the voice of Thomas Campbell was like the voice of a John the Baptist crying in the wilderness. It was solitary and alone. Now there are voices in all the churches pleading for the answer of Christ's prayer for unity. There are still a few defenders of denominationalism, but not many. With one accord all prophets of the Christan faith in these days are announcing the coming of a "New Catholicism" which shall embrace all the followers of Christ. The plea of the Disciples for unity has become the plea of Christendom.

Influence of Disciples.

What shall we say now of the influence of the Disciples in bringing about this new appreciation of Christ, and this feeling of obligation towards unity that characterize the modern world. Is it traceable in any degree directly or indirectly to their influence?

There are certain considerations that make against the supposition that the Disciples have had any marked influence in this modern movement. First of all there are no impartial historians of religious progress in America that credit the Disciples with a determining influence upon religious thought.

Furthermore, the leaders of religious thought in America have never confessed indebtedness to the Disciples.

Still further, this modern movement which has resulted in the enthronement of Christ and in the awakening of a conscience on unity, is not an American movement. It is just as much a part of European religious thought as of American, whereas the activity and influence of the Disciples are limited to the United States. And the usual account that is rendered of the matter ascribes leadership and priority to Germany and England, rather than to America. If the Disciples inaugurated the movement and have made any decisive contributions, the leaders and historians of religious thought in Germany and England are entirely unconscious of it.

And finally, the Disciples have been wanting in just those factors that directly exert influence upon the general thought of an age. Those factors of progress consist of (1) great men, either scholars or thinkers, who write, (2) great books that are universally read; or, (3) great educational institutions that propagate the particular ideas; or (4) popular religious movements that touch the collective life of society.

Great Men and Books.

The Disciples have produced no great men who are widely known and read outside of their ranks. The greatest men so far produced that have lived long enough to have had an influence were Alexander Campbell and Isaac Errett. But the writings of neither of these men can be called influential nor productive literature. Their books are not known and have not been read outside of the ministry of the Disciples. They are not to be found in the public libraries of the country, nor are they kept upon the shelves of the book-stores for sale. The books produced by Disciples embodying their position and principles are essentially denominational and provincial. The Disciples have not been wanting in men of real literary genius, but they have dedicated their genius to the handling of a narrow range of ideas in the defense of a special cause, which has limited the circle of their readers within the narrow lines of religious prejudice. No man can think great thoughts or write great books with an eye to the approval of a small section of Christendom or with a view to the defence of a particular system. Great books are written in the atmosphere of unlimited freedom and under the impulse of universal human interests and needs.

Influence From Below.

Such influence as the Disciples have exerted upon Christian thought and life in America has been through their organic church life, their ministry, their newspapers, and their participation in union enterprises, such as the Christian Endeavor movement and the Union Sunday-School work. How much indirect and unconscious influence they have had upon present religious conditions, it is difficult to say. Their influence has been personal influence rather than literary influence. It has spread from below upwards in religious society, through the laymen of the various denominations to the ministry and leaders of those denominations.

Contact of laymen with the organic church life and ministry of the Disciples, and contact of these with other laymen of other bodies and through them with their ministry, has been a real and constant channel of influence for the Disciples. It has been influence by personal contact in neighborly and community life. Many of the most effective apostles of their principles have been well-informed and zealous laymen who have known familiarly the proof-texts of their position and have impressed them in private discussion.

The relations of the Disciples to this modern world movement has been not so much that of cause as that of expression. They are one of many forms of expression which the time-spirit has assumed, and in which it has realized itself. They have no doubt helped to make up the total trend, but they have also been made by it. They are a product of the times, and would have been impossible in any other age.

OUR CHURCH MEN

By John R. Ewers

"Behold the Man"

This Easter season brings us face to face with the living Jesus. There He stands. What will we do with Him? By our answer we rise or fall. All other decisions are as nothing compared to this. He is the measure of manhood. By Him we square our lives. What do we see when we behold THE MAN?

In the words of Phillips Brooks, "We see the pattern and fulfilment of our humanity." He was the perfect man. He was the unimpeded channel for God. Call Him divine for there is no other adjective large enough, but do not forget that he was human. He was not a ghost, for if he was he means nothing to one castled in flesh as I am. He was not something other than human, for if he was he could not be tempted in all points, like as I am, and His temptations would mean nothing to me. Jesus was God's unique man, unique because perfect as far as majestic spirit, noble character, kingly bearing, warm love and unselfish service were concerned.

The Manliness of Christ.

Art has too frequently made Jesus feminine. Poetry has too often made Him meek and lowly, perhaps not too much but too exclusively. Preachers have sometimes pictured Him as sentimental, weak, timid and womanly. We admire womanliness in a woman, we demand manliness in a man. Jesus is the world's superior man. All the rest of earth's men are as foothills while Jesus towers aloft a solitary peak, sun-crowned in God's presence.

Jesus expressed His full and complete manhood by doing all that did become a man. He was strong, but not rough. He was passionate, but held himself in masterful control. He was a lover of reason but not cold. He was patient, but this was due not to a lack, but to an abundance of life. He was forgiving, not because he was cowardly, but because he was very brave. He was meek, not because of timidity, but because of kingly control. He was tender, not because he was soft, but because he was refined. He possessed all the best elements of our humanity combined in perfect proportion. His life was symmetrical, perfectly balanced. Like a Grecian temple he combined strength and beauty, power and grace. The incarnation gave the world a complete man, but not something other than a man. When he said, "Follow me," he was not commanding the impossible. Tempted precisely like this, He can sympathize with us.

The Wondrous Richness of Christ's Personality.

Here in a casket is a jewel. Locked in the dark it is not really itself. It was made for the sunshine. Carry it out into the day. The light does not make it something o her than itself. The light fulfils it. Jesus is the perfect diamond in the bright sunshine of God. An untaught man is not really a man. He was made to learn. We say schooling makes him "more of a man." Education does no make him something other than a man. It fulfils him. Civilization does the same. There is a vast difference between the naked savage and the civilized man. Civilization rounds us out into completion. Booker T. Washington is not something other than a colored man, but he is a splendid example of more completed work. God came once and filled a man's life full and thus gave us Jesus of Nazareth. All other standards of manhood pale and fade before Him. He is the one not only altogether lovely, but altogether powerful. By Him are we challenged, and by Him, only, are we measured.

Our current conceptions of manhood need to be corrected by Jesus. We value sternness. Which is greater, to strike the blow, or to forgive? Which is nobler, to frown, or to be tender? Love is better than the sword and to gain your end by saving men is infinitely better than to ride to victory over the mangled corpses of your fellows. What gracious strength Jesus possessed. Personal abuse never aroused Him, but the wrongs of others made His eyes flash.

Independent Manhood.

We expect independence in a man. Jesus had it. He stood alone. See Him with eyes of fire and tones of thunder as he cleanses the temple. He could be angry and sin not. See the mob at Nazareth part before His kingly bearing. See the soldiers in the garden fall back before His powerful glance. He was the lion of the tribe of Judah. By the power of the truth and righteousness resident in Him he conquered.

We expect bravery in a man. Jesus nad it. He set His face toward Jerusalem knowing that death awaited Him. Friends might entreat, foes might threaten, He could not be turned aside. More sensitive to pain than any other man who ever lived, he braved the darkness of Gethsemane and Golgotha The Pharisees held the balance of power. Life and death were in their hands. Jesus assaulted them with tremendous energy. He hurled His deadly shafts straight at them. He tore off masks of the hypocrites and revealed them in all their hideous falsity. He quailed not before kings or governors. Impelled by a great conviction, He forgot self in the mighty struggle.

Christ Forgetting Himself.

We expect generosity in a man. Jesus had it. Of a certain brilliant man it was once said, "He can never be great because he is selfish." Jesus was not marred by selfishness. He gave more than gold. He gave all of His talent, all of His time. He gave all He had, even life itself. "Come to me," he said, "and I will give." That was His way. His motto was, "Not to be ministered unto, but to minister."

Oh, the glorious human Jesus, how He challenges us! All the noble elements most perfectly blended and combined in Him. Paul was great, but compared with Jesus, Paul is like an ant-hill to a pyramid. The heroes of the world are great, but Jesus towers above them all, like a Himalayan peak above the foot-hills. Is He divine? Yes, because there is no other word big enough to describe Him. In a company of English gentlemen, Charles Lamb was once asked the difference between the genius of Shakespeare and Jesus. He answered, "Gentlemen, if William Shakespeare came into this room, we would all rise to greet him, if Jesus Christ came into this room we would all bow down before Him."

Yes,

"Of all mankind we will cleave to Him,
And to Him will we cleave alway."

Our highest tribute, Jesus Saviour.

Canada's Men Plan Missionary Policy

The Secretary of the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ Attends Laymen's Missionary Congress in Canada—Second Article in Report of Wonderful Meeting—Canada Will Do Her Share for World's Evangelization

BY P. C. MACFARLANE.

The registration at the Congress has now reached 4,200, of which number about three thousand are methodis.s and Presbtyerians divided about half and half with Laymen in the majority in each. The theme of the afternoon session was "The victorious progress of missions." The first speaker was Robert E. Speer on "The Awakening of the Orient." Mr. Speer made one of his very best addresses. His speeches are to me always remarkable for the amount of information and forceful logic that he gets into them, finally saturating the whole with an emotional appeal. He reveals himself as a thoughtful student of the missionary problems, as one who estimates carefully the forces with which the Gospel must contend. As contributing forces to the Awakening in the Orient he mentioned the exodus of students to study Western civilization, these young men coming from China, Korea, Japan and India, and entering the seats of learning in Europe and America; the political tumult from one end of Asia to the other and the insistent talk of popular rights; the change of garments to those of a Western cut and fashion, which was significant merely as showing the breaking-up of old prejudices; and last of all the leavening influence resulting from the large emigration from China and Japan to other countries which steadily reacted upon the ideas and ideals of the Mother Country. The awakening itself, he declared, was expressing itself in four ways.

The Awakening Orient.

First, industrially, in a growing of commerce and manufacture, in multiplication of exports and imports and in railroad building. Second, intellectually. Japan is today honeycombed with popular schools, China has cast out her old literary school and is replacing it as fast as possible with modern learning, and supplementing this with a multiplication of postal facilities. There are now in China two hundred schools, organized on a modern basis, and two thousand post-offices. Another side of this intellectual stir is seen in the ferment at work in every section of Mohammedan Asia. At last Asia has begun to think and speak, and her language is the language of free men.

Third, politically. Asia is witnessing an epidemic of demands for constitutional government and popular institutions. They have seen the fall of the only absolutism in Europe before the only constitutional government in western Asia, and have not failed to learn the lesson therefrom. The growth of nationalism is striking. The cry of Asia for the Asiatics is giving way to that of China for the Chinese and Japan for the Japanese and India for the Indians.

New Asiatic Consciousness.

Fourth, morally. Throughout Asia this moral awakening is apparent. The Asiatic has come to a new consciousness of his manhood and with it a tremendous ethical awakening. Asia is feeling after human brotherhood. He has found that the blood of all the races under heaven is of one color; that with all men there is a common suffering and a common sin, and that there is need for a common redemption by the common Saviour. Illustrating this new sense of the value and dignity of human life he referred to a vast mound near a Japanese city commemorative of a victory over Korea, a mound which was composed of thirty thousand Korean ears. He declared that since that day Japan had achieved a far greater victory over another foe and so far from erecting such a gruesome monument to her prowess, had led the world in an example of humanity in the treatment of prisoners. This ethical spirit, he declared, was begetting a religious awakening; that so keen and impassive a Pagan as Marquis Ito had stated recently that "he had always believed that morality was essential to national life, and that he had now come to see that religion was necessary to furnish an adequate basis for morality."

At the close of Mr. Speer's address the audience gave him a tremendous ovation, and a rising vote of thanks.

Fifty Years in India.

The next speaker was Bishop Thoburn, the hero of fifty years of missionary life in India. The Bishop was greatly honored by the Convention for the work he has done, and his address might have been effective had he not followed and preceded younger men of much greater force. His address was reminiscent in style and little remains but the impression that there was an humble man, gifted with a large amount of common sense, who by persistence, consecration and a living faith in Christ has wrought a tremendous work. The last speaker of the afternoon session was Reverend S. M. Zwemer, F. R. G. S., of Arabia, who spoke on "The Impact of Christianity on Non-Christian Religion." He is a young looking man to all appearances in the very early thirties, and he started with a dictionary definition of impact as the colliding of two moving forces. He first demonstrated the fact that the Pagan religions, Buddhism, Confucianism, and Mohammedanism are forces or rather bodies, presenting a concrete series of teachings. He criticized the view that they were of the same order with Christianity but of minor degree, quoting Theodore Parker as stating that there might be comparative religions but that Christianity was not one of them, and Harnack as arguing against a chair of Comparative religion in a Christian university, on the ground that there was but one system of teaching that was divine in its origin and thus entitled to be classed as a religion, and that was Christianity itself. Mr. Zwemer was emphatic in his distinction here, declaring that Christianity was nothing if not Iconaclastic. It had never known a spirit of compromise; hence his definition of impact applied as Christianity supplied one body and Pagan religion the other body. His next analogy demanded that the two bodies should be in motion. He declared this to be true of all the great heathen religions. Our ears, he said, are filled with the clamor of the Swamis. They are in motion today, and they always have been. Buddhism had begun its missionary propaganda in Ceylon 250 years before Christ was born; it came to Siam when Paul was a prisoner in Rome. Mohamedanism, he declared, was a missionary campaign thirteen hundred years old, and today Mohammedans are printing Carlyle's life of Mohammed, and selling it in the streets of Calcutta for two annas. Everywhere the man of the yellow robe and the men of the green turban are in conflict with Christianity.

Militant Christianity.

Christianity is also in motion. There may have been times when it was dormant, but today its spirit is militant. On every field the impact is felt. In two decades there will be no paganism in Africa. Christianity and Islam will have divided between them the dark Continent, and have locked in the death struggle.

Everywhere Christianity is gaining the victory. There are two hundred native preachers in India who were Mohammedans. Three-fourths of the Mohammedan world is under Christian rule. Eighty-one million Mohammedans are under the flag of Great Britain, which bears upon it the Cross. "Why do you spit when you see the flag?" I asked a Mohammedan once. "It is not the flag I hate, but the cross upon it," was the answer.

The theme of the evening session was, "The Place of the Church in the Making of the Nation." The addresses at this session were all concerned with Canadian viewpoints and contained little of general interest outside except the viewpoint itself. This was a straight Jingo session, and what Jingo's these Canadians are. They jump and clap and shout "Hear, hear," at every patriotic reference. The opening address was by Canon L. Norman Tucker, of Toronto, on "Canada's Debt to the Missionaries." This revealed what a large place missions have played in the conversion of Canada from a raw frontier where one-half the population was engaged in selling whiskey and the other half in drinking it, into the most Christian nation on the globe.

The Preacher Story-teller.

The Reverend C. W. Gordon, D. D. (Ralph Connor), of Winnipeg, spoke on the duty to the settlers. He made some good points, but my verdict is that I would rather read one of Ralph Connor's stories than listen to one of Doctor Gordon's addresses.

Reverend Alexander Sutherland, a white-haired old giant, who was introduced as the Dean of all American Missionaries, both in point of years and service, was assigned the thankless task of speaking upon "Our duty to the Asiatic." He declared that some of us had overlooked the fact that when a breach in the Chinese wall was made large enough to let the foreigner in it was also large enough to let the Chinaman out. He pleaded for a square deal for the Asiatic, and some of his sentences evoked applause from the main floor where the ministers sat, but ominous silence reigned in the galleries where the lay membership predominated.

Macdonald a Splendid Orator.

Mr. J. A. Macdonald, of the Toronto Globe, spoke on "The Christianization of Our Civilization." In introducing Mr. Macdonald the chairman said that recently when the city of Chicago searched the continent over for an orator to speak at the Centennary of Abraham Lincoln, they rested their final choice on J. A. Macdonald, of Toronto. He proved himself an orator of the first rank. He laid the most of his emphasis upon translating the Jesus program into our social life. He declared that the key-note was love; that Jesus became Christ through service; that the four thousand men of this Convention going out determined to live as Jesus had lived, could re-cast and re-construct the whole social life. The things that Mr. Macdonald said, if uttered by some great preacher, would not have been so remarkable. Their originality and force lay in the fact that a layman was uttering them with all the intense moral earnestness of a prophet. In his peroration he touched again the Jingo sentiment and stirred it to its depths. He declared that Canada was a great peace-making force; that thoughout the forty-five hundred miles of boundary line between the United States and Canada there was neither fort nor battleship. Referring to the popular feeling throughout Canada that Canadians should come to the rescue of the Mother Country and assist in maintaining a great navy, he declared the spirit to be millions for defence, but not one cent for exploitation or conquest. This sentiment was received with hearty cheers, these loyal Britishers seeing nothing incongruous in accepting this paraphrase of an American slogan which had once been aimed at "The Mother Country." Concluding, Mr. Macdonald swept his hearers upon the mount of a holy patriotism by saying, "and here is Canada, stretching her hands across the sea to Britain, and across the lakes to the United States; Canada, a great English-speaking nation between two other great English-speaking nations, and how would it be if, in the providence of God, these three nations should be welded into one and the name of the whole be Canada?"

Rugged Canadian Character.

It would be hard to describe the wave of enthusiasm which this created.

Brethren, here are a mighty people; strong and rugged in character; keen in intellect; rich in faith and patriotism; loyal to the Mother Land, quoting frequently Kipling's line:

"Daughter is she in her Mother's House, but Mistress in her own."

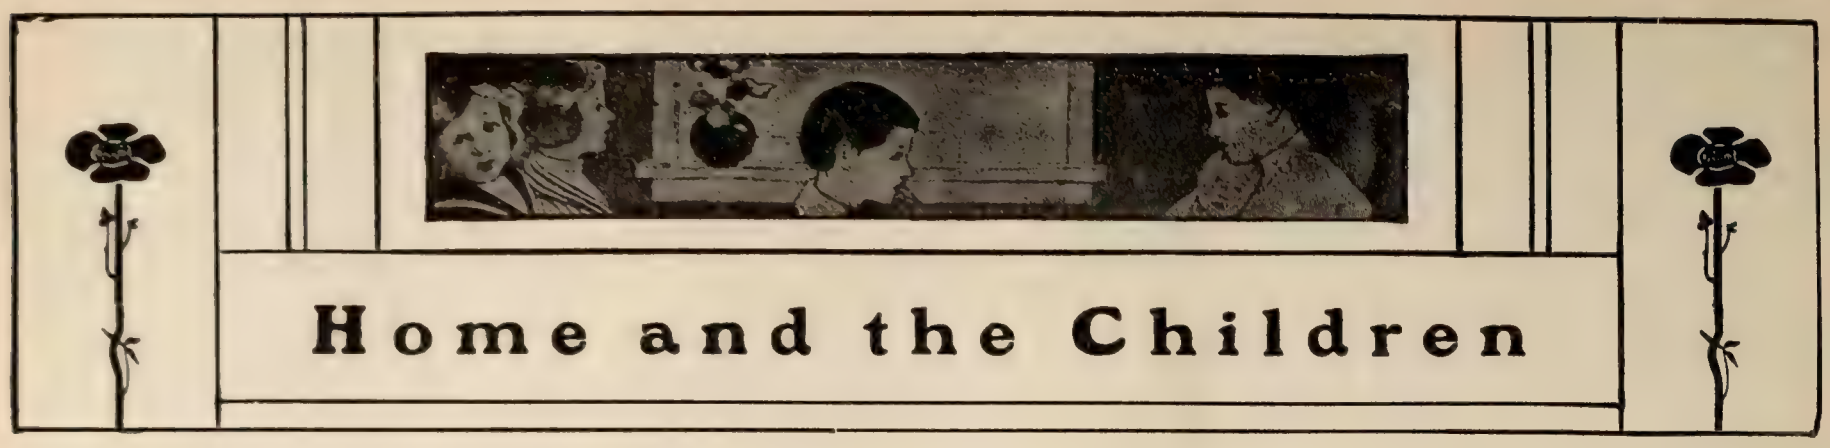
with the emphasis on the Mistress, developing a national consciousness remarkable for its idealism and its solidarity, and in the very hour of the final parturition of the newborn Spirit of Nationalism they seriously propose to fling the whole at the feet of Jesus Christ, to raise high above Union Jack and Maple Leaf the one-starred flag of Bethlehem blue, and announce a concrete purpose to make and maintain a civilization and a nation which shall be not nominally, but practically Christian.

BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett



In your comments upon the Sunday-school lesson for February 14, "The Apostles Imprisoned," it seems to me you do not make enough of the miracle of their escape from the prison. You merely say that "in some mysterious way they had been released from the prison and with fresh energy were proclaiming the truth concerning Jesus." Was not the miraculous appearance of the angel in their behalf as important a fact as their preaching in the temple? B. F. H.

Indianapolis.

By no means, if we are to judge from the character of the entire narrative. They had been preaching in the porches of the temple. By order of the council they were arrested and confined in prison. That night they escaped, and the next morning they were back again in the temple courts proclaiming Jesus. The manner of their release seems not to have been alluded to by them either in their defense before the council (see Acts 5:21-32), yet if their miraculous release had been deemed by them of prime importance, would they not have emphasized it in their utterances that day? On the contrary, the story was apparently told only in the circle of the disciples, and thus found its place in Luke's report.

In connection with this question it is of interest to note the comment of Prof. Ramsey on this passage. He has probably done more than any living man to vindicate the historical and trustworthy character of the Book of Acts. He belongs to the conservative wing of biblical scholars, and therefore his works have added value in the treatment of this episode.

"The first trial had ended in a mere warning to the apostles not to preach. They were now arrested for preaching in spite of the prohibition. During the night they escaped from prison; and in the morning they were found actually preaching inside the temple. Hitherto they had preached only in the Portico of Solomon on the eastern side of the temple, or in a private house. To preach inside the temple was a bolder act, especially for escaped prisoners. The manner of their escape is not described in detail; a "messenger" (angelos) of the Lord" is a term that covers any one who announces or carries into effect the will of God. That Luke regarded the escape as effected by supernational agency might at first seem clear: and this will be enough for most readers. Those who inquire more minutely will recognize both that the narrative has passed from the Semitic to the Greek mind (for Luke was a Greek), and that in other cases (for example, Acts 14:20; 20:9 f; 28:3), as we shall see, his own statement of the facts does not necessitate (and in the last case forbids) the intervention of supernatural agency, though he himself was perhaps inclined to regard them all as proof of supernatural power. But in none of those cases, nor in the present instance, does he say that supernatural influence was brought into play; he merely states the facts as he had learned them, and leaves the reader to judge of their nature. Here we must observe that the people and the rulers, who had all been much impressed by the cure of the lame man, took no notice of the escape from prison. They therefore saw nothing supernatural in it; and when one thinks of the very simple character of Eastern prisons in modern times, and of the way in which prisoners are often allowed out by the gaolers on parole, one will be very slow to resort to supernatural explanation here, but rather maintain that probably some Semitic popular fashion of stating a fact whose exact nature was not remembered has passed into the language of Luke from the mouth of his informants in Palestine."

The Downfall of a Tyrant

By Grace Wood Castle.

When one saw the Jamieson cottage from the outside and was told on good authority that it was the home of Pa and Ma Jamieson and their children, John, Mary, Nora and Baby Beth, one was sure to think how tight a fit it must be for the family. If, in addition, one were told that a tyrant also lived there who sat all the time, day and night, with long arms outspread, in the prettiest and sunniest corner—never crowded, never jostled—one would surely wonder and say: "How strange;" and perhaps add: "I don't believe it." Nevertheless the tyrant story was true—every word.

Oddly enough the family bent meekly to the yoke and even took pride in the demands of their oppressor. Especially was this true of Mrs. Jamieson. Commonplace herself, wife of a commonplace man, and mother of commonplace children she had always secretly envied people who had succeeded in doing things that their neighbors could not do or in having things that their neighbors could not have. When, one day, her sister who lived at some distance brought her a tiny plant—a spindling offshoot of her Boston fern—she could not foresee that the little green thing was to bring the fulfillment of her desire.

At first she cared for the small sprawly plant for her sister's sake—it did not interest her—but very soon she noticed that it was growing "like all possessed."

It continued to grow at a rate that even those who were learned in the lore of ferns had never seen equaled and soon was the finest in the neighborhood. Later on it was undoubtedly the largest and finest in the village, which boasted many Boston ferns. The editor of the paper came to see it and afterward gave it a "write-up," wherefore Ma Jamieson who had never before possessed anything deemed worthy to be described in print, was much elated.

To go back a little, an important event in the Jamieson family which had occurred just prior to the coming of the little fern, was the building of a bay-window at the west side of the cottage. Only five feet square, it yet transformed the erstwhile gloomy little living room into a pleasant place and was the joy and pride of the whole family.

When the fern outgrew the kitchen window sill it was given a corner in the new bay-window, its pedestal being an empty butter jar covered with green crepe paper. It soon outgrew these accommodations and the jar was superceded by a tall old churn similarly disguised and moved nearer the center of the floor. Still it grew and it grew—like Jacks beanstalk—but unlike that famous plant it sought the floor instead of the sky. The family tape measure was worn to shreds as the result of repeated measurements of its fronds, the longest of which finally reached the phenomenal length of eight feet.

The plant and the table on which it had come to be enthroned now occupied the whole bay-window. The graceful arch and droop of its many branches suggested a fountain and one felt that it ought to be called by its full name, Nephrolepsis Exaltata Bostoniensis, and to live in a great conservatory instead of a tiny house where every bit of space and air and sunshine was needed by the human occupants.

As it happened, Pa Jamieson and his youngest daughter were the first to voice this sentiment. When the former noticed that an ambitious frond had crossed the imaginery line between the bay-window and living room, he was heard to remark that "either the fern or the family would have to move soon."

Sturdy little Beth, who had lately discovered that her feet were made for walking and her small tongue for talking, seemed unaccountably, to harbor a grudge against the beautiful tyrant and several times was discovered surreptitiously snipping off the green tips which touched the floor. She was told again and again that she was a naughty, naughty baby to break the pretty, pretty fern, and on one sad occasion her chubby hands were "spatted"—very lightly—for they all adored her.

For a whole week after that she had hardly looked at the fern and then it transpired that the little maid had only bided her time. Mrs. Jamieson went out on an errand on the eventful day leaving Beth with Nora, her nine-year-old sister.

"Now, watch her every minute," was the parting injunction. "She's as full of mischief as an egg is of meat."

The mother returned in an hour to find Nora in tears, Baby Beth calmly sitting in the midst of greenery that covered the floor about her, and the magnificent fern entirely dismantled—a forlorn ruin.

"I was in the kitchen reading and she was playing with her blocks right beside of me," sobbed Nora. "She must have come in here just as still. I didn't miss her for a few minutes and then I found her here and——" Sobs choked her utterance, but the little culprit seemed not at all disturbed. "Baby not naughty; fern naughty," she insisted in answer to their reproaches, "Baby f'mash naughty fern!"

Mrs. Jamieson who always tried to live up to her favorite proverb: "No use crying over spilt milk," gathered up and threw away the remains and carried plant and table down cellar. Then she polished the windows and returned to their places the rocking chair and the little work table loaded with papers and magazines that had furnished the pleasant nook before the advent of the tyrant. There was still room for Baby Beth's little red chair which its small owner brought

"MAMA, WHY DON'T THE STARS BUMP TOGETHER?"

It was day-time in the village of Pleiades—which means night-time here on earth—and mother Planet was serenely moving about the duties of the household. She had just made her regular shopping journey down the Milky Way, and baby Nebula was to have her bottle in a few moments.

Everything was quiet and peaceful in the firmament except—little Willie Comet. He was tearing around in a harum-scarum way, upsetting things dreadfully. And everywhere he went he left a trail of sparks behind. But finally, as he was just roller-skating along through the sky without looking, he ran right smack into old man Mars and bumped his head terribly on the old gentleman's sharp shins. Of course he cried and ran to mother Planet, just raining showers of spark-tears from his eyes.

"Willie Comet," said she, "you must behave!" And Willie sobbed between sparks, "I would, but I dunno how!" "Willie," said mother Planet, " I believe what you need is an orbit," and Willie's curiosity being aroused, he stopped sparking and said he "guessed he did." So mother Planet took the mussed up little chap, combed his hair, smoothed him all round, and placed him in a nice egg-shaped orbit. Thus Willie Comet became a star and stopped his wild and sparky ways, because all through the night, for the stars don't go to bed until morning, he moved along his even way and twinkled, twinkled, at the other stars.

There are homes and yards and walks and playgrounds full of Willie Comets, and they are constantly getting into trouble because they have no orbits. Some are always tearing around making trouble for others, and can be found poking the cat in the rain barrel or putting salt in the tea. Others are out of their proper places getting into all kinds of trouble themselves. These are the people who fall off the back shed, get stung by bees, and pushed over by the goat.

The happy people, the people that twinkle like stars and help as they go on their way, are the people with orbits. The robber who knocked down the poor traveler was out of the road. But the good Samaritan who came down the middle of the road and helped him was an orbit man. A comet makes sparks and trouble and fuss and zig-zags. A star makes,

Steady helpful rays of light,
And stately journeys through the night.

Which will you be, a comet, or a star?

and installed in the new position with much satisfaction.

"Naughty fern gone. Baby sit here," she remarked cheerfully as she sat herself down.

Mrs. Jamieson almost resented the calmness with which the remainder of the family received the news of the catastrophe, that evening.

"Too bad," said her husband, "but it will leave me a good light place to read my newspaper, my eyes aint what they used to be."

"Baby ought to have had a good spanking," affirmed Mary who was eighteen and worked in the factory, "but it will be nice to have more room—sometimes," she added blushingly.

Gee! but I'm sorry Ma," said Johnny sympathetically. "I know you thought a lot of that fern, but the bay-window is a boss place to sit—you can see what's going on."

Even Mrs. Jamieson, after she got used to it was inclined to agree with Emerson that "for every loss we gain something in return."

The Military Base

Down here in Virginia we read a great deal about the Civil War, and learn many lessons from it. In reading recently Gen. Longstreet's "From Manassas to Appomattox," I was greatly struck with the supreme importance of the matter of a sound military base in conducting a campaign. An army may be excellently equipped and in fine fighting trim, but if its lines of communication are in any way threatened, both its moral and strategic value as a fighting force is to that extent decreased. The army in the enemy's country cannot fight efficiently unless there is an unbroken connection between the trenches at the front and the stores of ammunition, clothing and food in the depots at the base. And furthermore, if these depots are not replenished, the finest army will soon be reduced to starvation and physical and military incapacity. McDowell and McClellan were time and again compelled to weaken their forces assembled for the direct march on Richmond in order that they might send men to defend Washington, the nerve center of the Federal armies, threatened in turn from the direction of the volley by Jackson's "foot-cavalry."

To me this is a parable for the fighting force of our church. Our armies on the outposts in foreign lands cannot do soldierly work if there is any weakness at the base of supplies. The American Home Missionary Society represents to our Brotherhood that base. It is the Washington of our campaign. As it grows in strength, the work at large grows, our plea for union grows, the work of foreign missions grows. Let the work at home lag for lack of means and all the enthusiasm in the world will not be able to maintain a really effective fighting force in foreign lands or anywhere else. But let the supply depots in America be full; let its treasury overflow; let its zeal be abundant—and all the other things we so fondly hope and pray for, will be added unto us.

Let, then, the first Sunday in May be a high day in our churches. In this, our Centennial year, let us prove of whose blood we are, not by the talk that is so cheap, but by the giving first of ourselves and then of our means to the support of that Society in which the ideals of our fathers have been so splendidly focused for the enlightenment of the world. Woman's Sphere

—After an illness extending over two years Mrs. John H. Vincent, wife of Bishop John H. Vincent, Bishop of the Chautauqua Institution, N. Y., died March 31, at her home in Indianapolis.

—Berlin and American society is interested in the announcement of the engagement of Miss Muriel White, daughter of United States Ambassador White, to Count Hermann von Seherr-Thoss, the eldest son of a prominent and wealthy member of the Prussian House of Lords. The wedding will take place in April or May.

—John S. Sargent has accepted a commission to paint a three-quarter length portrait of Mrs. Whitelaw Reid.

—Lillian Grenville, a New York girl, whose family name is Goertner, has in five years won a name as an opera singer in France and Italy. It was while she was singing vespers in the Convent of the Sacred Heart at Montreal, where she was at school, that her voice caught the ear of M. Fortier, a teacher of music, and he predicted a great future for her.

—The Rev. Anna Howard Shaw, Miss Lucy Anthony, the Rev. Mary Stafford of Des Moines, Iowa, and Miss Wilson, her assistant, and Mrs. Ida Husted Harper are among the suffragists who have sailed for London to attend the woman's suffrage convention.

—Former Queen Liliuokalani of Hawaii, otherwise "Mrs. Lydia Dominis," must pay $11,600 to her "court physician" under a judgment rendered by Chief Justice Clabaugh of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. The judgment is in favor of Dr. Charles H. English of Washington.

—The present awakening among the Hindoo women is said to be largely due to the men of India, who are anxious to have educated wives and daughters. At the last convocation of the Bombay university two Brahman women took degrees. For the first time Hindoo women were graduated from the Madras university.

—Mrs. Crackenthorpe, in her amusing book "Lady Chesterfield's Letters to Her Daughter," says that a man of forty, though delightful as a friend, "rarely makes a good husband to any one and never to a young girl." If he is still good looking, he is so absorbed in his remnant of youthfulness that he has no time to think of his wife. The ideal husband for a young girl is the youth of twenty-five.

Echoes From the Adult Bible Class Day

Among the splendid items of news which have come to this office, regarding the Adult Bible Class Day, March 28, the mail brought the following from two of our leading pastors. M. J. Nicoson, of Memphis, writes:

"Memphis, Mo., March 28.—Dear Bro. Hardin: 254 in Bible school and $8.91 offering. Sixty-five men in the men's class; ninety-two women in three women's classes, 157 in the Adult Department. It is great. Nothing like it has ever been seen in these parts. Think of Old Memphis having 254 in Bible school! We vacate the parsonage this week to use it for class rooms for the school!—M. J. Nicoson."

From the leader of the great school and church at Nevada, W. W. Burks, we have the following:

"Nevada, Mo., March 29.—Bro. Hardin: Yesterday, Adult Day, we had 302 present, collection $9.45. Organized Adult classes report: Baracas present 39 men, Philathea 48 women, Mrs. Brown's Class 35 women, Brotherhood Class 30 men (new,—second week).—Burke."

Dr. Cooksey, the newly installed pastor of the Central Church, Joplin, writes that they started a Teacher-Training class there of over 100, which has by this time grown to 150. An order for 200 A. B. C. pins by the teacher of the large men's class of that school is an indication that they are doing business.

These are only a few of the indications of the growing condition of our work.

Revival at El Reno

The Sellers-St. John meeting began on March 7 and closed on March 31.

There were seventy additions, thirty-eight of these were by confession and baptism, twenty-eight by letter and statement, and four from other religious bodies. Forty-four of this number were adults. Twenty-six came from the Bible-school and ranged on an average of twelve years.

Brother Sellers is a strong preacher. He excels in his searching messages to the church and in his hortatory messages. His long, successful experience in the pastorate gives him a fine poise in his chosen work.

Brother St. John is a great leader of song.

There have been additions each week since the meetings closed. There have been eighty-eight so far this year.

The El Reno Church is stronger for the meetings. We are compelled to build or cease growing as we have been. Our city is growing rapidly.

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XII.

Speed the Plow.

Winter had fled back beyond the barrens to the lonely North at last, and though here and there a little slushy snow still lay soaking the black loam in a hollow, a warm wind swept the vast levels, when one morning Colonel Barrington rode with his niece and sister across the prairie. Spring comes suddenly in that region, and the frost-bleached sod was steaming under an effulgent sun, while in place a hardy flower peeped through. It was six hundred miles to the forests on the Rockies' eastern slope, and as far to the Athabascan pines, but it seemed to Maud Barrington that their resinous sweetness was in the glorious western wind, which awoke a musical sighing from the sea of rippling grass. It rolled away before her in billows of lustrous silver-gray, and had for sole boundary the first upward spring of the arch of cloudless blue across which the vanguard of the pany, towards the Pole.

The freshness of it all stirred her blood like wine, and the brightness that flooded the prairie had crept into her eyes, for those who bear the iron winter of that lonely land realize the wonder of the reawakening, which in a little space of days dresses the waste, that has lain for long months white and silent as the dead, in living green. It also has its subtle significance that the grimmest toiler feels, and the essence of it is hope eternal and triumphant life. The girl felt the thrill of it, and gave thanks by an answering brightness, as the murmuring grasses and peeping flowers did, but there was behind her instinctive gladness a vague wonder and expectancy. She had read widely, and seen the life of the cities with understanding eyes, and now she was to be provided with the edifying spectacle of the gambler and outcast turned farmer.

Had she been asked a few months earlier whether the man who had, as Courthorne had done, cast away his honor and wallowed in the mire, could come forth again and purge himself from the stain, her answer would have been coldly skeptical, but now with the old familiar miracle and what it symbolized before her eyes, the thing looked less improbable. Why this should give her pleasure she did not know, or would not admit that she did, but the fact remained that it was so.

Trotting down the slope on the next rise, they came upon him, as he stood by a great breaker plow. In front of him, the quarter-mile furrow led on beyond the tall sighting poles on the crest of the next rise, and four splendid horses, of a kind not very usual on the prairie, were stamping the steaming clods at his side. Bronzed, by frost and sun, with his brick-red neck and arch of chest revealed by the coarse blue shirt that, belted at the waist, enhanced his slenderness, the repentant prodigal was at least a passable specimen of the animal man, but it was the strength and patience in his face that struck the girl, as he turned towards her, bareheaded, with a little smile in his eyes. She also noticed the difference he presented with his ingrained hands, and the stain of the soil upon him, to her uncle, who sat his horse, immaculate as usual, with gloved hand on the bridle, for the Englishmen at Silverdale usually hired other men to do their coarser work for them.

"So you are commencing in earnest in face of my opinion?" said Barrington. "Of course, I wish you success, but that consummation appears distinctly doubtful."

Winston laughed as he pointed to a great machine which, hauled by four horses, rolled towards them, scattering the black clods in in its wake. "I'm doing what I can to achieve it, sir," he said. "In fact, I'm staking somewhat heavily. That team with the gang plows and cultivators cost me more money than I care to remember."

"No doubt," said Barrington dryly. "Still, we have always considered oxen good enough for breaking prairie at Silverdale."

Winston nodded. "I used to do so, sir, when I could get nothing better, but after driving oxen for eight years one finds out their disadvantages."

Barrington's face grew a trifle stern. "There are times when you tax our patience, Lance," he said. "Still, there is nothing to be gained by questioning your assertion. What I fail to see, is where your reward for all this will come from, because I am still convinced that the soil will, so to speak, give you back eighty cents for every dollar you put into it. I would, however, like to look at those implements. I have never seen better ones."

He dismounted and helped his companion down, for Winston made no answer. The farmer was never sure what actuated him, but, save in an occasional fit of irony, he had not attempted by any reference to make his past fall into line with Courthorne's since he had first been accepted as the latter at Silverdale. He had taken the dead man's inheritance for a while, but he would stoop no further, and to speak the truth, which he saw was not credited, brought him a grim amusement and also flung a sop to his pride. Presently, however, Miss Barrington turned to him, and there was a kindly gleam in her eyes as she glanced at the splendid horses and widening strip of plowing.

"You have the hope of youth, Lance, to make this venture when all looks black—and it pleases me," she said. "Sometimes I fancy that men had braver hearts than they have now, when I was young."

Winston flushed a trifle, and stretching out an arm swept his hand around the horizon. "All that looked dead a very little while ago, and now you can see the creeping greenness in the sod," he said. "The lean years cannot last forever, and, even if one is beaten again, there is a consolation in knowing that one has made a struggle. Now, I am quite aware that you are fancying a speech of this kind does not come well from me."

Maud Barrington had seen his gesture, and something in the thought that impelled it, as well as the almost statuesque pose of his thinly-clad figure, appealed to her. Courthorne as farmer, with the damp of clean effort on his forehead and the stain of the good soil that would faithfully repay it on his garments, had very little in common with the profligate and gambler. Vaguely she wondered whether he was not working out his own redemption by every wheat furrow torn from the virgin prairie, and then again the doubt crept in. Could this man have ever found pleasure in the mire?

"You will plow your holding, Lance?" asked the elder lady, who had not answered his last speech yet, but meant to later.

"Yes," said the man. "All I can. It's a big venture, and, if it fails, will cripple me, but I seem to feel, apart from any reason I can discern, that wheat is going up again, and I must go through with this plowing. Of course, it does not sound very sensible."

Miss Barrington looked at him gravely, for there was a curious and steadily-tightening bond between the two. "It depends upon what you mean by sense. Can we reason out all we feel, and is there nothing, intangible but real, behind the impulses which may be sent to us?"

"Well," said Winston, with a little smile, "that is a trifle too deep for me, and it's difficult to think of anything but the work I have to do. But you were the first at Silverdale to hold out a hand to me—and I have a feeling that your good wishes would go a long way now. Is it altogether fantastic to believe that the good-will of my first friend would help to bring me prosperity?"

The white-haired lady's eyes grew momentarily soft, and, with a gravity that did not seem out of place, she moved forward and laid her hand on a big horse's neck, and smiled when the dumb beast responded to her gentle touch.

"It's a good work," she said. "Lance, there is more than dollars, or the bread that somebody is needing, behind what you are doing, and because I loved your mother I know how her approval would have followed you. And now sow in hope, and God speed your plow!"

She turned away almost abruptly, and Winston stood still with one hand closed tightly and a little deeper tint in the bronze of his face, sensible at once of an unchanged resolution and a horrible degradation. Then he saw that the Colonel had helped Miss Barrington into the saddle and her niece was speaking.

"I have something to ask Mr. Courthorne and will overtake you," she said.

The others rode on, and the girl turned to Winston. "I made you a promise and did my best to keep it, but I find it harder than I fancied it would be," she said. "I want you to release me."

"I should like to hear your reasons," said Winston.

The girl made a gesture of impatience. "Of course, if you insist."

"I do," said Winston quietly.

"Then I promised you to have my holding sown this year, and I am still willing to do so, but though my uncle makes no protest, I know he feels my opposition very keenly, and it hurts me horribly. Unspoken reproaches are the worst to bear, you know, and now Dane and some of the others are following your lead, it is painful to feel that I am taking part with them against the man who has always been kind to me."

"And you would prefer to be loyal to Colonel Barrington, even if it costs you a good deal?"

"Of course!" said Maud Barrington. "Can you ask me?"

Winston saw the sparkle in her eyes and the half-contemptuous pride in the poise of the shapely head. Loyalty, it was evident, was not a figure of speech with her, but he felt that he had seen enough and turned his face aside.

"I knew it would be difficult when I asked," he said. "Still, I cannot give you back that promise. We are going to see a great change this year, and I have set my heart on making all I can for you."

"But why should you?" asked Maud Barrington, somewhat astonished that she did not feel more angry.

"Well," said Winston gravely, "I may tell you by and by, and in the meanwhile you can set it down to vanity. This may be my last venture at Silverdale, and I want to make it a big success."

The girl glanced at him sharply, and it was because the news caused her an unreasonable concern that there was trace of irony in her voice.

"Your last venture? Have we been unkind to you, or does it simply imply that, as you once insinuated, an exemplary life becomes monotonous?"

Winston laughed. "No. I should like to stay here—a very long while," he said, and the girl saw he spoke the truth, as she watched him glance wistfully at the splendid teams, great plows, and rich black soil. "In fact, strange as it may appear, it will be virtue, given the rein for once, that drives me out when I go away."

"But where are you going to?"

Winston glanced vaguely across the prairie, and the girl was puzzled by the look in his eyes. "Back to my own station," he said softly, as though to himself, and then turned with a little shrug of his shoulders. "In the meanwhile there is a good deal to do, and once more I am sorry I cannot release you."

"Then, there is an end of it. You cannot expect me to beg you to, so we will discuss the practical difficulty. I cannot under the circumstances borrow my uncle's teams, and I am told I have not sufficient men or horses to put a large crop in."

"Of course!" said Winston quietly. "Well, I have now the best teams and machines on this part of the prairies, and I am bringing Ontario men in—I will do the plowing—and, if it will make it easier for you, you can pay me for the services."

There was a little flush on the girl's face. "It is all distasteful, but as you will not give me back my word, I will keep it to the letter. Still, it almost makes me reluctant to ask you a further favor."

"This one is promised before you ask it," said Winston quietly.

It cost Maud Barrington some trouble to make her wishes clear, and Winston's smile was not wholly one of pleasure as he listened. One of the young English lads, who was, it appeared, a distant connection of the girl's, had been losing large sums of money at a gaming table, and seeking other equally undesirable relaxations at the railroad settlement. For the sake of his mother in England, Miss Barrington desired him brought to his senses, but was afraid to appeal to the Colonel, whose measures were occasionally more Draconic than wise.

"I will do what I can," said Winston. "Still, I am not sure that a lad of this kind is worth your worrying over, and I am a trifle curious as to what induced you to entrust the mission to me?"

The girl was embarrassed, but she saw that an answer was expected. "Since you ask, it occurred to me that you could do it better than anybody else," she said. "Please don't misunderstand me, but I fancy it is the other man who is leading him away."

Winston smiled somewhat grimly. "Your meaning is quite plain, and I am already looking forward to the encounter with my fellow-gambler. You believe that I will prove a match for him."

Miss Barrington, to her annoyance, felt the blood creep to her forehead, but she looked at the man steadily, noticing the quiet forcefulness beneath his somewhat caustic amusement.

"Yes," she said, simply; "and I shall be grateful."

In another few minutes she was galloping across the prairie, and when she rejoined her aunt and Barrington, endeavored to draw out the latter's opinion respecting Courthorne's venture by a few discreet questions.

"Heaven knows where he was taught it, but there is no doubt that the man is an excellent farmer," he said. "It is a pity that he is also to all intents and purposes mad."

Miss Barrington glanced at her niece, and both of them smiled, for the Colonel usually who questioned his opinions.

In the meanwhile Winston sat swaying on the driving-seat, mechanically guiding the horses, and noticing how the prairie sod rolled away in black waves beneath the great plow. He heard the crackle of fibers beneath the triple shares, and the swish of greasy loam along the moldboard's side, but his thoughts were far away, and when he raised his head, he looked into the dim future beyond the long furrow that cut the skyline on the rise.

It was shadowy and uncertain, but one thing was clear to him, and that was that he could not stay at Silverdale. At first, he had almost hoped he might do this, for the good land and the means of efficiently working it had been a great temptation. That was before he reckoned on Maud Barrington's attractions, but of late he had seen what these were leading him to, and all that was good in him recoiled from an attempt to win her. Once he had dared to wonder whether it could be done, for his grim life had left him self-centered and bitter, but that mood had passed, and it was with disgust he looked back upon it. Now he knew that the sooner he left Silverdale the less difficult it would be to forget her, but he was still determined to vindicate himself by the work he did, and make her affairs secure. Then, with or without confession, he would slip back into the obscurity he came from.

While he worked the soft wind rioted about him, and the harbingers of summer passed north in battalions overhead—crane, brant-goose, and mallard, in crescents, skeins, and wedges, after the fashion of their kind. Little long-tailed gophers whisked across the whitened sod, and when the great plow had rolled through the shadows of a bluff, jack rabbits, pied white and gray, scurried amidst the rustling leaves. Even the birches were fragrant in that vivifying air, and seemed to rejoice as all animate creatures did, but the man's face grew more somber as the day of toil wore on. Still, he did his work with the grim, unwavering diligence that had already carried him, dismayed but unyielding, through years of drought and harvest hail, and the stars shone down on the prairies when at last he loosed his second team.

Then, standing in the door of his lonely homestead, he glanced at the great shadowy granaries and barns, and clenched his hand as he saw what he could do if the things that had been forced upon him were rightfully his. He knew his own mettle, and that he could hold them if he would, but the pale, cold face of a woman rose up in judgment against him, and he also knew that because of the love of her, that was casting its toils about him, he must give them up.

Far back on the prairie a lonely coyote howled, and a faint wind brought the sighing of limitless grasses out of the silence. There was no cloud in the crystalline ether, and something in the vastness and stillness that spoke of infinity, brought a curious sense of peace to him. Impostor though he was, he would leave Silverdale better than he found it, and afterwards it would be of no great moment what became of him. Countless generations of toiling men had borne their petty sorrows before him, and gone back to the dust they sprang from, but still, in due succession, harvest would follow seedtime, and the world whirled on. Then, remembering that, in the meanwhile, he had much to do which would commence with the sun on the morrow, he went back into the house and shook the fancies from him.

Jesus Meets the Human Need

By Thomas C. Clark.

Dr. H. Clay Trumbull tells of an exceptionally intelligent student who had come to accept the general views of Darwin, Huxley, and Spencer, and who regarded himself as an agnostic. One day he made up his mind that he would fairly examine the strongest presentation of Christian truth. He was advised to study the Gospel of John.

When he had read the book through, he said: "The one of whom this book tells either is the Saviour of the world, or ought to be." Having reached this conclusion, he determined to make him his, and is now pointing others to him as the only possible Saviour.

Any man of average mental and spiritual endowment will come to the same conclusion as this man, if he will only deal fairly with the question.

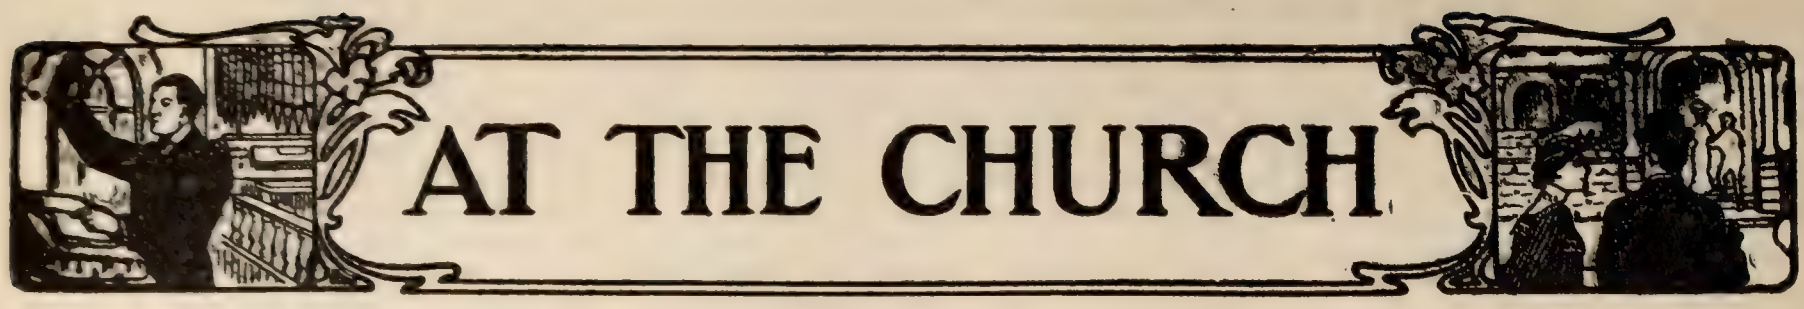
A certain man, having boastingly represented himself to a minister as being an agnostic, was called upon by him in his library a short time afterward. As the minister looked over the books of the boasted unbeliever, he searched in vain for any works treating the positive side of the question upon which he claimed to have reached a conclusion. There were Tom Paine, Voltaire, Ingersoll, but no Paley or Geikie. Was he dealing fairly with the question?

That Jesus does meet the human need is evidenced further by the reception given him by the heathen peoples. In the course of mission work on one of the Tahiti Islands, an aged chief, hearing impressively presented the fact that "Jesus came into the world to save sinners," rose amid a crowd of natives, and, running his fingers through the long locks of his white hear and lifting them up over his head, exclaimed:

"Do you see those white locks? Once they were as black as the wing of a raven; now they are as white as snow, and I have waited all these years to hear words like these."

Truly Philip expressed a human longing when he said to Jesus, "Show us the Father, and it sufficeth us," and St. Augustine spoke for all humanity when he breathed the prayer: "Thou hast made us for Thyself, and our souls are restless till they find their rest in Thee."

Impelling Motives



Charles M. Fillmore.

The evangelization of America is one of our highest patriotic duties. Preachers are greater necessities than politicians. Saving souls is paramount to steering the ship of state. Salvation is superior to legislation. The Bible is better than any law book.

We ought to back up the work of the American Christian Missionary Society, not simply from a sense of duty, but with a righteous pride. We ought to be proud of what she has done in the past with her limited resources. But more than that it ought to appeal to our pride to desire our country to be the genuinely Christian land which we know it ought to be.

But above all, the love of Christ can surely mingle with the love of country in constraining us to put forth unusual efforts to do in this Centennial year something really worthy of the great American Christian plea which we as a religious people are making.

—A woman writer on one of the big Chicago dailies said last week. "The fashion makers of women's clothes these days seem to be under the impression that every day is the first of April." This is certainly true. The sex that arrays itself in the outrageous wearing apparel that the fashionable woman of 1909 dons can hardly expect to be taken seriously when it demands the ballot.

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

Early Mission Work in Cyprus*

The book of Acts is the record of the early Christian missions. There are many other purposes which find place in this remarkable volume, but it is apparent that one of its chief values is that of tracing the widening of the circles of evangelism in the first century. More particularly is the second portion of the book, beginning with the 13th chapter, devoted to this theme. Paul's work, in spite of the fact that he passed many years of his life in residence in one or another of the leading cities of the world, is in reality the great traveler and missionary of apostolic times. For this purpose he was chosen and he ever magnified his office. From the city of Antioch in Syria, the second capital of Christianity, he went forth on those remarkable journeys which rapidly extended the frontiers of the church through Asia Minor and into Europe itself.

Leaders in Antioch.

Paul had been engaged in the work at Antioch for some months with Barnabas and other devoted spirits when the impulse to spread the new truth in the regions beyond became too strong to be longer restrained. The church was ably led by men who had become conspicuous as teachers and preachers. Barnabas easily stood at the head of this company. Then there was Simeon, surnamed Niger; Lucius, who had come from Cyrene, on the African coast and was possibly one of those who had founded the church at Antioch (Acts 11:20); Manean, an early companion of Herod, the King, and last of all Saul himself. The order in which these men are mentioned is evidently not accidental. Paul was the latest to arrive upon the scene and the one least conspicuous among these leaders. It was only the future that could reveal his qualities as the foremost champion of the Christian faith.

The Call of the World.

These men and the others who made up the membership of the Antioch church were deeply concerned regarding the wide proclamation of the truth they had received. So earnest were they in their attention to the enterprise that it became the engrossing theme of their conferences together. Their ministry was devoted to the accomplishment of this end, and with this in view they fasted. In such a condition of mind they were quick to apprehend the will of the divine Spirit. Indeed all the work of the apostolic church is conceived as having been directed by the Spirit of Christ. Nothing was counted as of more personal or even collective initiative. When the church, acting with unity of purpose and devotion to the cause of the Master, was moved to take up a new enterprise, it was deemed the call of the Spirit. In this regard early Christianity was far more reverent than the church in our day. We have many organizations, committees and departments; and yet there is rarely that fine and high sense of the Spirit's leadership which the early church enjoyed. Is the Spirit less the leader in Christian work today than in the times of the apostles? Have we deemed the work of apostolic days so holy and exclusive that we have shut away the operation of the Spirit of God into that compartment of Christian history, outside of which we deem it sacriligious to recognize it?

The Departure.

The absorbing question of further evangelism with Antioch as a center led to immediate action. Whether the will of the Spirit was voiced by one of the prophets or was recognized in the common impulse of the church we are left uninformed, but it was by divine direction that the two men, Saul and Barnabas, were sent forth after prayer and fasting and the imposition of hands. This last action conferred no authority; it only emphasized the heartiness of that good will and devotion which the church felt in sending forth these two ambassadors. They journeyed down from Antioch the thirteen miles to the mouth of the Orontes, where Seleucia, the seaport, was situated. Thence they sailed away to the southwest one hundred and twenty-five miles to the island of Cyprus. This had been the home of Barnabas, and probably it was this fact which determined the first foreign field of Christian missions. Salamis was an eastern seaport of the island, but the site is now marked only by a few ruins. There was a numerous Jewish population in this city and no doubt this gave opportunity for preaching in the synagogues, which seems to have been the first method pursued by Paul in his missionary work. It is possible that the Mnason mentioned in Acts 21:16 as an early disciple of Cyprus, was converted on this visit. Barnabas and Saul had brought with them John, surnamed Mark, the son of Mary of Jerusalem. He had accompanied them homeward from Jerusalem to Antioch on the occasion of their journey to bear alms to the church in the holy city. He now came with them as a helper in the new work. As a young man he would be of great value to them in the minor duties of their mission, and doubtless he had undertaken the work with enthusiasm as likely to be an interesting and valuable experience.

The City of Paphos.

It does not seem likely that they remained long at Salamis. Little is said of the work here beyond the fact that they preached in the synagogues. Departing, therefore, they traveled the island to its western extremity where the city of Paphos was one of the most famous centers of heathen worship in the world of that day. It was the traditional place where Venus, the goddess of the sea, had risen from the foam, and her worship here was attended with those rites which did so much to degrade the moral life of the community. "Paphian Venus" was the title that linked the name of the town with the most seductive and the most degrading of the heathen practices of the age.

Conversion of Sergius Paulus.

In this city resided the proconsul of the island, the Roman representative in Cyprus, who probably maintained something of a court in this capital city. This man, Sergius Paulus is commended as a man of discernment, anxious to know the truth in an age when so many diverse doctrines were proclaimed. In his circle of attendants there was a certain magician of much the same character as Simon of Samaria. This man, Bar-jesus of Elymas by name, had used all his arts to influence the proconsul. Perhaps for this very reason Sergius Paulus was the more anxious to hear the new teachers who came to his city. The jealousy of the magician brought him into open conflict with the Christian preachers. Paul's rebuke of the man was fiery and vehement. It shows the nature of the man of Tarsus, at least in the opening years of his apostolic career. Whether he would have pronounced like judgment upon an offender of the type of this magician at a later time in his life, when he had a fuller perception of the spirit of his Master we can only conjecture. Certainly Peter at Samaria had not so drastically dealt with Simon the sorcerer. In attempting to explain incidents of this character we must remember that the apostles were actuated by such devotion to the cause of their Lord that any opposition seemed to them worthy of the severest condemnation. We can only ask ourselves whether Jesus would have pronounced such condign judgment on offenders of this character, and upon the basis of our knowledge of his spirit, estimate the finality and justice of the apostles' conduct. It is perhaps also true that the narrators of New Testament history, through whose hands these incidents passed, were not so sensitive to the ethical ideas of Jesus as the church has become through the centuries of his teaching.

The New Leader and the New Name.

It is at this moment in the story of Paul's life that the leadership seems to pass with something of suddenness from Barnabas to himself. When they had left Antioch it was "Barnabas and Saul" who went; but when they left the island it was "Paul and his company." In this brief time the historian has felt the transfer of leadership from one to the other, a leadership which was never recalled. The change in Paul's name at this point is probably without significance. No doubt from childhood he bore the two names, "Saul," in the Hebrew circle. and "Paul," in the Gentile. The fact that Sergius Paulus was the name of the proconsul is a mere coincidence. The apostle had now passed from the initial group of Jewish Christians to the outside world of Gentile influence, and the Roman name was more appropriate. He had passed the first stage of his missionary career. The work of wider evangelism was fully begun.

PRAYER MEETING

By Silas Jones

THE GOSPEL AND AMERICA.
Topic, April 28. I. Cor. 16:8, 9.

That keen and sympathetic observer of American life, James Bryce, says: "Life is for all classes, except the very poorest, far more filled with amusements, than it used to be, and the sense that everybody has a right to amusements has gone so far with many as to make amusement appear to be the chief end of man. Without at all implying that there is any moral decline visible, still less that there is anything wrong in the desire for enjoyment, one may observe that the notions of duty and self-control seem less present to the minds of most people than they once were, and that the claim of the individual to indulge his will, or it may be his caprice, in some matters of serious import to society such as, for instance, the marriage relation, has become more avowed and more aggressive. Life has always been a very material affair to many. There were always those who said, 'Let us eat and drink for tomorrow we die.' I will not assert that there are more persons who say so now, or who act upon the principle. But they seem nowadays less abashed. In certain classes of the community, and especially among those who are of native American stock, the old New England traditions of moral earnestness and religious practice continue to be powerful, and a form of Puritanism, much broadened and softened, has not wholly vanished. But the ratio these classes bear to the whole population has been greatly reduced. The children of the immigrants who have poured like a flood into the United States during the last sixty years are strangers to these time honored traditions. The moral sanctions which in Europe governed the life of the new comers, whatever these sanctions were, have well nigh vanished, except, of course, so far as they continue to belong to some Christian church or to a Jewish synagogue; and with many the influence of church or synagogue scarcely affects moral conduct. This vast mass of people injected into a country with whose previous moral and religious life they have practically no connection is a new and formidable phenomenon."

An Open Door.

The churches of America have ample opportunity to expend their energies in useful labors. Lack of vision or wilful neglect of duty alone accounts for inactivity. The immigrant is a challenge to every church. New land. He can be won to the church. New methods may be needed. To many of the immigrants the church stands for oppression. They have come to America for freedom and they are determined not to have another yoke of bondage imposed upon them. They must be convinced that the church is an institution of freedom before they will give heed to the preaching of the gospel. The machinery of America feeds on foreigners. It cripples them and kills them and the owners of the machinery too often leave to poverty the maimed workman and the widow and orphan of the murdered workman. Recent investigation in Pittsburg, reveals "an altogether incredible amount of overwork by everybody," "inadequate provision for the contingencies of sickness, accident and death," "the destruction of the family life, not in any imaginary sense, but by the demands of the day's work, and by the very demonstrable and material method of typhoid fever and industrial accidents; both preventable, but costing in single years in Pittsburg considerably more than a thousand lives, and irretrievably shattering as many homes." While we are trying to reach the foreigner, we should not overlook the home-born who uses the foreigner as a piece of machinery and casts him aside when the money profit ends. The gospel of the Son of God who loved us and gave himself for us, is evidently not believed by some who were born Americans.

Many Adversaries.

At Ephesus, where Paul wrote 1 Corinthians there was an adversary in the person of Demetrius the silversmith. His craft was endangered by the preaching of the apostle. He and his fellow-craftsmen raised a riot in the name of Diana but the motive was personal gain. He is not without honor on earth to-day. The mob still howls when its special privilege is withdrawn through the preaching of the truth that benefits all. The magicians were opposed to the gospel. Some of them were converted but doubtless the majority continued to practice the curious arts. At the present, superstition holds its thousands in servitude. Straightforward living in accordance with the simplicity of the Master's example fails to attract vast multitudes. They are impressed by the mysterious. Common sense is too common for them. They support the wandering fakir instead of the church that is doing heroic service for the Master. The demons of uncleanness opposed Paul in every place he preached. They oppose the church to-day wherever it is doing its duty. We have no right to complain that there is no good fighting for the church; there is fighting all along the line.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

By Richard W. Gentry

HEROES OF AFRICAN MISSIONS.
Topic, April 25, 1909: Jer. 1:6-12.

It is with just pride that the church of the Disciples can point to heroic works in Africa that is being done by its own money and under its own supervision. The name of Dr. Royal J. Dye, and the work it stands for, has become a well known one throughout Disciple households.

The Work At Bolenge.

Our readers are no doubt already familiar, through reading our current Disciple literature, with the great work that is being done at Bolenge, Africa. This labor is directed at both the body and the soul. Medical missions form a vital part of our foreign work. In Africa the terrible rum traffic must be fought, the report coming from Bolenge that fifty percent of the result of the missionary labor is lost on its account. Following this effort to teach the natives medicine and proper living is that directed toward educational and spiritual uplift. Great things are also accomplished here, there having been fifty baptisms last October, and fifty-two more in January.

African missions have also a noble past, with many noble names. But there is one at the sound of which every head bows in reverence and admiration.

David Livingstone.

The following is but a birdseye view of a great man: His youth was spent working in cotton mills, fourteen hours a day. At the same time his education was obtained. "My reading in the factory was carried on by placing the book on a portion of the spinning jenny, so that I could catch sentence after sentence as I passed at my work." Though great, he was human, and would say, "Mother, if you'll bar the door, I'll scrub the floor for you." His first sermon was a failure. When he arose to speak, the whole thing left him, and abruptly saying, "Friends, I have forgotten all I had to say," he fled.

Livingstone made a number of voyages to, and trips through Africa, details of which, our readers can find in any good life of him. His work had two sides, scientific and religious. He made important discoveries, among various large lakes. He had an accurate knowledge of astronomy. "You could go to any point across the entire continent along Livingstone's track and feel certain of your position," said Sir Thomas McLean, the astronomer-royal.

But his work has also its heart side, he said, "Cannot the love of Christ carry the missionary where the slave trade carries the slave trader," again, "I go back to Africa to make an open path for commerce and Christianity." He hated the slave trade "with perfect hatred." Said Stanley later, "I never found a fault in him, but each day's life with him added to my admiration for him."

The courage and self-sacrifice of the man were sublime. Outfits were poor, natives fought him, fever racked him. But in vain did Stanley urge him to return home. He would not go. At last he had to be carried through a country flooded by the rains. And when he could travel no farther, he rested in a native hut. There, early in the morning, he was found lifeless by his servants, kneeling by the bed-side as if in prayer. This poem was dedicated in his memory, "Open the Abbey doors and bear him in

To sleep with king and statesman, chief and sage.
The missionary come of weaver kin,
But great by work that brooks no lower wage.
He needs no epitaph to guard his name
Which men shall prize while worthy work is known;
He lived and died for good—be that his fame.
Let marble crumble: this is Living—stone."

The Flutes of Spring

By Ethel B. Howard.

In Scribner's Magazine.

The flutes of spring are all in tune
And playing everywhere.
Oh, crystal-clear and ripple-toned
They sound along the air.

The long arpeggios of the sun
Sweep over hill and plain,
And in the misty valleys sound
The runs and trills of rain.

Wild melodies of strolling winds
Go swift across the sky,
The young-leafed wood is loud with calls,
Where nesting robins fly.

Some spirit roams upon the earth,
New-born, wing-sandalled, free,
And for him, where he strays, the flutes
Pour out their melody.

Then listen to the tune of them
That play at April's birth,
Whose call is to the waking heart
From the deep soul of earth.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY.

VII. INVOLUNTARY ATTENTION IN TRAINING. This is seen when either the subject itself or the way of presenting it brings every eye to the teacher's desk. It shows itself in STILLNESS, EAGERNESS, and EXPECTANCY. In the selection of lesson material the question of involuntary attention should be carefully studied in order that the lesson shall be such for each grade that the pupils will want to study them without added pressure. All children will pay attention to a well-told story without being told to keep quiet and listen. Boys of the "difficult age" will attend to map-making and the construction of models (manual work) when the old "question and answer" lesson would leave them incorrigible.

VIII. VOLUNTARY ATTENTION IN TEACHING. It has been said that teaching should make use of voluntary attention only. That is an error. There are many things we have to learn that we would not pay attention to unless we had to do so. The pupil must be taught to FORCE HIS ATTENTION, to concentrate his thoughts on the book or blackboard or lesson talk in spite of the allurements of other and more immediate interests. One of the weaknesses of modern pedagogy is that it tends to bribe the scholars into attention by making things easy for them. The great moral worth of VOLUNTARY ATTENTION, which is the intellectual aspect of self-control, is thus missed. In the earlier grades involuntary attention should be made use of more largely; in the grades from the junior up voluntary attention should have precedence, but neither should be used to the exclusion of the other.

IX. HOW TO SECURE VOLUNTARY ATTENTION. (1) Voluntary attention is to be TAKEN FOR GRANTED rather than demanded. It should never be bribed. It cannot be secured by scolding or by constant appeals such as "Children pay attention." (2) Among the motives that may legitimately be appealed to are: The practical use of the lessons, the pride of knowing, legitimate rivalry between classes and individuals. (3) The SELF-ACTIVITY of the class. One of the definitions of interest is self-activity. Don't try to do all the work for the class, but set it to work. (4) Be INTERESTED yourself and show it. (5) Put as much VARIETY into the lesson as possible. Monotony is death to interest. No one can pay attention to that which does not change.

X. THE GREAT PROBLEM OF TEACHING. Voluntary attention cannot be maintained for any length of time unless interest be somehow stimulated. The lesson must grow interesting, or with the best will in the world the class will lapse into inattention. Voluntary attention is only a means to an end, namely, involuntary attention. The aim of all teaching whatsoever is to MAKE VOLUNTARY ATTENTION BECOME SPONTANEOUS. Thus at the beginning of a lesson before a word is uttered, the teacher should demand that every eye be in his direction and every mind awake. But that attitude of attention cannot possibly be maintained, even by force of fear, unless the lesson be made interesting enough to secure the attention of the pupils without demanding it.

XI. MORAL ASPECT OF ATTENTION. The will is determined in its action by attention. Of several competing notions in my mind the one that gains ascendency and upon which I finally act is the one that holds itself focal in my consciousness—the one I "attend to" the most. It is a simple physiological fact that the longer and harder we think of any act the more our muscles tend to go through the motions necessary to its carrying out. Our mouths water at the sight of dainties; we think of a tune and unconsciously hum it; we "pat our feet" as we watch the dance. Anticipating a pleasure or pain is going through in a fragmentary way the muscular processes involved in realizing it.

XII. ATTENTION AND TEMPTATION. Temptation, therefore, is simply a persistent endeavor of a wrong idea to become central in consciousness. The wrong act is decided upon just as soon as THE ATTENTION HAS SETTLED ON THE WRONG IDEA. The way to conquer temptation is simple. It is to SHIFT THE ATTENTION. Many people go about fighting temptation in the wrong way—against the act, namely, instead of against the thought. But to do that is to fire the train and then to try to keep it from exploding the magazine. The pedagogical insignificance of this is plain. The teacher must train the pupils to "attend to" right ideas however unpalatable. Paul gives the clue in Phillipians 4:8. "Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report . . . think on these things." This is why the habit of voluntary attention in the class-room is so valuable, and why so much of the modern practice that puts spontaneous interest and attention in the foreground is morally unsound. Moreover all teaching should be positive. The less the word "don't" is introduced the better. The knowledge of evil is the first step towards its realization. Fill the child's mind with right ideas to the exclusion as far as possible of wrong ones, and train him in the habit of attending to these alone; and you have laid the soundest possible foundation for a life of virtue. Again Paul gives the clue: "Let not ———— even be named among you." "Thus are your pupils to be saved; first by the stock of ideas with which you furnish them; second by the amount of voluntary attention they can exert in holding to the right one, however unpalatable; and third by the several habits of acting definitely on these latter to which they have been successfully trained."—(James.)

LITERATURE: Same as in preceding lesson. QUESTIONS: (1) What bearing has "involuntary attention" on teaching? (2) What is the place of "voluntary attention" in teaching? (3) Discuss "making things easy" for the pupils. (4) Name five ways in which "voluntary attention" can be secured. (5) What relation has self-activity to attention? (6) What is the great problem of teaching? (7) What is the moral aspect of attention? (8) Explain its physiological basis. (9) What bearing has attention on temptation? (10) From this point of view explain how temptation can be overcome.

—The German Crown Princess, a few months ago, placed a big order with a leading firm that owns a house in London as well as Paris. Besides spending some thousands on directoire gowns the Princess ordered $15,000 worth of sables on the same occasion. Some people may think that the little German lady is extravagant, but as far as that is concerned she is mild compared with some American ladies whose male relatives are connected with big steel and other corporations.

Missionaries in India Hold Convention

By Mary McGavran, Damoh, India.

The annual convention of the Christian Mission in India was held in Jabalpur March 4 to 8, 1909. There were present in all, forty missionaries, from fifteen stations, and the old saying that it was the best ever held became a statement of a simple fact. The work done, the fellowship enjoyed and the Spirit's presence made a time to be remembered. As has been our custom of late a call to prayer was issued some time before and in every station, not merely in a formal way but in very deed and truth each one tried to make himself ready to be guided and blessed.

Six new missionaries were welcomed and each in turn was glad and proud to be counted one of the India Mission. What a big place each one of them will have to fill in the new India! Each added year making the heart more glad.

Three old missionaries have returned. They too were rejoicing in being counted again with the India crowd.

On the compound, near the new Bible college where all the meetings were held has been erected a large shed for a dining room. In this all the meals were served. The place cards were rearranged each meal so we had an opportunity to see and chat with all. Some very happy hours were spent there.

Christian Union Movement.

There were no visitors this year, so everyone was working and there was no rest from committees—even in the dining shed! The time given to the convention is very short for all the work that is to be done. More this year than we have ever had before. In answer to his prayer "that they all may be one."

The address on "The Christian Union Movements in India," and that on "Co-ordination in our Work," took up the two divisions of the great question before us today. Our relations to other missions and the native church in India and our relations to each other as missionaries and mission stations.

The same thought was carried out in the paper on "The National Movement."

"There is to be an indigenous Christian church, independent of all missions. Are we to stand aloof and see it grow without what we believe we have for it, or are we to put forth our strength and help to mould it." Are we to become part of a mighty force which will embrace all, or shall we be content to remain a small section separated from our brethren by our own desire?

Our people are entering heartily into the various conventions being held in the C. P. They are forgetting that they differ from another man. He whose life is pure and holy, who bears in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus, in whose work and conversation are seen by all the fruit of the Spirit of Christ, that a man is a Christian. When an Indian is asked about his religion he says: "I am a Christian;" not a Methodist or Presbyterian or even a Disciple Christian, but just a Christian.

Is India More Ready Than We?

All these hundred years we have plead for the union of Christ's people and does it not seem strange that these Indian people are more ready for it than we are? What has been to us a very difficult problem they will work out for themselves of we only let them.

"I believe that India will one day place in her Master's crown one of its brightest jewels." Just now, this year and the next few years how much we can do to help her. It's the same old ground which has been gone over in China and in southern India. The Christian mission has grown to be a power. This year more than any other the emphasis was laid upon the question of union and co-ordination among all our stations. In the pioneer days each missionary had to work out his problems more or less alone. Now our strength lies in working as one man for the conversion of this people.

Bible College Work Greatly Needed.

This year there were six graduates of the Bible College. Three of them were located in the Bilaspur district. The opening there is wonderful. People are ready by the hundreds to become Christians, but there is no one to teach them. Those at work in Bilaspur and Mangeli already have all they can do. The people are poor and ignorant. They need the gospel. If we believe that it can save them we must give it to them. They want it. The missionaries have had to turn away those asking for baptism because they did not know the meaning of it and there was no one to teach them.

The coming convention of the C. E. at Agra was brought before us. Our people have always been up in the C. E. work and we expect to enter heartily into the convention. Even now we are making arrangements to go and have our people go. We are looking forward to seeing a number from home and we expect them to visit our mission stations. We shall be glad to have them and shall do our best to give them a practical knowledge of mission work as it is done in India. Let us know and we will have a welcome ready. Let us know in time and we will arrange the tour amongst us for you.

C. E. Convention Prospects.

The convention will be a big thing; one of the biggest Christian meetings ever held in India. The heathen have fairs all over the land every year. These great meetings must take their place. For this reason, if for no other, we are glad the C. E. is to be held in Agra. It will be a splendid object lesson to non-Christians and a source of encouragement and blessing to weak Christians. Thousands are to go marching into Agra by every road at the same time. It will be great. Our mission is fairly near—only from four to six hundred miles.

The annual convention is to be held in Jabalpur again next year. We shall be one year older, as a mission, then. We shall each have had a whole year to grow away from self and nearer to our perfect example, so already we begin to look forward to that time—to its busy days and its fellowship. This year has great things in store for India.

CHICAGO

The Best Word That Can Be Said for the Saloon—Chicago's Secretary Visits Several Notorious Resorts—Saloon's Power Gained by Use of Good Means for Bad Ends

BY O. F. JORDAN.

The teetotaler who has never spent his first nickel in the saloon and who has never even used an alcoholic stimulant in medicine is perhaps poorly fitted to understand the power and influence of the saloon. He hates it blindly as he does his Satanic Majesty and probably makes as little first hand investigation of the former as of the latter.

It is of high importance, however, that we fairly estimate the forces of the enemy. In war, scouts go into the enemy's territory and learn the nature of the fortifications. Perhaps the work of scout is not in specially high esteem, since he is hung if caught. Whether it is a service in high esteem or not, we have been collecting information for our next temperance sermon, not out of books, but in the enemy's territory, the saloon. We have visited many, buying nothing, but observing many things that had not come to our attention before. Since the saloon stays with us so persistently, there must be some elements of strength in it. Men do not long tolerate a social evil that does not have some redeeming features. Why does the saloon with all of its abhorrent work still thrive in our city?

The Saloon a Political Force.

The saloon thrives because it is a force in the politics of the city. It has been demonstrated that no candidate can be elected under ordinary circumstances who does not remain at least neutral on the question. There is no more active political propaganda in the city than that which is carried on by the bartenders who act under the direction of their organization which in turn bargains with the ward bosses. "Hinky Dink" is not what one would call a statesman. "Bath-house John" would not go down in history as the Saviour of his country. Both, however, furnish protection to the saloon habitues and receive in return the votes that keep them in the city council. If the church members of Chicago knew how many times they voted tickets which had been fixed up in the rear end of saloons, they might have a change of political faith.

The saloon, however, furnishes in return for the votes of its patrons many advantages which they appreciate. The other day we decided to visit "Hinky Dink's barrel house." The side-walk was lined with men standing in front and we lowered our camera on the group for a picture. They were panic-stricken and fell over each other to get into the saloon. On inquiring of a policeman why they acted so peculiarly, we were told that most of them had police court records and they were doubtless afraid we were "fly cops" (detectives) wanting to get some ones picture for the purposes of identifying a criminal. This saloon has a long row of beer barrels in front from which its name comes. It has the distinctions of giving the largest glass of beer in the city. A man we know added the information that it was also about the worst. The men inside know that in case of arrest the brave alderman of the first ward will do the best he can for them. They come when they are "broke" or in trouble and always find the alderman sympathetic.

Headquarters for Unemployed.

There are also saloons which run labor bureaus. We found one on Canal street which had a long list of places where men would be employed by the hundreds. Doubtless the railroad contractors come here to find men and the men come here to learn of the great construction jobs that require rough labor. It is natural for the men to come back when the job is over and spend their earnings at this saloon which helped them to a job. They know another job will be found for them when the money is all gone. The man who gets a job from the saloon looks upon it as a philanthropic institution.

The saloon also furnishes a cheap way of living for men of slender means. There are men in stores about Chicago that get but little over a dollar a day. The prices at the restaurants are prohibitive for such as these. Many of them live for one or two meals of the day on the free lunch at the saloon. A five cent piece buys a drink and gives them access to the free lunch. It would be hard for these men to live but for this feature of the city life. It is small wonder that these who must look to the saloon for life and sustenance should regard it as a philanthropic institution.

The Poor Man's Club.

The saloons also furnish a place for rest and recreation. Many of them keep the daily papers on hand and furnish the latest racing and baseball news by special wire. In these places also will occur theatrical exhibitions, questionable it is true, but yet affording relief to the tired nerves that have been driven all day at the desperate pace of the city. Men whose homes are unpleasant congregate here. Men who have no home but a stuffy room in a boarding house bask in the light and revel in the music. It is not at all peculiar that these men should look upon the saloon as a desirable feature of our social life.

We must not forget the other side of the story, however. The indictment that is brought against the saloon by the reformers is but too true. The alliance with every form of unsocial conduct is but too clear. We were warned about our visiting some of the notorious saloons at night. We were told that hold-up men followed men out of these places and at the first dark place in the street got in their deadly work. The court records make any one bold to say that the saloons of Chicago have been found to be all too often in league with burglars, hold-up men and every type of desperate criminal. In cleaning up a notorious neighborhood, it has always been necessary to eliminate some saloon which was the hang-out of the most vicious element. That prostitution and gambling love to keep company with the saloon is but too true. The houses of prostitution in Chicago are usually licensed as saloons and bonds are given and accepted by the city that the holder of the license is of "good moral character."

City Home Life Broken Up.

The breaking up of home life in Chicago is going on at a terrible rate on account of the saloon. In the wealthier circles there is an increasing number of women who drink. During the last National Republican Convention, one might visit the Pompeiian room of the Auditorium or the wealthier saloons along Wabash avenue and find well-dressed and respectable women in almost equal numbers with the men drinking all the beverages that the men drank. Also at the other end of the social scale we find the same result. Children are on the street whose mother is drunk in the neighborhood saloon. The greatest poverty, misery and degradation is found everywhere in the slum districts where the women drink with the men.

The nervousness and hysteria of city life is increased by the use of alcohol. The business man gets too tired to work up to standard. Instead of taking nature's warning and finding rest, he will often resort to stimulants which disguise his real condition. This sort of man meets an early break-down. Burning his candle at both ends it is the sooner consumed.

The Saloon is Anarchy Institutionalized

The Saloon is also the great promoter of anarchy in the city life. Its violations of the law are notorious. Only in recent years was it possible for the city administration to close the saloons for part of the night. The one o'clock closing ordinance is now enforced only with the greatest diligence on the part of the officers. Quite frequently the newspapers tell of the exploit of some reporter who bought liquor in prominent saloons at the forbidden hours. As for closing on Sunday, this "blue law" is declared a dead letter. The Supreme Court of Illinois has pronouced the law in force but candidates of both political parties are compelled to run on platforms of non-enforcement of the law. This disrespect for the law works disastrously throughout the city. It becomes the creed of many that we may choose what laws shall be obeyed according to our own pleasure.

The saloon, then is a strange mixture of good and evil. It wears the livery of heaven as it ministers in many ways neglected by the church and the municipality. But this only serves to conceal for some men the real nature of a traffic which unlike any other business in the world has fallen almost entirely into the hands of men who would disregard every known law to make money. The saloon never seemed more triumphantly on the neck of the people than today in Chicago. Some great evils most triumph and become over-bearing and presumptious before the time of their downfall.

CHURCH NOTES IN CHICAGO.

R. E. L. Prunty is planning a building project in Chicago Heights. He reports the outlook very favorable there for increase of membership and standing in the community.

The Armour Avenue Church has a group of entertainers who sing and recite most acceptably. They gave an entertainment at Englewood recently. The proceeds of their work will go into the liquidating of their church debt.

For four Sunday nights, the Evanston Church has had audiences that have required the assistance of the city to handle, lest the building be over-crowded. This has resulted from the work of several large choruses and from the generous advertising campaign that has been carried on.

The church at Garfield Boulevard has decided to discontinue its work. This decision was made a year ago but they reconsidered and decided to try the work another year. The territory is bounded by foreign element and has five Protestant churches within a stone's throw. This and a number of other considerations has induced them to make the decision they have.

A reception was held at the Hyde Park Church for Mrs. Mary Agnew as she was leaving for South Dakota. She has been prominent in our larger tasks in Chicago, serving most acceptably as president of the city organizations of the C. W. B. M. She will be greatly missed both in her church and in the work of all the churches.

Our statement last week concerning the meeting at Sheffield Avenue Church was inaccurate in one particular. The pastor who has been assisting is Pastor Brown of Charleston, Illinois. Charles Bloom of Newman, Illinois, is also preaching a week for them. The special meetings have brought much encouragement to the church.

The Meeting at Harvey conducted by the pastor, W. D. Endres, resulted in twenty-eight additions, the largest part of them adults. Eighteen of them were on confession of faith. This substantial addition to the church there will help them to do an even larger work in the community. The audiences hearing the preaching were the largest in the history of the church.

The renting of a hall for the Sunday evening services of the Dounglas Park Church has succeeded beyond anyone's expectation. The first Sunday night, more came than could have been gotten into the little church building. The second Sunday night this audience was doubled. The experiment will be continued through May. Harry F. Burns, the pastor, is carrying on a campaign of advertising that will benefit the church for years to come.

National Bible School Institute at Bethany Park

The National Bible School Association is planning a second National Bible Institute to be held at Bethany Park, Indiana, August 5 to 8. Those who remember the great occasion of last year will be glad of the opportunity of attending a second great gathering.

The first day Thrusday, August 5, will be devoted to the interests of the Elementary and Intermediate grades of the Sunday-school. Teachers and workers in the Beginners' and Cradle Roll, Primary, Junior and Intermediate departments of the Bible school will wish to attend the sessions of this day for instruction and inspiration. We are very fortunate in securing Mrs. Maud V. Baldwin of Indianapolis, as dean of this day. Mrs. Baldwin is one of the best known Sunday-school workers in the United States, and is one of the Indiana workers in the International Sunday-school Association.

There will be four periods in the morning devoted respectively to Cradle Roll and Beginners', Primary, Juniors, and Intermediate grades. The morning session will be closed by an address by Mrs. Baldwin, in which she will sum up the four preceding addresses. The afternoon program will consist of four simultaneous conferences from three to four o'clock in which the speakers of the morning will gather those interested in their respective departments and conduct the round table, and also demonstrate methods of work in these different departments. Thousands of teachers and workers should attend this great day.

On Friday, August 6, Walter Mansell, of Crawfordsville, Indiana, will preside over the great Teacher Training Day. Mr. Mansell demonstrated his expertness in this work in his pastorate at Columbus, Ohio. He is arranging to have four addresses in the morning by four masters in the art and science of teacher training. There will also be a contest between successful Teacher Training Classes. Those who witnessed the contest last year will be especially interested in this feature. It will be even more fascinating than last year. In the afternoon there will be one great address and this will be followed by a congress of teacher training under the personal direction of Mr. Mansell. This great congress will be modeled after the congress of last summer.

The work of teacher training among us should receive a marvelous impetus from this great day. We are past the experimental stage in this great work, and have developed a large number of very proficient workers. These are the kind of people Mr. Mansell will have to help him on this day. It is needless to say that Herbert H. Moninger, the great teacher training leader will be present throughout this entire program and give his help especially on this day.

Saturday, August 7, will be devoted to the interests of the Adult Bible Class Department.

William Grant Smith is given complete oversight of this day. He will select his own program of the four addresses for the morning, and one address in the afternoon. The afternoon program will be closed by a conference on methods of adult Bible class work. Mr. Smith is one of the best known and successful adult Bible class workers, and the fact that he is in charge of this day should attract hundreds of adult Bible class workers and a great multitude of adult Bible class pupils.

On Sunday morning Hugh S. Butler, the noted Bible-school superintendent of Huntington, Ind., will conduct a model Bible-school. He will demonstrate in this morning session the fine methods which will be taught during the preceding days. This school should surpass in numbers and in the quality of its work the great school which was held last summer at Bethany Park.

Full details of this magnificent program will be published at a very early date. Schools everywhere should arrange to send their teachers and workers. Last year classes sent their teachers hundreds of miles to Bethany, paying all their expenses. Such classes were well repaid for their investment.

Protects the food from the taint of alum and phosphatic acids.

Bethany Park management announce many improvements in the grounds and accommodations so they are able to insure great comfort and a good time to those who attend. The evening program of these three days as well as the Sunday morning and Sunday evening sessions will be in charge of the Bethany Assembly committee. The entertainments will be worthy of Bethany Park and of the great occasion which draws the Bible-school hosts together.

The Yeuell Meeting in Connersville

Plans for the meeting had been working many months before the revival began. The intention was to hold the meeting in February but for unavoidable reasons it had to be postponed until the latter part of March. The plans of the Evangelist for the meeting were followed. The Sunday-school was enlarged to 700 (high mark) and the teachers were made a personal workers' committee.

Owing to the recent political campaign and the local option election the church was not altogether united at the beginning but all soon were working for the meeting.

The first services were on Sunday by the pastor and were continued without the invitation until the following Sunday. Mr. and Mrs. Yeuell came on Thursday. The singing was led by Mr. Rodgers and a chorus ranging from forty to eighty during the meeting. The field was truly a difficult one, there was little fellowship existing between the churches of the city. Not one of the pastors of the leading churches have ever attended an evangelistic service in this church. The field has been well gleaned, there being three revivals in the past three years, Mr. Yeuell's meeting making the fourth. The additions during the three years previous to the Yeuell meeting were nine hundred to this one church alone.

One of the three daily newspapers which had espoused the cause of the "wets" in the "local option" election was unfriendly to the church and refused a report of the meetings at first, but finally opened its columns to everything written for it. Sectarianism quietly organized and many false reports were circulated intended to damage the meeting. Yeuell kept to his task vigorously, preached a strong virile Gospel, not sickly sentimentality or tender stories; treated all other churches with respect, flooded the town with advertising, put two issues of the daily paper in each home in the city, had additions regularly throughout the meeting, united factions, made friends, was true to the plea of the Disciples and succeeded. The work of Mrs. Yeuell, as a personal worker, had a telling effect. She was instrumental in bringing many to Christ.

The meeting closed with 132 additions in twelve days of invitations. The prayers of this church will go with Yeuell from field to field.

WITH THE WORKERS

E. C. Sitts has resigned at Greenview, Ill.

To win America today is to win the world tomorrow.

Edward Clutter is in a good meeting at Maurray, Nebraska.

B. H. Seelock of Lexington, Ill., has accepted a call to Athens, Ill.

T. M. Wiles, of Anderson, Ind., reports one addition April 4 to the church at Pleasant Run, for which he preaches.

The church at Latham, Ill., is working toward a $10,000 church house. They have already raised more than half this amount.

A new church was dedicated at Flora, Oregon, Sunday, April 4, when more than the amount needed to clear the church of all indebtedness was raised.

The children of the Sunday-school at Allen, Texas, where C. E. F. Smith ministers, gave an Easter Cantata entitled, "The Message of the Lillies," with great credit to themselves.

The three churches of Youngstown, Ohio, are to unite in a banquet, May 11, when they will be addressed by P. C. MacFarlane, National Sec'y of the Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ.

A. C. Stewart, minister of the church at Urbana, Ia., is urging forward the Sunday-school work of his church. The attendance has reached 106, with forty in the Christian Endeavor Society.

J. H. MacNeil sends us a cordial invitation to attend the dedication of the new church at Winchester, Ky., which will take place, Sunday, May 2. All former pastors of the church are to be invited to attend.

The Men's Club of the First Church, Youngstown, Ohio, was recently addressed by Mr. W. M. Griswold, whose subject was "Socialism." The pastor of this church edits the men's department in the Christian Century.

Thomas H. Popplewell writes hopefully of the prospects for a revival in his church at Arkansas City, Kan. The congregation now numbers 500, with a Sunday-school close to 300. The pastor is especially proud of a class of boys between fifteen and twenty-one years which now numbers seventy-eight.

Prof. Smith, of the English Department of Drake University, is the author of a play, "The Art of Life," which, when given at the Art Institute, Chicago, proved so popular that arrangements were at once made for it to be repeated on April 10. The papers of the city spoke highly of it.

On the evening of April 10, the members of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, came together for a dinner. Addresses were by Clifford Roe, Assistant State's Attorney, who is a member of the church, subject, "The State's Attorney in the Municipal Court," and by Mr. A. M. Wilson, whose subject was, "The United Charities of Chicago."

There were five additions to the West Pullman Church by baptism on the closing day of the ministry of Guy Hoover for the church. Mr. Hoover, who has become minister of the church at Tipton, Ind., left the West Pullman Church entirely free from debt, and in every way in excellent condition.

The record of the Sunday-school of the South Broadway Church, Denver, for March 28, was, attendance 406, contribution $11.99. The attendance one year previous was 366.

An effort is being made by the Disciples of Christ in Port Arthur and Fort William, Ontario, to establish a church during the Centennial year. There are at present but twenty-five members, but they are planning for an evangelistic campaign during July.

Samuel W. Jackson, 1535 Milwaukee avenue, Portland, Oregon, writes that there is need for three up-to-date school teachers at Flora, Oregon, to fill positions of Principal, Intermediate and Primary departments. The salary is from $60 to $75 per month. Those interested should address Dr. G. M. Gilmore, Flora, Oregon.

The Decatur Herald gives a full account of an address delivered before the Central Illinois Ministerial Institute, which met in that city last week by T. W. Grafton, who discussed the ways in which men may help the boy of the church and the community. "Being Big Brothers to the Little Boys" is the way Rev. Grafton phrases it.

In connection with the meeting of the Central Illinois Ministerial Institute at Decatur last week, the men from several of the surrounding churches gathered for a banquet and were addressed by the National Sec'y, P. C. MacFarlane, who emphasized the need of Bible Study, provision for the social interest, and care of the boys of the community.

The Third District (Mo.) Annual Missionary Convention meets at Neosho, May 3 to 6, 1909. A fine program has been prepared and announced in a very attractive way. Among those on for addresses are, F. F. Walters, Joplin, Mo.; J. B. Jones, Fulton; F. L. Moffett, Springfield; C. M. Chilton, St. Joseph; J. H. Hardin, Kansas City; T. A. Abbott, Kansas City; W. J. Wright, Cincinnati; J. H. Mohortor; G. W. Muckley; N. M. Ragland, Springfield; E. L. Ely, Lebanon; D. W. Moore, Carthage; Thomas L. Cooksey, Joplin, and P. C. MacFarlane, Kansas City. This last address is to be before a great men's meeting on Thursday evening. In the C. W. B. M. session, which is held Tuesday afternoon and evening, addresses will be made by Mrs. Sadie Crank, Liberal; Mrs. J. L. Moore, Palmyra, and Mrs. Anna M. Atwater. The church at Neosho, of which J. B. Hunley is pastor extends a hearty invitation to all to attend. Lodging will be given all delegates, and meals at the church served at a very low rate.

Books You Need

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing among the Disciples of Christ. You need every one of this splendid list.

OUR CENTENNIAL BOOK
"Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union."
—Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic for this our Centennial year. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address", Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Boston W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery", Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Retail price, $1.00. No one should allow the Centennial to pass without possessing this book.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind., a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possibly only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these churches are given their present form."

Every Disciple of Christ will be interested in getting from his own pen the teachings of Professor Willett. No fair man will consent to judge him on the basis of newspaper reports. These books should be in every one's possession just now.

ERRETT GATES ILLUMINATING WORK
"The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples."

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 35c. Paper binding, 25c.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, PA.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, MASS.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes:

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement: it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

JUDGE SCOFIELD'S FASCINATING TALE
"Altar Stairs."

An ideal gift book. Beautifully bound and illustrated. Price, $1.20.

The New Christian Century Co.,

235 E. 40th St., Chicago.

WITH THE WORKERS

Sellers and St. John have been in a meeting at El Reno, Okla.

The church at Okmulgee, Okla., under the leadership of B. F. Hill, is enlarging its house of worship to make room for the Sunday-school.

The annual dinner of the Disciples of the City of New York will be given April 22. The address will be made by Dr. C. F. Aked, of the Fifth Ave. Baptist Church.

The church at Fayetteville, Ark., with W. S. Lockhart as minister, observed Passion Week, holding service each evening. There were ten additions to the church. Mrs. J. J. Taylor led the singing.

F. A. Sword and Charles E. McVey are in a meeting at Auburn, Ill., which, up to April 12 had resulted in twenty accessions to the membership. They will hold a meeting in a tent at Deer Creek, Ill., in June.

The first service in the new basement of the church at Tulsa, Okla., was held the last Sunday in March. The pastor, D. A. Wickizer, says that when the church has completed its building it must become a "Living Link."

Walter Scott Priest, Columbus, Ohio, is preaching to the largest audiences that have ever greeted him since he began in that city. With the magnificent building which the church now has, they are expecting an ever increasingly large work.

On April 1 W. S. Nay began his sixth year as pastor of the Central Church, Kansas City, Kansas. During this time the membership has been increased from 150 to 625; the church has raised over $20,000.00, and organized two missions which now have pastors.

Here is an interesting record of Sunday-school work in Oklahoma: attendance at Stillwater, 393, offering $9.00; Oklahoma City, 406, offering $15.00; Okmulgee, 293, offering $8.39; Blackwell, 183, offering $4.30; University Place, Enid, 164, offering $2.37.

The church at Irving Park, Chicago, gave a reception to Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Taylor, Friday evening, April 16. Charles H. Rioch was toastmaster. The addresses were, "Opportunities," Mr. Carl Bushnell; "We Can if We Will," Mrs. Henry Ferrin; "Shakes," J. C. B. Lathrop; "The Social Side," A. J. Jennings; "The Woman's Side," Mrs. Charles E. Chapin; and "As Others See Us," Dr. E. S. Ames, and A. W. Taylor.

The church at Springdale, Ark., has been assisted in a meeting by the State Corresponding Sec'y, J. J. Taylor, and wife. There were thirty-eight additions to the church. James McGuire, the pastor, writes with greatest appreciation of the work of Mr. and Mrs. Taylor for the cause of the Disciples in Arkansas, and says that the work in the state is made more difficult because of the presence of some people known as "Antis."

The Eighth District of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society will hold its seventh convention at Marion, Ill., June 9, 10 and 11. The program begins Wednesday afternoon and closes Friday evening. Addresses Wednesday by Mrs. S. P. C. Garst, Harrisburg; Miss L. E. Minor, Boone Gap; Mrs. M. R. Ford, Porto Rico, and Miss Lura V. Thompson. Thursday by J. H. Stambough, Marion; Paul H. Castle, Centerville; J. W. Larimore, Benton; J. Fred Jones; J. T. Alsup, Metropolis, and T. F. Hall, Herrin. Friday, C. L. Depew; J. A. Finnell, Elkville; E. W. Sears, Vienna, and Pres. R. E. Hieronymus, Eureka.

The Oklahoma Ministerial Institute meets at El Reno, May 3 to 5. The address the first evening will be by G. D. Conger, State Supt. Anti-Saloon League. Other addresses by R. G. Sears, Enid; E. A. Ewell, Durant; Oscar Ingold, Oklahoma City; J. H. O. Smith, Oklahoma City; J. E. Dinger, Chickasha; R. E. Rosenstein, Edmond; Judge William Asher, Tecumseh; "The Psychology of Salvation," E. V. Zollars, Enid; "The Immanuel Movement," Prof. O. L. Lyon, Enid; Frank L. Van Voorhis, Shawnee; Ralph Cook, Enid; O. L. Smith, El Reno; D. A. Wickizer, Tulsa, and E. T. Lane, Oklahoma City. This is a program that should command the attendance of nearly all the ministers of the state.

The Texas Christian Missionary Convention meets at Corsicana, June 4 to 8.

Homer T. Wilson, of Texas, has been chosen as financial agent for Oklahoma Christian University.

B. L. Allen has closed his work with the church at Kingfisher, Okla., and is now at Sloam Springs, Ark.

It is reported that E. S. McKinney has resigned at Woodward, Okla., where he has been five years and has done a good work.

The church at Lynchburg, Va., and Pastor Bullard are entering upon a meeting which is led by Charles Reign Scoville. They expect 1,000 additions to the church.

The Pacific Christian reports the resignation of R. Linn Cave from the pastorate of the West Side Church, San Francisco, where he has labored for the past three years. He was therefore with the church in the trying experience succeeding the earthquake.

J. T. T. Hundley, of the Park Place Church, Norfolk, Va., has just held a two weeks' meeting in South Norfolk which resulted in fifty-six additions. He will continue preaching service at this church and his church will aid them in the purchase of a lot and the erection of a building.

"The Chosen People" is the name of a paper published by Leopold Cohn, in connection with his mission among the 250,000 Jews of Brooklyn, N. Y. It was in 1894 that L. Cohn began this work without anything to depend upon except his own faith in the Father, and his own efforts. He started in a small mission. Since that time ninety Jews have been brought to faith in Christ, and a second mission has been established. A free medical dispensary is conducted in connection with the mission. Besides this there is a "poor fund" and a "Literature fund." This latter is used to purchase Hebrew Bibles, New Testaments and tracts. Mr. Cohn is at 201 Van Buren street, Brooklyn.

A new building was dedicated by the days and there were added unto them seventy church at San Jose, California, Sunday, April 3. They now have a beautiful building which will seat more than a thousand people. The sermon of the day was preached by Victor Dorris, who, with the assistance of Prof. Gates, at once began an evangelistic campaign in the church. The work of the pastor, M. W. Harkin, has contributed largely to this splendid attainment.

"The Church at Work," the weekly paper of the First Church, Lincoln, Neb., contained in the issue of April 9 a full page sketch of the life of the late Governor Poynter, who died very suddenly April 5, after having made an earnest speech in the Senate House in favor of a measure of good government. The Governor was a member of the Lincoln Church, of which H. H. Harmon is the pastor. Owing to the incomplete state of the new building of the First Church, the funeral services were held in St. Paul's M. E. Church, and were attended by a vast throng of people. William A. Poynter was born near Eureka, Illinois, in 1848, and died at Lincoln, April 5, 1909. His father was a minister of the Christian church. The son graduated at Eureka college at nineteen, and then taught school a few years and engaged in mercantile pursuits. In 1869 he married Miss Mariah McCorkle, who, together with her son, Dr. C. W. M. Poynter, and daughter, Mrs. Josephine Bickford, both of Lincoln, survive him. Mrs. Poynter is herself the daughter of a minister. The following words reveal the esteem in which the "Fallen leader" was held in the church: "There are some things of which our church family shall become increasingly conscious. We have lost a model church officer. He knew what it meant to be an elder in the church of God. He possessed the qualifications for this office as do few men to be found anywhere. He was 'apt to teach' for he knew the Word. He was a born leader for he possessed a great christian personality of force. His judgment seemed to be born of instinct, and a lover of the flock, he was therefore an 'overseer,' as scripturally implied."

H. A. Blake has resigned the pastorate of the First Church, Bristol, Va.

G. W. Mullins has resigned at Chatham, Va., where, during his pastorate, the church has built a new parsonage, and has furnished its pastor with a horse and buggy. Mr. Mullins will return to Georgia.

H. H. Peters writes: "The Endowment Campaign of Eureka College is moving along very nicely at present. The fund has gone beyond $15,000 and the leaders in the work are greatly encouraged with the prospects."

There have been forty-nine additions to the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va., since January 1. The enrollment of the Sunday-school has increased to 525. Prof. J. S. Thomas is superintendent of graded work, and Mr. Magee is manual instructor in the Sunday-school. Such work is in the direction of meeting the demands that are today made upon the church.

Through "Upward," the local paper of the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, we are informed of the resignation of B. H. Hayden from the pastorate of the Forest Ave. Church of that city. On May 1 he will close his work in Buffalo and becomes pastor of the church at London, Ont. Of his work, "Upward" says, "The Forest Ave. Church has never had a more talented, consecrated and lovable minister in its history and we are loth to give him up."

H. D. C. Maclachlan, pastor of the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, on a recent Sunday evening made a formal reply to a lecture that had just been delivered in the city by a Dr. Taylor, who affirmed that the teachings of modern science destroyed the belief in immortality. Mr. Maclachlan spoke to a crowded house and affirmed the belief, basing his argument solely upon scientific ground. His work is highly commended, as all who know him know it might well be.

TURN OVER TIME.

When Nature Hints About the Food.

When there's no relish to any food and all that one eats doesn't seem to do any good then is the time to make a turn over in the diet, for that's Nature's way of dropping a hint that the food isn't the kind required.

"For a number of years I followed railroad work, much of it being office work of a trying nature.

"Meal times were our busiest part of the day. Eating too much and too quickly of food such as is commonly served in hotels and restaurants, together with the sedentary habits were not long in giving me dyspepsia and stomach trouble which reduced my weight from 205 to 160 pounds.

"There was little relish in any food and none of it seemed to do me any good. It seemed the more I ate the thinner I got and was always hungry before another meal, no matter how much I had eaten.

"Then I commenced a fair trial of Grape-Nuts and was surprised how a small saucer of it would carry me along, strong and with satisfied appetite, until the next meal, with no sensations of hunger, weakness or distress as before.

"I have been following this diet now for several months and my improvement has been so great all the others in my family have taken up the use of Grape-Nuts, with complete satisfaction and much improve- in health and brain power.

"American people undoubtedly eat hurriedly, have lots of worry, thus hindering digestion and therefore need a food that is predigested and concentrated for nourishment in health and brain power.

Look in pkgs. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WITH THE WORKERS

The congregation at Footville, Wisconsin, where J. Harry Bullock ministers, is preparing to build as soon as spring opens. They will erect a fine new structure, with rooms and accommodations to carry on social and institutional work.

Richard Martin, assisted by the "Martin Family" of Chicago, reports 253 additions in meeting at Blackwell, Okla. He dedicates the Piedmont, Kansas, Church, April 25, and will hold meetings at Stafford, Kansas, in May. His permanent home address is 160 Pierce avenue, Chicago, Ill.

I. N. Grisso, pastor of The Central Christian Church of Fairmont, W. Va., just closed a two weeks' meeting with thirty-four additions, nearly all by confession and baptism. It was one of the best meetings in the history of this congregation.

The Sunday-school at Fairmont, W. Va., has made an increase of 126 per cent the past quarter. A Junior Society of sixty members has been organized. The 6th and 7th of April Mrs. Miriah Renolds Ford, who is organizing in W. Va., for the C. W. B. M., will be with the church in Fairmont.

The funeral of Harry Howe, one of the pioneer disciples of Wisconsin, was conducted in the Methodist Church at Footville, Wis., recently by F. M. McHale of Beloit. Mr. Howe was a member of the Beloit Church at the time of his decease. His father was the first preacher among the Disciples in Wisconsin. D. J. Howe, pastor of the church at Nickerson, Kansas, is his son.

The congregation of the Marshall Street Christian Church, Richmond, Va., have purchased a well-located lot, and will proceed to erect a new building. At a recent meeting more than enough money was subscribed for the purchase of the lot. The pastor, B. H. Melton, has been with the church seven years, during which time the church has steadily grown in numbers and in influence in the community.

The Trades Unionist of Washington, D. C., for March 27, contains a large portrait of G. A. Miller, pastor of the Ninth Street Christian Church, with the announcement that he has been chosen Fraternal Delegate from The Christian Ministerial Association to The Central Labor Union of the District of Columbia. The same paper gives a sketch of the life of Mr. Miller and comments favorably upon the action of the Association.

President Crossfield spent the early part of March in the East and visited Columbia, Yale, and Harvard Universities. On the out-going trip he visited Bethany College, and returning stopped at Hiram College. He reported his observations in a series of seven chapel talks and emphasized the impression that the great universities were most valuable in graduate study, but that the better, smaller colleges offered superior advantages to undergraduates.

About two years ago the church at Center, Wisconsin, a small country place in Rock County, was burned to the ground. There were only a few of the old membership left, so the congregation decided not to rebuild, most of them placing their membership with the congregation at Footville, four miles distant. They disposed of their land some time ago. Last week the remaining of the members held a meeting and donated the sum of $416, to help the growing church at Beloit, Wis., where F. M. McHale ministers.

A notable work has been done at Fairmont, Ind., a little town about twelve miles from Marion. One year ago W. A. McKown came there, and having his fifth Sunday free, began to gather a few Disciples together. On the first of April last year they organized with sixty members. They then purchased a good lot and began to arrange for a meeting. This was held by Austin Hunter, of Indianapolis, who preached for twenty-nine days and there were added unto them sexenty-nine persons. The church is very enthusiastic and expects to go forward to ever greater things.

Telegrams

Indianapolis, Ind.—Bethany Assembly will install a complete sewer system immediately. Other improvements will be made before 1909 session, July 23 to August 16.—W. E. M. Hackleman, Secretary.

Houston, Texas, April 12.—Central Meeting closed last night. One hundred fifty-eight additions, seventeen yesterday. Greatest meeting ever held in Houston by one church. Breeden unanimously called to return next March.—A. F. Sanderson, Pastor.

North Yakima, Wash., April 18.—Brother Scoville and helpers reached us Thursday. Dedicated new fifty-seven thousand dollar building today and gave first gospel invitation. Asked for nineteen thousand and raised twenty-five thousand and thirty-four dollars, clearing church of all indebtedness and leaving handsome surplus. There were ninety-three accessions during the day. Greatest day in history of great Northwest. Scoville peerless in dedication and as evangelist.—Morton L. Rose.

Des Moines, Ia., April 12.—The Des Moines campaign closed last night at Highland Park Church with thirty-nine additions the last service, fifty-nine during the day and 215 for the week, almost twice the membership of the church before this meeting. The last service represented one-half million dollars financial strength added to the church. The entire Scoville campaign has added about 1,900 to the various churches of Christ in the city. During this time Bro. Brandt's two meetings added 408. The pastors have received 328 at regular services during this campaign, making a total of more than 2,600 since January 1. The impetus of this campaign cannot be summarized by these totals. Thousands of hearts follow Brother Scoville and his workers with love and prayers in his great campaign. Missions, ministerial supply, local development and personal soul winning have been stimulated. We take up our tasks with a deep sense of gratitude and of obligation because of these marvelous blessings this Centennial year.—Ministerial Association of Church of Christ.

Illinois Brotherhoods' Banquet

Decatur Entertains Great Gathering of Laymen.

On Friday evening, April 9, the first state banquet of Illinois Brotherhoods of Disciples of Christ was given in the First Congregational Church at Decatur. Churchmen from as far away as Galesburg, Peoria, Bloomington, Champaign, Gibson City, Danville, Lincoln, Jacksonville, and surrounding towns were there in force, and about two hundred men partook of the dinner which was served at six o'clock. P. C. Macfarlane, General Secretary of the National Brotherhood, was the speaker of the occasion, while among his auditors were T. W. Grafton of Anderson, Indiana, Marion Stevenson, National Superintendent of Bible Schools, Fred Kline, representing the National Benevolent Association, Clarence L. DePew, State Superintendent of Bible Schools, H. H. Peters of Eureka College, and others prominently identified with our national and state organizations. E. E. Elliott of Peoria acted the part of toastmaster, introducing Secretary Macfarlane as "a man from Missouri" who was going to show them a few things, which he very graciously and properly did. It was a great affair. The men who came the farthest liked it the best, and it was voted the best gathering of laymen ever held within the borders of the state. Illinois is taking the front seat in the Brotherhood line, and the men of the state are alive to this present-day proposition. The Brotherhood Idea will have prominent place in district gatherings. At the State Convention to occur at Eureka in August, it is proposed to have an afternoon and evening devoted almost entirely to men's work, and a banquet will be served to some six or seven hundred men. Secretary Macfarlane has consented to be there and make an address, and other prominent laymen will be on the program. It is a noticeable fact that the prizes for obtaining subscriptions to the Brotherhood magazine "Christian Men" for both February and March went to Illinois men. As enthusiasm is contagious, a good many men were thoroughly inoculated at the Decatur meeting. This is only the beginning. Keep your eye on the Brotherhood movement. Churches without live Brotherhoods will soon be as far behind the times as those without Bible Schools. The slogan of Illinois Brotherhoods is "A Live Brotherhood in Every Church by October." Other states take note of this, and if you don't know how to go about it, write Secretary Macfarlane, 302 R. A. Long Building, Kansas City, Mo.

Home Mission Notes

"The West is today an infant, but shall one day be a giant in each of whose limbs shall write the strength of many nations."—Josiah Strong. The hour is striking in God's great purposes. The people are crowding into the West. Commonwealths are reforming. The Disciples of Christ are called upon to possess this great region for King Jesus. Our Home Board is straining under an immense burden. The work of last year was glorious, but the work of this year calls for a doubling of resources as well as a doubling of all agencies. The pressure of the work is terrific. We must pledge every church to its full potency. Our Centennial offering should be our greatest.

The Centennial motive stirs the blood of all our churches. One hundred years of history means nothing unless by our deeds of nobler sacrifice and sterner service we prove ourselves worthy heirs of the ages. If we have accomplished anything in the past one hundred years we ought to be double in the next decade what we have accomplished in a century. America's evangelization is the problem of the day. America won, the world is won.

GUESS WHO.

Collector—"This bill has been running twenty-five years."

Scraggs—"What bill?"

Collector—"The one in my hand, of course."

Scraggs—"Thanks. I though maybe you meant the one on your coat. I see that you are wearing a campaign button."—Puck.

Centennial Bulletin

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

Some time since a prize was offered to the church designing the best front page of its weekly leaflet using the Centennial emblem. The award is just announced. The Messenger, of the McKees Rocks, Pa., Church, wins first prize. C. A. MacDonald is the pastor.

Second prize goes to The Weekly Messenger, El Paso, Texas, H. B. Robison, pastor.

Third prize goes to The Calendar, Central Church, Syracuse, N. Y., J. A. Serena, pastor.

Next week we will print on this page a fac simile of the first prize winner.

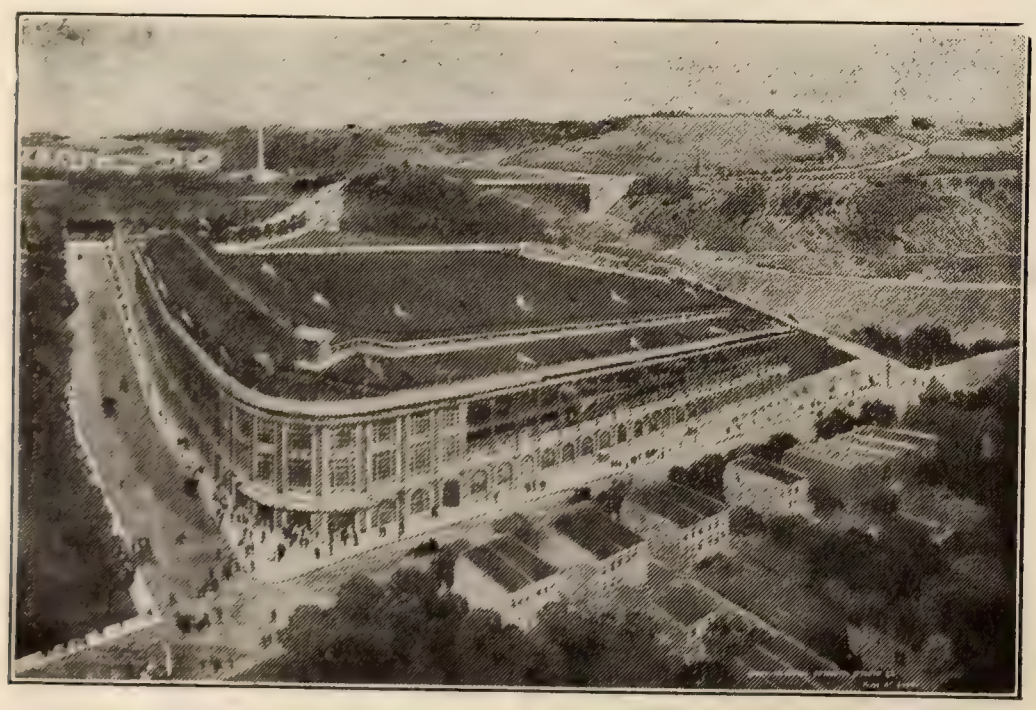
Bible School Session at the Pittsburg Centennial

The Pittsburg Centennial Bible School program will consist of eight simultaneous morning conferences from 8:45 to 9:45. These classes will be in the Carnegie Music Hall with its adjoining rooms, and in the Congregational church, across the street from the Carnegie Institute.

Beginners' and Cradle Roll methods will be studied in one room. Miss Lillie Faris of Athens, Ohio, will teach the primary methods. The junior workers, studying junior methods, will be given the third room. The fourth room is for the accommodation of those studying the intermediate department. W. C. Pearce, international superintendent of adult Bible classes, will be the instructor in the fifth room. The teacher training course will hold full sway in the teacher training rooms six and seven for study of the advanced and first courses. Mr. Moninger of Cincinnati will have the leadership of this work with an assistant. The superintendents will have the eighth room for the study of methods for superintendents, such as special days, contests, rally, teachers' meetings, orders of service and other matters interesting to superintendents. This hour will be in charge of Brother Welshimer of Canton, Ohio. These morning conferences begin Tuesday, October 12, and close Tuesday morning, October 19, every day except Sunday at 8:45. J. Walter Carpenter will demonstrate manual work in the Sunday-school in the rooms given to the beginners, primary, junior and intermediates. Brother C. T. Paul of Hiram, Ohio, will probably visit all these rooms consecutively and show the teachers how to teach missions in the Sunday-school.

The enrollment secretary will be ready to enroll all those taking work in these morning hours, either as a student or visitor. No one will be admitted to a class-room without a card. There will be no charge of any of these morning hours. They will close at 9:45, fifteen minutes before the regular convention hour.

Monday, October 18, is a great day on the program in connection with the Pittsburg convention. The whole day will be given to the interests of the Bible school. The morning session will convene in three different halls simultaneously, and will be devoted to the interests of the elementary and intermediate grades under the general direction of E. A. Cole of Washington, Pa.



The afternoon program will meet in three different sections in three halls, and will be devoted to teacher training under Herbert H. Moninger of Cincinnati, Ohio. The evening sessions will be devoted to the adult Bible class work and will be held in three different halls. One session will be given to the men's classes, and another to the women's classes, while the third to mixed classes. Brother W. C. Pearce, of Chicago, will have charge of the evening program. One great feature of the adult Bible class program in the evening will be the great parade of men's classes. This will surpass the great parade of men's classes at Louisville, Ky., it is hoped. We are planning to organize the parade of men to pass in review before the assembled women of our women's classes of the United States. The women will probably be gathered in the great grand-stand of the Pittsburg Baseball Club, which will seat 17,000 people. This is within two blocks of the great convention buildings, so that it will be convenient to pass this parade before the grand-stand and from and to the different convention halls. Another feature of this day, or rather the whole week, will be the Sunday-school exhibit. This will include exhibits from all classes from all parts of the United States. This exhibit will be in charge of J. Walter Carpenter, of Uniontown, Pa.

Attention, Endeavorers of Illinois

Many workers in the field of Christian Endeavor feel that we should double the membership of our Endeavor societies during our Centennial year. I can think of at least one way by which this goal may be reached. We are familiar with the plan of contests. It has been worked to an excellent advantage, both in the Bible School and the Teacher Training work. Why not apply the method to Christian Endeavor? Divide your society into two sections, make the points new members, and attendance, and begin activities.

State Supt. C. E.

AMPHITHEATER FOR THE CENTENNIAL COMMUNION, OCT. 17, 1909.
Capacity, 25,000; convertible into three auditoriums of three to five thousand each for the regular sessions of the Centennial.

Home Missions Illustrated

The American Society has three stereopticon outfits in the field this Spring, in addition to the many used by the local preachers. Each of the three secretaries, Messrs. Wright, Ranshaw and Denton, accompanied by a special man, are spending most of the time in the field holding institutes in the afternoon, and delivering the stereopticon lectures on "The Christian Conquest of America" to crowded houses at night.

Mr. Ranshaw, who is assisted by Joseph Keevil of Brooklyn, N. Y., is swinging through Kentucky, Tennesee and Arkansas. Mr. Wright is in Pennsylvania and West Virginia. Mr. Denton, who is assisted by Nelson H. Trimble of Baltimore, Md., is making a tour of Illinois, Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska.

Everywhere the preachers are giving a hearty reception to the presentation of American Missions. In this our Centennial Year, it cannot well be otherwise. The receipts of the American Society, up to the present time, make it absolutely imperative that the whole brotherhood rally in order to reach the Centennial Aim. It is earnestly desired that every church and minister in the Brotherhood awaken to the importance of the present campaign that is now on.

"COFFEE DOESN'T HURT ME."
Tales That Are Told.

"I was one of the kind who wouldn't believe that coffee was hurting me," says a N. Y. woman. "You just couldn't convince me its use was connected with the heart and stomach trouble I suffered from most of the time.

"My trouble finally got so bad I had to live on milk and toast almost entirely for three or four years. Still I loved the coffee and wouldn't believe it could do such damage.

"What I needed was to quit coffee and take nourishment in such form as my stomach could digest.

"I have read much about Postum, but never thought it would fit my case until one day I decided to quit coffee and give it a trial and make sure about it. So I got a package and carefully followed the directions.

"Soon I began to get better and was able to eat carefully selected foods without the aid of pepsin or other digestants and it was not long before I was really a new woman physically.

"Now I am healthy and sound, can eat anything and everything that comes along and I know this wonderful change is all due to my having quit coffee and got the nourishment I needed through this delicious Postum.

"My wonder is why everyone don't give up the old coffee and the troubles that go with it and build themselves up as I have done, with Postum."

Easy to prove by 10 days trial of Postum in place of coffee. The reward is big.

We Lead

The expected has happened. "We told you so." The last report of organized Adult Bible classes just received from W. C. Pearce, the International Superintendent, places our own schools far in the front. We have 510 organized classes reported up to March 25. This places us ahead by a good margin, to say nothing of the multitude of classes organized on March 28, Adult Bible Class Day. When the record of that great day is sent out by the International Association at the end of the next quarter we will still be far ahead, shall we not?

Study the subjoined table, and withhold boasting when you consider that though we lead we have not yet begun to enroll all the adults who should be in the Bible school. We have only 28,214 officially enrolled. Let us up and at it again with all our might, until every Disciple in name is a Disciple in deed.

The 510 classes for the quarter are distributed among our states as follows:

Missouri	149	Oklahoma	6
Ohio	117	Tennessee	5
Illinois	63	Michigan	4
Indiana	36	Iowa	3
California	20	Washington	2
Kansas	19	New York	2
Kentucky	18	Maryland	1
West Virginia	15	New Brunswick	1
Nebraska	14	North Carolina	1
Pennsylvania	13	Nova Scotia	1
Colorado	9	Ontario	1

No classes are reported the past quarter from our schools in Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Louisiana, New England, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Oregon, Texas, Wisconsin. Shall we hear from them in the next quarterly report?

Marion Stevenson,
National Superintendent of Bible Schools.

OUR CENTENNIAL.

Ours, here in Pittsburg this year (October 11-19) a GREAT CONVENTION and a great feast of good things with 50,000 disciples present—what does it all mean? CENTENNIAL—the 100th anniversary of the famous declaration and address by Thomas Campbell.

100 years since the Declaration of Independence in Religion.

100 years of freedom from all human creed and dogma.

100 years of saying not back to Campbell or Wesley or Calvin or Luther, but back to Christ and the Bible.

100 years of pleading for the restoration of Apostolic Christianity and of Jesus to His rightful place as head of His Church.

100 years of pleading for a Church patterned after the one Jesus and His Apostles founded as recorded in the book of Acts.

100 years of pleading for the reunion of all believers in Christ on the Bible and the Bible alone as the only and all sufficient rule of faith and guidance. All these for the sake of CHRISTIAN UNION—"that they may all be one, that the world may believe."—John 17.

That we may rightly keep this great Centennial year and make it the very best in all our history, let us strive to reach the following aims:

1. Every member pray and read the Bible every day.
2. Every member an evangelist, daily seeking to win souls to Christ by personal work.
3. Every member contributing to the local Church work, and as many as possible tithing.
4. Every member an offering for benevolence—State, Home and Foreign Missions.
5. All the Church and as many more in the Bible School.
6. Special—100 new members in the Church; 100 women in the C. W. B. M.; 100 new men enlisted; a Christian paper in every home, and the doubling of attendance at All Our Church Services.

All these are within our reach. Then let us all show our undying love for our Master and our supreme trust in Him by striving to attain them.—Phil. 4:13.

Vol. XXVI. CHICAGO, ILL., APRIL 29, 1909. No. 18.

The Roman Church and the Modern Spirit

So far as outward appearance goes the Roman Catholic Church is one of the most imposing organizations which the casual observer can contemplate. Its long history, its widely flung interests extending round the world, its manifest institutions, its great body of trained and disciplined workers, and its huge membership in both the Old World and the New make it an object of interest and admiration as a mere organization. In comparison with it, Protestantism is only the child of a day, and there have been not a few even among Protestants who have wondered whether the papal church may not, by its sheer strength and audacity, survive and destroy Protestantism in the end. Macaulay's reflection on this strength of the Roman church is familiar. He wondered if some man in future generations might not stand on a broken arch of London Bridge, with the ruins of the great metropolis all about him, and contemplate the downfall of the greatest city in the world while the Roman Catholic church went on with increasing power and success.

But the apparent unity and strength of the Roman Catholic Church is only superficial. Beneath the surface there are the same rivalries and factions that rend and weaken Protestantism. Rome is not a homogeneous, but a divided church. The struggles of Augustinians, Franciscans, Dominicans, Paulists, Jesuits, Capuchins, and other eager and ambitious parties within the church are among the disturbances which the curia has most difficulty in restraining within the limits of external and apparent harmony. It is only by the clever balancing of one interest against another that Rome succeeds in preventing constant and deadly warfare among these warring spirits within her own pale.

But in our time a new danger has arisen, so formidable as to throw these rivalries of the orders into second place. The growth of modernism in the Roman church is regarded by the men in authority at the Vatican as a most sinister and ominous fact in the church's life. "Modernism" is the term applied by the Pope and his advisors to that very strong effort which is now being made by some of the ablest men in the Roman organization to modify doctrines, ceremonies and methods of operation so that they may conform more fully to the needs of an age which has left behind it much that Rome continues to champion. The spirit of these reformers in the Roman church is precisely that of the leaders of thought and action in Protestantism who are the children of modern ideas regarding criticism, science, social service, and personal religion.

In Protestantism this movement has been natural and effective, because there are no limitations imposed by ecclesiastical authority which are strong enough to hold in check the spirit of Christ in the church. Even the most conservative and closely organized of Protestant churches has been compelled to reckon with the new life with which God is filling the churches in our time. But in the case of Rome it is different. The repressive tendencies have been too long in operation to permit the modern spirit free activity without a dire struggle. Rome's success has been in proportion to its autocratic power over the consciences of its servants and communicants. Steadily it has constructed an engine of vast power in which individualism is so completely eliminated that the church moves with the precision dictated by the small and zealous band of councilors who surround and control the Pope himself.

This has permitted the continuance of that system of philosophy and theology known as Scholasticism, which is virtually the teaching of St. Thomas Aquinas, whose "Summa" was the authoritative text book in the schools of the Roman church before Dante wrote "The Divine Comedy." This is a system admirably adapted to the needs of an organization like the Roman church. It is the splendid buttress of papal authority, and it has gradually been perfected until even the dogma of the Pope's infallibility found triumphant recognition as late as 1870. Against all this repressive and unyielding system of thought the modern spirit throws itself with a courage born of desperation.

Many of the Roman Catholic priests, in spite of the careful limitations imposed upon the seminaries, are men of modern training and broad culture. It is impossible for them to live in the stifling atmosphere of scholasticism. They accept the principles of criticism as applied to the Holy Scriptures and have found the new joy and the larger faith which those studies bring. They are men who know enough of the facts of science to see that evolution has displaced every other theory of the natural order, and that refusal to recognize this governing principle of all modern thinking is intellectual suicide. They know that many reforms are needed in the Roman church. Reformation, in fact, they believe is the only thing that can save the church from failure. In America some of these reforms have actually been put into operation under the broadening spirit of our institutions. But the church as a church remains the same. It is an Italian church instead of a world organization; it is a Roman rather than a Christian institution.

These modernists love the Catholic church as truly as did Savanarola or John Huss or Martin Luther; but they see that reform is necessary if the church is to be saved and is to do its work with effectiveness. Such men as Father Tyrrell in England, the Abbe Loisy in France, Senator Fogazzaro, the greatest novelist in Italy, and many other men of their type, are preaching the new faith in spite of the threats and even excommunications which have been launched against them. Probably no single writing has had wider popular results than Fogazzaro's novel, "The Saint." The book was sufficiently attractive to secure widespread reading, but that was indefinitely extended by the action of the Congregation of the Index which placed it on the prohibited list.

The modern spirit is not limited to a few restless and dissatisfied ecclesiastics. Speaking of his hero, Giovanni Selva, the typical modernist in "Il Santo," the author says: "His true name is Legion. He lives, thinks, and works in France, England, Germany, and America as well as in Italy. He wears the prophet's garb and the uniform of a soldier as well as the coat of a civilian. He shows himself at the universities; he hides himself in the seminaries. He fights in the press; he prays in the dim recesses of the monastery. He almost no more preaches sermons, but he holds conferences. He is exegete and historian, theologian and scholar, journalist and printer. He does not always write; he is at times only an impassionate reader, only a believer as also a thinker."

That the Roman church is genuinely alarmed at the rapid spread of the modern spirit is shown by its recent energetic and passionate denunciation of the movement. In July, 1907, there was published a syllabus in which some sixty-nine propositions, purporting to describe the chief views of the modernist school, were denounced as heretical and seditious. Still later Pope Piux X. published his encyclical which is known as "Pascendi Gregis" ("for the feeding of the flock.") In this document, on every page of which the clever work of the Jesuits may be discerned, the modernists are denounced in every term of vituperation. They are charged with the denial of the authority of scripture, the proud refusal to accept the commands of the Holy Father, the passion for philosophy and criticism which has loosened the foundations of their faith in the church and the gospel, and a spirit of unrest which makes them eager seekers after novelties.

The encyclical by its very bitterness reveals the deep concern which is felt by the guardians of St. Peter regarding the new spirit of revolt and freedom which has broken out in all sections of the church. Perhaps a wiser man than Pius X. would have spoken in juster and more conciliatory terms to this rising power. But the present Pope and his advisors have little of even that measure of toleration which characterized Leo XIII. It is clear that the battle is on. The Roman church is fighting for its life, not with foes outside, but with those of its own household. The modern spirit of free inquiry, of love of the truth, of deeper and juster preception of the vital elements of our holy faith which Protestantism has so generally recognized and accepted, is held at bay by the emissaries of Rome. But only for a time. The church must accept the new principle and must provide wine skins capable of holding the new wine, or else the inevitable consequence, which has been experienced more than once in the history of the Roman church, will happen again.

The encyclical says the downward tendency began with Protestantism, is being urged on by modernism, and will end in flat atheism. Only one blind to all the signs of the times could put this sinister construction upon one of the most heartening of modern movements. It is a proof of the fact that in both the Roman and the Protestant churches the spirit of God speaks through a multitude of voices, and that the ideals of the kingdom of God cannot be lost to view without serious and successful protest.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

THE PRODIGALITY OF NATIONAL YOUTH

The young nation is proverbially prodigal. This country has wasted its billions and now it turns from its dissipation and calls its fellow peoples to an international conference for the conservation of natural resources. It is all part and parcel of the world's awakening from the Laissez Faire, the go-as-you-please, policy that left every fellow to care for himself and the devil to take the hindmost. So next year a very important International Conference will meet at that coming capitol of the world, The Hague, and will consider means to conserve the natural gifts of the earth for the use of the greatest number of its dwellers.

ANOTHER STATE IN LINE

The recent election added nineteen more counties to Michigan's honor roll, and she now has a total of thirty dry counties. The Detroit Free Press calls it a "staggering fact." It is meant to cure the "staggers." There are eighty-three counties in Michigan. This is a hopeful beginning and adds another state to the long list that are lining up on the victory side in the greatest moral battle of the times. Nothing succeeds like success in a moral war. The "courage of the cowards" is enlisted when things begin to go. The timorous good folk join the battle array.

In Iowa the effort to get a resubmission of state prohibition failed by the arbitrary action of the senate committee, who were evidently afraid to allow the people an expression on the matter, but the legislature of that state passed a law forbidding the sale of intoxicants on trains. Pullman cars will cease to be traveling bars in that state.

In Illinois the trainmen are asking for a law that will forbid any person in an intoxicated condition riding on a train.

HAVE WE GROWN RICHER?

An eminent statistican gives out interesting figures regarding our national growth. It is interesting to note some comparisons. It is the popular belief that we are fast growing richer. According to these figures our average per capita wealth has increased from about $200 in 1850 to more than $1,300 in 1909. Just what the real increase is cannot be known until we measure the buying power of a dollar then and now. If fifty cents would purchase as many of the necessities then as a dollar will now, then we are really only three times as rich now as then instead of the six times that would appear on the surface statistics. Again in 1850 there were no millionaires; today there are thousands. In 1850 there were few poverty stricken; today there are multitudes that are destitute and greater multitudes that live near the hunger line. It is given out as a certified fact by the government census bureau that 52 per cent of our people actually possess less than $100 apiece and that the average possessions of 63 per cent of our people are less than $175. Is a nation rich when it has so many poor? Is the average citizen able today to live higher in the standard of contemporaneous life than he was sixty years ago? We have an immense accumulation of wealth, but have we therefore a rich commonwealth?

WHO IS AN ANARCHIST?

An anarchist is one who advocates the destruction of all law and government. He may be an ideal anarchist, advocating passive resistance, but refusing to obey the positive mandates of law or to perform any governmental duties. He is the most consummate of idealists who advocates absolute non-resistance as does Tolstoi. Or he may be a "red" anarchist, advocating the bloody revolution of resistance to all law. Such was Herr Most and such they are who slay rulers.

Is there not also another type of anarchy? When one who is charged and sworn to administer the law refuses to do so is he not anarchical? He not only perjures himself by breaking his oath, but he stands at the head of the law breaking class when he thus encourages law breakers to ignore the restraints of law and the government that made it.

The mayor of Chicago took an oath to enforce the laws. One of the laws which he swore to enforce says saloons shall be closed on Sunday. That law the mayor refuses to enforce. He not only lets it go unenforced, but he positively refuses to enforce it or to make any attempt to do so and gives his support to those who break it. Benjamin Harrison said that "it is a monstrous idea that an executive may select such laws as it may please him to execute and nullify the rest." What more does the habitual criminal? The Supreme Court of the state rules that it is his duty to enforce this particular law. But it also rules that the courts have no province in compelling an executive to enforce any law. Action to impeach might be instituted but the impeaching powers would be found to be with the mayor in his perjured action and thus the law is helpless to enforce the execution of its own mandates. There is but one recourse under existing statutes and rulings, then, and that is to appeal to the franchise when opportunity offers. In Chicago that appeal seems sure to justify the mayor in breaking his oath. Thus Chicago has Sunday saloons and will have them until there is either a governor who will exercise his duty as Folk did in Missouri, and see that the laws of the state are upheld even if the militia has to be posted at every saloon door, or until Chicago is sufficiently Americanized to uphold law, even though the majority in some particular locality are not in favor of such a law.

THE DEATH TOLL OF INDUSTRY

Between 30,000 and 35,000 were killed and 2,000,000 injured in the industries of the United States last year. There is a total of about 13,000,000 engaged in industrial pursuits in the nation. Something like 10,000,000 more are engaged in agricultural occupations. These latter figures cannot be accurate to the letter because they must be based upon the census of nine years ago and calculations made for the increase. Neither does it appear whether the reports include the agricultural occupations in the generalization, but doubtless not, as industries and agriculture are usually put under separate heads.

The figures are appalling. It means that one man out of every seven must calculate upon being injured at his work during the year and that one out of every four-hundred must calculate upon being killed while at the honest and peaceful pursuit of earning his daily bread.

It will never be possible to insure absolutely against accident. But we are prodigal of both life and limb in our wild rush for industrial preëminence. A comparative statement of railroad casualties in this country and others will illustrate this. We have killed an average of 8,000 and injured an average of 60,000 on the railroads of the land each year during the past decade. In one year we killed an average of 1 to every 306 employees, while Germany killed 1 out of every 750 and Austria 1 out of every 1,067; we injured 1 out of every 33, Germany 1 out of every 169 and Austria 1 out of every 292.

Our industrial life is increasing at an amazing pace. In twenty years the number of wage earners has increased by more than three times. Invention and industrial progress is making work much more complex and thus increases its dangers. As yet there is little regulative legislation in America and practically no industrial insurance excepting such as is voluntarily afforded.

Even the figures given above are doubtless far below the actual number of accidents because there are no mandatory reports made and only those are reported that can be found. The New York Bureau of Labor made an effort to determine exactly the total number of accidents for a period of three months. They failed to get a complete total, but found in some trades not usually listed as hazardous, as high as 44 accidents for every 1,000 employees. It is safe to say no more were reported by any employer than actually happened.

OUR AFRICAN WARD

Booker T. Washington, Robt. C. Ogden and Jacob Hollinger have been appointed a commission to visit Liberia and report on her conditions and needs. This is the result of the visit of the Liberian commissioners to this country last winter. Booker Washington is much interested in his fellow folk in that little country and hopes we will do as much for them as we have done for Cuba. We gave the enterprise paternal support when it was founded as a colony for freedom in 1822. The dreams of a colored man's paradise there never matured however. There are today a few thousand civilized people living along the coast with hundreds of thousands of barbaric peoples in the inhospitable interior. The government is involved, order is not good, trade is poor, and things generally are in decrepit condition. England has a colony on one side and France one on the other and they join in demanding that order be preserved and the trade regulations enforced. Liberia is afraid of the colonizing appetites of these two powers and asks us to help her get on her feet and stand sponsor for her. Many think that the wisest solution would be for her to ask England to take charge and reap the benefits of the greatest colony government ever devised.

Both England and France enter disclaimers to any imperialistic intentions toward the little republic, but do ask for civilized order and treaty observance. Those who believe in self-government would at least like to see the 50,000 civilized and semi-civilized negroes of the coast given a chance against the handicap of their environment. Liberia asks that we appoint revenue collectors as we did for Hayti and as England has often done and that we give them a sort of resident advisor to the government, and if possible, assume treaty making powers for them. In other words they would like for us to become sovereign in international relationships and leave them autonomous in internal relations, but give them the benefit of skilled advice and business administration in governmental matters.

If this is impossible they might adopt the Chinese expediency of putting well paid white men in charge of the customs and police administration and making a sort of unofficial cabinet of them. This, with an awakened interest among capitalists to the commercial possibilities of the state, would help solve their problems. The land is rich and what has been done by the Nigerian Companies could be done there. Above all needs are those of the missionary. Educate the people, teach them industry, give them adequate schools, train them in medicine and the arts and sciences and make them moral and they will govern themselves.

America is the key to the evangelization of the whole world. Our first duty is therefore to evangelize America. The offering of next Sunday, May 2, is to that end.

With the Foreign Society reporting glorious gains in its offering this year, let every church and pastor line up to make the American offering reach the goal set for this Centennial year.

Our Congregationalist brethren are engaged in a big debt-raising enterprise for their missionary boards. About a quarter million dollars must be raised. The legacy receipts of the last five years, as compared with the previous ten years, have fallen off $345,000, and the contributions have decreased $220,000. The leaders of the denomination feel that Congregationalists have been neglecting their home missionary work especially, their constituents without valid cause choosing to place their benevolences in extra-denominational organizations. A campaign of education is being waged to quicken the conscience of Congregationalists toward their own organized work.

From the Standard (Baptist) we learn that the Disciple and Baptist pastors of St. Paul, Minn., have together organized a ministers' conference. Rev. W. A. Hill, of the Woodland Park Baptist Church, was elected president; Rev. A. D. Harmon, of the First Christian Church, vice-president; and Rev. R. H. Pratt, of the Hebron Baptist Church, secretary. The conference will meet monthly on a Monday afternoon. There are thirteen Baptist churches in St. Paul, and two Disciple churches. This is another instance of which there are many where Disciple ministers, not being of sufficient number to organize an association of their own, have found easy fellowship with their Baptist brethren. It is a risky thing to do if you are in love with your prejudices; for in such associations as this both Baptist and Disciple prejudices are in danger of being lost.

What an enviable comment is that upon the pastorate of Alva W. Taylor in Eureka, Ill., when a townsman not a member of the church says: "In all the history of Eureka there has perhaps never lived within its borders a citizen, preacher, or layman, who, in the short space of six years, did so much to shape its thought, its ideals and its conduct as you have done." And what a commentary on the theology of some people that a minister to whom these words could be truthfully spoken, should be made the object of persistent attack by the heresy-hunter in the name of Christ! Such sweet fruits as have grown upon the tree of Mr. Taylor's ministry in Eureka reveal and testify the methods and ideals under which the ministry was carried on. Let Irving Park Church, Chicago, take heed unto itself and see that it worthily matches the spirit of its new pastor with loyalty and consecration like his own.

At last, thank God! there are signs of shame and an awakening conscience for the theatrical abominations that are flourishing in the land. Could the stage be more corrupt than it is today? Our conceptions of the degradation of decadent Rome are made from data no more revolting than shout from our bill boards all the time. A future historian would be justified in making us out as low in sensuality as was Rome, if he got hold of the bestial facts which we have so long tolerated without blushing. We begin to discern traces of conscience, however, in the public mind. Magazine writers and newspaper reporters are coming to the fore with a discussion of indecencies on the stage in which is sounded an ethical note that would do credit to the pulpit. Two articles in Success Magazine for April and May and one in the May American are noteworthy examples of the long unvoiced protest. No wonder there are those who wish to dump the stage—good and bad—in the bottom of the sea when it lends itself to such wanton prostitution of the morals of society.

The death of Madame Mojeska, the eminent actress, has removed one of the most notable figures in the dramatic life of our time. Madame Mojeska was a Polish lady of education and wealth, who came at an early age to America owing to the repressive measures employed by Germany and Russia in the treatment of the unhappy Polish people. She became an actress of first rank, and interpreted with exquisite delicacy and art many roles both of the classic and the modern drama. Perhaps her most winsome character was that of Rosalind in Shakespeare's "As You Like It." Madame Mojeska has been for many years a foremost example of the best traditions of the dramatic art. Personally she has been a woman of high ideals and noble character. Her sympathies with her own people, so frequently voiced, reacted upon her when with her husband she attempted to visit Poland a few years ago and was forcibly excluded by Russian officialism. Her last years were passed in the comparative quiet of her California home, and there she passed away a few days since.

Francis Marion Crawford has been perhaps the most prolific writer in our generation. It used to be a tradition in Stockholm that Dr. Ibsen came to the city once a year bearing the manuscript of a new play, and his arrival was a festival time in the metropolis which so deeply honored him. Marion Crawford did not wait for the end of the year to send forth his new stories. They seemed to issue from his brain as easily as the speech of a skilled orator, and sometimes a single year has witnessed the publication of three books by this rapid and yet ever interesting novelist. His works were semi-historical narrations, always presenting some epoch of history against whose background he threw the fanciful characters of his stories. The cities he most loved and of which he most frequently wrote were Constantinople, Prague, Venice, and Rome. His "Saracinesca" series includes five volumes tracing the story of an illustrous Roman family from early times down to the present, and contains a world of information regarding the Eternal City. Of more serious works he was also the author, as is proved by his fascinating "Ave Roma Immortalis," a romantic history of the capital, and "His Rulers of the South," an equally valuable narrative of the history of Sicily. For many years Mr. Crawford has resided in Sorrento, near Naples. His last literary work was a graphic description of the Messina tragedy for the pages of the Outlook.

The American Christian Missionary Society is carrying today heavier burdens than it has ever borne. So far instead of the Home Missionary obligations becoming lighter from year to year, the fact is the obligation increases year by year and the demands become more widespread and insistent. New fields are opening up in every part of the country. New towns are springing up in Texas, Arizona and New Mexico just as in the eighties they sprung up into being in the states of the Dakotas, in Kansas and in Nebraska. If we are ever to maintain our standing in the Western states we must enter these new points at once. The appeals are on file from scores of these places which our Home Board cannot respond to owing to a lack of funds.

St. Paul's Collegiate Institute, at Tarsus, Asia Minor, was founded in 1888 as the result of a Bill which was passed through the New York Legislature by Col. Elliott F. Shepard, of New York City. Dr. Howard Crosby was the first President of the Board of Trustees, being succeeded by the Chancellor of New York University, Dr. Henry MacCracken. In November, 1903, the Institute was transferred to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and is now directed by the Prudential Committee of that Board. The Institute is divided into two parts—St. Paul's College, with a course covering five years, and St. Paul's Academy, with a four years' course. The Academy gives a good business training to its students, while the College fits men for entrance to the Theological Seminary at Marash, or the Syrian Protestant College Medical Department, at Beirut. A competent faculty, headed by Rev. Thomas D. Christie, has charge of the work at St. Paul's Institute, and all classes, except the languages, are conducted in English.

The states of Texas, New Mexico and Arizona constituting the territory of the South-West comprise an area of 497,670 square miles. Resources of this vast region are just now beginning to develop. The cattle ranches of Texas are being cut up into cultivable farms of from 40 to 160 acres on which corn, cotton, wheat, oats, barley, alfalfa, kaffir corn are being raised in bewildering quantities, and fruits of every kind are being raised for the Northern markets. In the state of Texas everything grows from flax to cotton and oranges. In Arizona and New Mexico the sheep ranches, which have constituted the principal wealth of the country for a number of years, are now being divided and much of the land is being farmed. The mountains in these states are filled with exhaustless supply of zinc, copper, gold, silver and soft and hard coal. People are moving into this territory in vast numbers. The Christian Church owes a duty to these people. The churches in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Missouri should hasten to send missionaries into this territory and "thus possess the land" according to New Testament Christianity.

The Equal Suffrage Campaign

It is clear that the women of Chicago and the country are becoming increasingly interested in securing the ballot for themselves. The movement is not of recent origin. For a generation it has aroused interest either favorable or hostile. Its earliest effort was largely devoted to securing offices for women, and a candidate was actually proposed for President. But more recent efforts have been directed to the securing of the franchise less for official recognition than for the privilege of registering woman's opinion upon questions of municipal policy and the character of those who shall execute the laws.

Last week witnessed a notable feature of this campaign of women in this state. The Illinois Equal Suffrage movement has been directed by Mrs. Oliver W. Stewart, a most competent and able champion of the cause. Associated with her, especially in the effort to secure municipal suffrage for women in Chicago, have been some of the ablest and most honored women of this city, among whom may be named Jane Addams, Mrs. Charles Henrotin, and Miss Mary MacDowell. These women perceive very clearly, as does that increasing company of men who have taken time to investigate the question, that woman's influence is now the saving element in municipal politics even with the restrictions under which she is compelled to work. It is her efforts that have secured better local government in the wards, better tenement conditions, better opportunities for children's normal growth and care, and better regulations regarding the care of the poor and the dependent classes. Yet she is hampered by the inability to express her opinion at the very point where it would be most effective in securing helpful results.

The effort last week was to secure the passage of three bills through the Legislature. One provides for equal municipal suffrage in Chicago. This has already been approved by the Charter Commission, which is preparing a new instrument for the government of this city. The second bill seeks the recognition of equal suffrage in the towns and cities of the state; and the third is the usual bill providing for equal suffrage, which has been introduced into the legislative program of several assemblies preceding the present one. A large company of women visited Springfield last week and spoke in advocacy of the measures proposed, especially the Billings Bill for equal suffrage in towns and cities.

The hearing accorded them, both in their meetings held at the stations on the way to Springfield and in the House of Representatives itself where the committee session was held, was most respectful and indeed cordial. A large number of brief addresses were made by representatives of the equal suffrage movement, both men and women. What the immediate effect will be is not yet evident. Most of the members of the Legislature who expressed opinions at all asserted that they were in favor of equal suffrage, but indicated that they might vote against the bills on the ground that an insufficient number of women actually wish the franchise. As a matter of fact, many members of the Legislature are timid about expressing their convictions for fear of ridicule. It is always against such odds that the cause of progress must make its way.

The reasons why women should have the ballot are overwhelming when one considers the advantage which would come not only to women themselves, but to practically every good cause by this extension of the ballot to them. That women in increasing numbers desire the ballot is perfectly evident. That the plan works effectively is proved not only in the sections of the country where it has been tried but notably in Australia where the system prevails. That it is right women should have the ballot, even though a small proportion of them use it, at once is equally clear. Justice and ethics demand this.

The great body of working women need the ballot to correct many of the disabilities under which they now labor. The teaching force of the public schools is largely women; yet the educational laws of the country are framed by men and often by those who have least experience in educational work. For the farmer's wife, the merchant's wife, and the working man's wife the ballot would be the means of registering an opinion which on most questions relating to public welfare is more enlightened today than that of the average man. The woman's club has been a means of education which no group of men enjoys. Women as a class are better educated than men because they continue their work in the schools to a point where most young men have dropped out to go into business. A man knows more of some features of the industrial and business life of today, but on the vital questions of living as they relate to all classes, it is probable that the average woman is better informed than her husband.

It is often asserted that woman's true place is the home, and every intelligent and enthusiastic advocate of equal suffrage makes his strongest appeal on this very ground. It is because the home is directly effected by a large part of the legislation, provided through the instrumentality of the ballot that women should have a chance to register their convictions regarding those matters which effect the environment and training of children, the care of the dependent and defective classes, the proper treatment of the foreigner, and the moral and physical welfare of the coming generation of Americans. These are questions which relate absolutely to the American home and no one is so sensitive to them as is an American woman.

The arguments against equal suffrage are, for the most part, either misapprehensions of woman's actual purpose in seeking the ballot, or otherwise so archaic that they no longer met the bombardment of facts. A pathetic example of this misdirected protest against woman's suffrage is seen in the attempts of even such wise and open minded men as Dr. Lyman Abbott to stay the tide of interest in this great theme. Equal suffrage is not only right, but it is destined soon to be universal, and many of those formative and reformative influences which tarry and hesitate for lack of sufficient encouragement today will hasten to their consummation when this desirable instrument of public welfare has been recognized and approved.

The admission of a fact, however sublime, is not faith: we may believe that Christ is risen, yet not be nearer heaven. It is a Bible fact that Lazarus rose from the grave; but belief in Lazarus's resurrection does not make the soul better than it was. Thomas passed on from the fact of the resurrection to the Person of the risen, "My Lord and my God!" Trust in the risen Saviour—that was the belief that saved his soul.—F. W. Robertson.

Springfield Churches Gather in the Sheaves from the Sunday Revival

By Charles Clayton Morrison

"And after the earthquake . . . a still small voice."

These words describe the stage now reached in the Springfield revival. The sensational evangelist and his party of seventeen assistants have gone. The great tabernacle whose congregations in six weeks reached the enormous aggregate of 600,000 souls, is being dismantled. The people have divided again to their local churches and are earnestly wrestling with the great problem-opportunity left them by the evangelist.

Rev. F. W. Burnham (First Church).

As I sat in the congregation of the First Christian Church last Friday night, what most impressed me was the atmosphere of the place. The First Church is an old church—more than seventy-five years old. It has the characteristics of its years. Normally, it is self-contained, not easily wrought upon, critical—one might even say unresponsive.

But I found it wonderfully changed. The people's hearts were strangely tender. Everybody's emotion was vibrant. The meeting almost conducted itself. Nobody was imported to lead anything. Home young people made up the choir, one of their number beat the time for their singing, and Mr. Burnham, the pastor, just did his preacher's part with a quiet earnestness which I knew was partly stimulated by the eagerness with which he knew the people would hear his words. The auditorium first floor was filled, but the meeting was conducted more like a prayer-meeting than a "church service." The pastor didn't make the usual "long prayer," but asked for volunteer prayers. My heart was touched as I heard familiar voices of my good friends, who in the days I was their pastor would hardly have dared to read a scripture verse in a modest prayer-meeting.

Obviously, the feelings and ideals of the members of this church have been deeply stirred. And when, in addition to the familiar voices and faces, I noted those of the strangers (who made up much more than half the congregation) I began to realize how deeply the city had been stirred.

Mr. Burnham preached a very simple sermon—the occasion seemed to call for nothing but the deep simplicities, the commonplace fundamentals, indeed, of our religion. When, during the afternoon, he had asked me to preach for him that night, he affected to be very tired with his long campaign. He has been baptizing people every afternoon and evening for two weeks. But his splendid sermon showed no signs of fatigue, either of brain or body, and certainly a soul shone through it that knew no weariness.

That night twenty people came forward, making a total of 255 accessions since Mr. Sunday went away. Of these, eighty-four are persons whose confessions were not made in the Sunday Revival. After taking the confessions the pastor baptized eighteen who had come forward previously. Mr. Burnham tells me that in the next month or so there should be at least 100 accessions in addition to those already received.

It would be interesting to have a report from all the churches of the city showing just what results were brought to each by the great revival. As yet, the figures are difficult to get. Two other churches, a Presbyterian and a Methodist, are able to make reports virtually equivalent to this of the First Christian. When the ministerial association gathers the data together we will be glad to publish in the CHRISTIAN CENTURY the facts as the association presents them. Roughly estimating the matter, we can say that within two weeks after the tabernacle meetings closed, about 2,500 people have been added to the twenty churches participating.

Rev. J. R. Golden (West Side Church).

Our two younger Disciple churches stand well toward the head of the list. The West Side Church, with John R. Golden, pastor, reports over 100 additions, while the Stuart Street Church, with C. C. Sinclair, pastor, reports about the same number. The latter congregation being the younger daughter of the old First Church, is especially the object of her affectionate pride. It was established in 1905 in a tent meeting which it was my great pleasure to conduct in the south-east corner of the city. We organized with nearly 100 members, and R. A. Finnell, now of Wheeling, W. Va., their first pastor. C. C. Sinclair has been with them two years. They now have nearly four hundred members, and easily overflow their beautiful house, which many thought was too big for them when it was constructed. They tell me that Mr. Sinclair and his cultured wife are father and mother to the whole neighborhood, that they work with great intelligence among these good people in whose lives the church may mean so much.

With the eight thousand Protestant church members in Springfield before the Sunday meetings began and the five thousand who came forward in the Tabernacle, Springfield, with her forty-five thousand people should witness a social regeneration. Nothing less than a thorough cleansing of the political and social life of the capital city will certify the depth and reality of the wonderful experience the people have just passed through.

Standards of Righteousness Raised.

In Springfield, as in most cities, an adjustment had been reached between evil and good, a tacit agreement that the church would tolerate so much vice and the devil would tolerate so much religion. Christ and Belial had established a sort of truce, their forces were in equilibrium.

Billy Sunday has shaken this equilibrium. He has opened the eyes of the Church to the sin of accepting standards of personal living or social custom that were not out-and-out Christ's standards. Those who heard him preach six weeks passed from the sense of shock at his coarse speech to the conviction that the social customs against which he hurled his slangy invective were deserving of just such treatment at the hands of a preacher of righteousness. Thus, shock at the rude methods of the evangelist passed into shock at the things he preached against. The Church in Springfield has begun to see the possibility of a higher righteousness than it contemplated before the Revival. Its conscience calls for a deeper and richer piety.

It is wonderfully responsive to leadership just now. Young men of the world are coming up to pastors with the question, What is there for me to do? In their hearts they are no longer of the world; they are Christ's. Will Springfield pastors have something concrete and significant enough to give these earnest men and women to do—something beyond the conventional Bible-study and church work which will give them a strong sense of the social bearing of the step they have taken and make them secure against disillusionment? From the way the Disciple pastors are going at their problem I feel sure that the building up of the three local churches is not regarded as an end in itself, but as a recruiting of reënforcements for the constant and aggressive warfare to be waged against unrighteousness as never before.

Rev. C. C. Sinclair, Pastor Stuart Street Church.

Great Things For the Homeland

By Charles S. Medbury

PRESIDENT OF THE CENTENNIAL CONVENTION

The day is at hand when the nation will receive from our churches their response to the great cry of its need. While of course local conditions and plans will in some fields swing the offering to another date, the first Lord's Day of May should be upon all our hearts, for the record of that day will be to a large degree the record of advance or retreat for the year. And we must have no retreat. We are at the point in our history where we dare do nothing else but advance.

Pastors Primarily Responsible.

There are certain definite lines that promise much. First, If our Centennial offering is to be what it ought to be there must be real interest on the part of our preachers. Our work will not be done when, out from prayerful preparation, we have made an offering in our own congregations. Round about us in almost every county there will be churches without preachers or others to lead them into the fellowship of this great work. To be sure some lonely bands of faithful men and women, even though denied the ministry of the Gospel for months and years, will be in line without a word from the outside. But great numbers of churches will await the inspirational call of some man visiting them to lay upon their hearts and consciences the obligations and the privileges of the larger life.

These lines today are written out of a busy life. The pressure of recent days has been an all consuming pressure. But I am determined, God helping me, that within this county at least every congregation shall have the appeal presented for larger things for the Homeland. I know too that the mere suggestion of this to other brethren here will thrill them to do more than their part in bringing about this glad result. May I urge that the whole country over our brethren get under the work in this same way. The Boards often appeal to us to do this. We feel that we are busy, as we are, and it is neglected. But this year, brethren, let us take the distinct advance step and in the results we will rejoice together before God.

Gifts Small and Great.

In the second place there must be the appeal for a gift to the Homeland from every disciple. Let it be the widow's mite if it must be. Let it be the scant saving of some humble toiler if it must be. Let it be the few pennies of a little child trained in the lessons of the truer patriotism. Let it be the great gifts from those greatly blessed in temporal things. The point is a gift—a gift to the Nation and the Nation's God—from every man, woman and child within our membership. Surely we will not depend, this Centennial year, upon the single appeal from the pulpit. Surely the cause of the evangelization of America will not be left to depend upon one man's appeal upon one day. Rather there will be men going to men two and two. Business places will be visited. A live issue will be presented. A real duty will be discussed and those who would rally under "old glory" for the defense of the Nation against foes from without, will rally the more under the blood-stained banner of the cross for the defense of the Nation from forces both within and without. Within the homes there will be talk about preaching the Gospel in every village and hamlet and city of the great land we love. Women will plan for the establishing of churches to which sons and daughters will go later out in the pioneer reaches of American life or in the neglected sections of our great cities. If in these last days before our offering people can be brought to such a pitch of concern about the work, is there any one to doubt the offering?

Obligations of Those Blessed Bountifully.

In the third place let it be noted with all possible emphasis, that great things for the Homeland will not be wrought out even when preachers are interested and when gifts of some size are coming from every body, unless those who enjoy day by day the bounties of God, having everything of comfort and luxury the earth can give, in return pour out of their substance large things for their God. Is it not the time when multitudes of our individual offerings should be trebled and quadrupled—yes, multiplied by ten? Our Centennial is upon us. The religious world is looking to our people wondering just how much we mean by the plea we voice. Big men will take us seriously when that day dawns when our big men—men of affairs—do large things to advance a sacred cause. Let us pray unitedly in these vital days that a great host of our people may catch a new vision and that men and women who have given $5.00 and $10.00 may come out from their abundance, with hundreds donated to the work of the King. The telegrams have thrilled us with the word of at least two men who have given one thousand dollars each for the foreign work in an individual church offering. Shall we not have word like this when America's open fields are presented and the desire of the Master is known?

A Christian Pastor Indeed

Notable Pastorate in the College Town of Eureka, Ill., Closed in Tears and Good Will—Rev. A. W. Taylor Beloved Within and Without the Church—A Good Shepherd of the People and a Power for Righteousness

BY E. B. DICKINSON
Clerk of the Eureka Church.

On Sunday, April 4, Alva W. Taylor finished his pastorate here in Eureka. This last day was typical of his entire ministry for it was both strenuous in action and touched the entire community in its activities. The Mt. Zion Christian Church dismissed in order to attend the morning services and in the evening all the other churches of our city met in union meeting for the farewell address. The church was filled to the doors for both services.

On the Saturday night before a farewell reception was given to the church and community by the Ladies' Aid Society in honor of Brother and Sister Taylor and a throng filled the church parlors, the large attendance of people of other denominations and non-church people showing the universal high regard for the pastorate just closing. Following light refreshments, Lyon Karr, cashier of the State Bank, in behalf of the congregation, presented a purse of $400.00 in the following words:

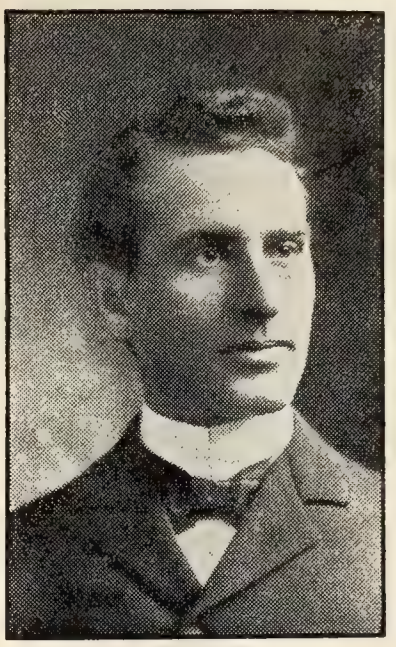
Appreciated by His Church.

"This gathering of the people of Eureka tonight is an expression of the kindly feeling that exists in this town toward you and Mrs. Taylor.

"The six years you have been among us here have been laden with work and laden with responsibilities. You have done your duty, and we, the people, in our desultory way have done ours. Nothing in this world can last, and now after these six years we have come to the parting of the ways.

"We all wish for your success hereafter and we believe that with your energy, courage and capacity for hard work, all the efforts of your life so far put forth shall seem barren beside the fruits of the autumn. And I wish to say that in the doing of the great things that are to come, you will always have the highest regard and best wishes of this people. It is seldom the lot of a man to be held in such universal high esteem as you are held in this little town. You have for a long time been a counselor and friend to us all.

"I once heard Henry Watterson, the gifted platform lecturer, twenty years ago when he was at the zenith of his power say, 'As this world you go traveling through, there is no better friend than a dollar or two, a dollar or two, a dollar or two.' Believing firmly in the philisophy of this doggerel, this people has requested me to present you with this token. Not as something we owe, but something that will help you endure the 'slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,' and will help you to beat the fardels of life that are heaped upon every man and woman who inhabits this mundane sphere."



"If there is one thing that stands out predominantly in your teaching in this town it is the true value of honor and courage. Your work here has been founded on the true principles that govern human life, and as its effect waxes, it will grow wider and wider and ever wider, until at last it will circle away among the stars."

Beloved Outside the Church.

Immediately following Mr. Karr, Prof. F. H. Boden, county superintendent of schools, in behalf of the business men of the city, not members of this church, presented him with a beautiful gold watch, speaking as follows:

"In behalf of the citizens of Eureka who are not members of your church I want to express to you the feeling of gratitude that is in the hearts of all for the services you have rendered and the influence you have wielded both by your strenuous and useful life and by your earnest and inspiring sermons over the entire community.

"There is not a man, woman or child in all Eureka who, in a direct or indirect way, through your activities and especially through your activities outside of what is commonly called church work, has not been helped to a little richer and more abundant life. There is not a phase of human enterprise that is of importance in this town, from political caucuses to the Chautauqua, where your influence for a larger and more righteous civic life has not been felt. In all the history of Eureka there perhaps never has lived within its borders a citizen, preacher or layman, who, in the short space of six years, did so much to shape its thought, its ideals and its conduct as you have done.

REV. ALVA W. TAYLOR
Now Beginning Pastorate in Irving Park, Chicago.

"I am glad to have the opportunity to say to you at this time in behalf of the entire community outside of the Christian Church: We thank you, Mr. Taylor, for your life and your work while in our midst, and I present you this watch as a token of their regard and their gratitude."

Brother Taylor replied in his hearty, inimitable way, but in a cheerful vein, graciously saving the feelings of his assembled friends. After a pastorate of six years, so successfully finished, it would seem not only proper, but, in a measure, due the pastor that the clerk give to the people something of a resume of the work done.

Growth of the Church.

In membership, the church has gained in the six years and four months a total of 622, with dismissals by all causes of 397, giving a total net gain of 225. Our present membership is 800, of which 694 are resident, the non-resident list of 106 comparing with 150 same at the beginning of this pastorate.

Financially the church has about doubled its work. The average amount raised for regular expense in 1907 and 1908 was $3,488.85, as compared with $2,093.55 in 1902; and the amounts given to missions and benevolence in 1908, $4,115.00, compared with $2,137.00 in 1903. For 1908 the total year's receipts for the church and Auxiliaries was $8,060.66.

And yet these numerical records, convincing as they are, do not fully show the scope of work Brother Taylor has occomplished. His work has been preëminently with the men of the community, a large majority of his additions by baptism being men and boys, and his influence with men outside the church has been marked. This was most tellingly evidenced last October when he first resigned and seventy-five of the business and professional men, not of our membership, of their own initiative petitioned the church board to use all honorable means to get him to reconsider his resignation. No event, during the writer's memory, has stirred our little city of 1,600 people as deeply as did this resignation and there is a strong sentiment both in and out of the church against the action of our official board when, in a spirit of sacrifice, they withdrew their opposition to Brother Taylor's going to a larger field.

Detractors Not Many.

As is the case with most men who accomplish more than precedent, Brother Taylor was misunderstood and opposed by a few, but a very few, and it is a matter of knowledge and common opinion here in Eureka that he who opposed most tried least to work with and understand him.

Brother Taylor's influence in civic and community affairs has been vital and deep. He took an active interest in all primaries and elections, was allied with all progressive movements touching either city or county affairs and was the acknowledged leader of our county in our Anti-Saloon League fight last spring. He has regularly been the executive of our lecture board, was one of the organizers of our Chautauqua and its first president, a position he still holds with the insistence of a large majority of the stock holders.

He is deeply loved and respected by all and our community could more easily afford to lose any other one of its members. We all look forward to large success for the Irving Park Church under his leadership. We are looking to the arrival of our new pastor, David Shields, of Salina, Kan., with the heartiest good will and expectations. He gives the first sermon of his pastorate May 2.

CENTENNIAL STUDIES

By Dr. Errett Gates

Elements of Success: Timeliness

We never weary of pointing out the ripeness of the time for the coming of Christ, as if a far-seeing providence timed the coming of the Kingdom of God, and suited the gospel to the needs of the age.

Something like this happened in the coming of Thomas and Alexander Campbell in the opening days of the nineteenth century. They came in the fullness of time. Things had gone wrong in the religious world, and called for amendment. They recognized the cause of the distress and proposed certain remedies. They were applied and brought instant relief to many persons.

What were the ailments under which religious society was suffering at the opening of the nineteenth century, as the Campbells discerned them? The first, most serious affliction was sectarianism. And nowhere was sectarianism so hateful, unnatural and unChristian as in the Seceder Church of which both the Campbells were members. In its mildest form it violates all the fraternal impulses of the Christian nature, while in its severest form it outrages all normal human instincts. Thomas Campbell felt with all the keenness of his sensitive nature "that division among Christians is a horrid evil, fraught with many evils." He said: "It is anti-Christian, as it destroys the visible unity of the body of Christ; as if he were divided against himself, excluding and excommunicating a part of himself. It is anti-scriptural, as being strictly prohibited by his sovereign authority; a direct violation of his express command. It is anti-natural, as it excites Christians to contemn, to hate, and oppose one another, who are bound by the highest and most endearing obligations to love each other as brethren, even as Christ has loved them."

Sectarianism.

Sectarianism was felt by Thomas Campbell, first of all, to be contrary to his fraternal Christian nature; then he discovered it to be contrary to the will of Christ and the teaching of Scripture. He was forbidden by the rules of his church to be a brother to others who loved Christ. He could not have fellowship with Christians outside of his own sect; and when in the largeness of his Christian heart he ventured to extend the privileges of the communion service to those deprived of it, he was set upon as an apostate. He was warned that he must not violate the Seceder testimony by recognizing the Christian standing of those who did not confess the Seceder faith.

Confessionalism.

At the bottom of the sectarianism of religious society was confessionalism, by which it was justified and sustained. Christians were justified in hating and outlawing and separating from each other, so the conviction prevailed, because they did not confess the same creed. Their different confessions of faith drove them apart. Every creed was a declaration of war upon every other creed; they were the battle-cries of contending sects. Christian creeds have always been aimed against other Christians, not against atheists; against other believers, not against unbelievers. Theological opinions determined one's standing in the church and one's relation to Christ.

Ecclesiasticism.

But at the bottom of the confessionalism was an ecclesiasticism—church councils and hierarchies that formulated and enforced subscription to the various confessions of faith. Ecclesiastical tribunals opened and closed the door of the kingdom of heaven. They fixed the conditions of entrance and received and rejected whom they would. Faith in Christ and obedience to him were not enough; there must be faith in a confession of faith and obedience to the church authorities.

No sooner had Luther emancipated the Christian soul from the tyranny of priestly and papal authority, than it fell under a new tyranny in the Protestant church in the form of a confessional and clerical authority supported by an arbitrary supernaturalism. The divine favor was conditioned upon an arbitrary decree of election mediated by miraculous workings of the Holy Spirit. A supernatural regeneration hedged in the way of salvation, and if a penitent soul was fortunate enough to receive from God the miraculous token of its election, it still had to run the gauntlet of a theological examination before it could rest secure in peace with God. It was hard to be saved in that day.

This, then, is a list of the infirmities afflicting the Protestant church one hundred years ago: sectarianism, confessionalism, ecclesiasticism, and supernaturalism. The movement of the Campbells was a reaction against these conditions in the religious world under the influence of the social consciousness of the age. It was a part of the larger world movement making for "liberty, fraternity, and equality."

Agreement With the Age.

There seems to me to be a singular correspondence between the ideas the Campbells were organizing into a religious movement and the ideas seeking embodiment at that time in political institutions. Their watchwords in religious reformation were almost identical with the watchwords of political revolution. The magic ideas of the American and French Revolutions were the ideas the Campbells conjured with. "Liberty" with them meant freedom from the tyrannical and arbitrary authority of creeds and clergy, of presbytery and synod, in favor of a constitutional authority, the written word of God. "Equality" meant the equal right of every soul to the suffrages of redeeming grace, "man's free agency and the sinner's immediate duty to repent;" the equal right of layman with clergyman, to preach the gospel, to administer the ordinances, and to rule the church of God. "Fraternity" meant the call to the brotherhood and unity of fellowship in the simplicity of Christian discipleship, the duty of every believer in Christ to receive every other believer regardless of theological opinions.

Timeliness and Survival.

No open and popular movement could have succeeded in that age with face set against Liberty, Equality and Fraternity. It is possible for an esoteric cult to arise in any age and create for itself a form that suited its fancy. But not a movement that makes its appeal openly to all the people.

In such a case the social consciousness of the time would work as a selective agent, both creating and perpetuating, according to its own nature, those elements that corresponded with it. Every movement, religious, political, or social, must render homage to the spirit of the age in which it asks for the suffrages of men. This process always insures a certain timeliness to every successful enterprise. For what is the timeliness of anything but the agreement or the suitableness of a thing to its time. It is by a process of natural or rational selection that anything is decreed fit to survive. The unfit simply perish, as things born out of due time. Timeliness is one of the most essential grounds of survival, while survival always indicates an element of timeliness.

Children of Their Time.

In many striking respects the movement of the Campbells was in agreement with the social and political mind of the age. They might not have consciously borrowed ideas from the political philosophy of the time; but being children of their own generation they could not escape its influences. Their own testimony was that they derived their ideas from the New Testament and from right reason; but the age let those ideas come to life and acceptance by virtue of its own liking for them. The one philosopher who contributed more than any other to the political philosophy of the age was the one mind to whom the Campbells owed most, by their own confession. That philosopher was John Locke, who was the common teacher of political and religious revolutionists.

The Age of Democracy.

With any other set of ideas the movement of the Campbells would not have succeeded. The ideas they put forth in the religious sphere had become the commonplaces of the political and social sphere. It was preëminently the age of Democracy; the churches established by the Campbells were the most democratic of the time. It was the age of reason; the Campbells did more to rationalize faith and spiritual influence and conversion than any other religious teachers of their generation, with the exception of the Unitarian leaders. It is significant that all the great leaders of the Disciples—the Campbells and Stone especially—were accused of being Unitarians. It was the age of political constitutions—an age in which ancient political authorities were being set aside in favor of a more ancient authority, the voice of the people. This authority was being written into the constitutions of rising republics and commonwealths.

Alexander Campbell construed the kingdom of God in terms of a constitutional republic and conceived the relation between Christ and the Christian as a legal relation.

Correspondence with Environment.

These, then, are the elements of success which entered into the movement of the Campbells out of the atmosphere of the time—democracy, rationalism, and legalism. In subsequent studies I shall treat of each one of these elements in detail, and show how they contributed to the success of the movement.

In this study I have simply applied the principle of timeliness or adaptation to the work of the Campbells. Biologists tell us that the law of life in the natural world is "correspondence with environment." This holds true of religious bodies as of living organisms. Neither plants nor denominations can live out of adjustment with conditions. As conditions change, so must the plant or denomination change, or die. If life and success have come to the movement of the Campbells because of adaptation to the mind of the age, continued life and success can only come by continued adaptation. This is the singular paradox of religious institutions, that they help to make, and are in turn made and remade by their conditions.

The Married State

Some Words of Advice by a Famous Jesuit Preacher.

Father Bernard Vaughan, S. J., the London priest who preached the famous sermons on the "Sins of Society," has delivered a homily on marriage to a great gathering of fashionable women. The sermon was by no means like his diatribes against the smart set.

"Except," said Father Vaughan, "for those who have some special call in life, the married state is best. In marriage both man and woman lead a higher life.

"The first business of a bride and bridegroom is to learn to make allowance for all those differences which must arise from the difference of sex, of education, of taste, of home traditions. They must not expect too much from pure human nature. They must bear one another's burdens, and self must stand in the background.

"To the husband I would say, Be sweet to your wife; never attempt to check the flowing tide of her talk. Let her talk on, while you get credit for possessing your soul in peace.

"Remember, a woman needs many safety valves and outlets. Most women have a passion for jewelry and finery. Give her what you can and let her feel it is from you she has got it even if it has cost you some self-sacrifice.

"Forget not that women thirst for sympathy, as flowers for sunshine. If you are never thinking of her, if you do not send sweet notes—others may come to offer their sympathy, and who is to blame?

"I always put all the blame, if anything goes wrong in married life, on the man, because he is the stronger. It is the man who should overcome himself and protect the wife of his heart.

"To the woman I would say that she must keep her home in beautiful order, and keep her temper. There is much of the animal even in the Christian man.

"Let her always be neat and smart when alone with her husband, and not merely when entertaining company. He likes to see his wife well turned-out, and it is her business to be pleasing in his eyes. So many women dress to look better than other women! Let a woman dress to be pleasing always in the eyes of her husband, and he will not be jealous when other men are in her society.

"Never offer a man excuses, and do not keep him waiting while you put on your things," continued the smiling father, amid chuckles of laughter.

"To the wife I say, 'Never nag, never scold, never cry!' These tricks of women often bring them what they want, but they kill their husband's love. No man wants to be teased—even by his wife.

"So I would say to the wife, 'Try to look like the flowers, even when there is no sunshine.'

"On both husband and wife I would urge that they will have a splendid time in life, no matter whether they live in slumdom, or villadom, or Mayfair, if they only live their lives trying to build up the home.

"Be courteous to each other, grow chivalrous, do not wrangle and quarrel, and let the man stand well at the back of his passions and curb them in. When there has been any misunderstanding, before the sun goes down let husband and wife be locked heart to heart, and let the tears of forgiveness wipe out the stain."

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

Chain Letters and the Healing Cult

The prayer-chain-letter still persists. It is now several years since a letter purporting to have been started by a Bishop Lawrence has been going the rounds. It is safe to estimate that tens of thousands of this abominable letter have been mailed by and to as many people. Several have called my attention to copies they have received recently. The very objectionable prayer persists because most people feel hesitant in offering any criticism on even an unworthy prayer. Reverence forbids censure often when censure is needed. It persists, too, because there is a large element of superstition still remaining in most people's minds. Lessing says that long after we have ceased to believe in superstition it continues to have practical bearing on our lives. Every one will recognize the truth of this statement. One lady asks me if I thought she could afford not to grant the request of this letter. She and her husband had lost much money during the past year and she was afraid if she refused to write the several letters requested, that more "bad luck" would befall them.

Bad Theology Still Lingers.

Another reason for the great persistency of this cruel letter is because of much lingering bad theology. God is thought of as a shrewd bargainer. He is a big and sharp trader with whom we can fix up deals. Even a cruder idea of God than this still lingers. He is regarded as an almighty automatic machine into which if we deposit certain offerings we will receive ground out for us certain favors.

The impudence, the audacity, the presumptuousness of this current chain-letter ought to be apparent to all. It gives a prayer to be repeated every day. It promises that if you write and send nine letters to as many people that upon the ninth day some great blessing will come to you. But if you fail to write the letters some great misfortune will soon overtake you; and in one of the letters I saw, an example of a misfortune that came to one refusing is given.

A Wrong to God and Man.

This is most abominable stuff. Any person is doing a wrong to society to write even a single letter of such heathenish imprecations. Let no one be uneasy who refuses; but rather let him who furthers such presumptuous promises and such impudent threats be uneasy, for it is the latter who is doing both God and man a wrong.

* * *

Is this a scientific or psychic age? Is it materialistic or spiritual? We are not quite sure of our age. As soon as we get it labeled somebody informs us that we have named it wrong. Is Darwin or Mrs. Eddy the patron saint of our time? Is evolution or daily miracle to be the greater factor? We seem chaotic in our decisions. Our time at least is not dull, for countless people are asking daring questions. One even risks asking if Evolution is not spiritual and Christian Science materialistic! We are a long way from the end of the road in our present thinking with regard to healing.

Popular Interest in Healing Cult.

We do know, however, that people are very much interested in the many ways suggested for the healing of diseases. Three new books dealing with the relation of religion to health are on my table. For the present I pass these to briefly refer to a little pamphlet on "Divine Healing" by Sumner T. Martin. I am glad Mr. Martin has written upon this theme. It seems to connect immensely more vitally with life than do many things about which many are writing.

A Contribution to Our Literature.

The essay by Mr. Martin is a succinct, clear statement of his position, and is therefore a contribution to our thought and literature. In a word the author contends that the church is as certainly commissioned to heal as it is to preach, and that it ought not to trust its healing to doctors, or to certain psycho-therapeutic men; but simply heal in the name of Jesus. He would not limit the curative power of God to functional diseases; nor would he have a diagnosis by a physician before invoking the Divine power. The cures in the New Testament were effected by the direct power of God and must be still if the church is to be alive with the grace and power of God.

Law of Healing Not Abrogated.

Perhaps it is best to state the conclusions of the author in his own words:

> "It seems to me the argument is complete. There is not a link missing in the chain of Scripture truth. The Divine plan reaching from Paradise lost to Paradise regained is that God's people should look to him only for healing. He has never abrogated the law, nor recalled the promise and privilege. Let us claim it as our birthright and employ it as a credential of our mission as kings and priests unto God."

This interests me very much; especially as it comes from a life-long Disciple. It is revolutionary.. But the important question to ask is, Is it true? Mr. Martin well knows that the Disciples have held that miracles ceased with the apostolic age.

Concerning this he says:

> "Brethren, the argument we make for confining Divine Healing to the Apostolic age is the identical one the Friends and some other religious bodies make concerning baptism. They admit Christ was baptized, that he commissioned his disciples to baptize, that they did so wherever they went, but, they tell us, this was for the infancy of the church. It was among the "first principles of the doctrine of Christ" that were to be left behind while we go on to perfection."

This is not conclusive to me. The only convincing argument is the proof that miracles do take place today. The question cannot be answered from scripture, or in an a priori way.

Statement of Difficulties.

I have other questions as to the paper. I do not argue: but simply state my own difficulties. I cannot bring myself to believe that such words as these apply to the ministry of our day: "And these signs shall accompany them that believe; in My name shall they cast out demons; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall in no wise hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover."

Mr. Martin seems not to recognize God in means of healing. Healing to me when by medicine or food, suggestion or climate is just as divine as though God did it without means.

The author appears not to recognize our debt to the science of medicine and surgery. Of course we all know that there is a good deal of guess work in medicine; yet there are innumerable ascertained results that have proved a boon to humanity.

Evidence Likely to Mislead.

Again, I think Mr. Martin places too much stress as evidence upon individual cases of illness that have become well after prayer: The curative forces of nature are tremendous, but always unseen.

Certainly the essayist is right in thinking the church is not as mighty today as it should be. It is well for us to know if the way to might and blessing lies in the road he has pointed out. We should all be happier, healthier and heartier Christians. There will be a rich deposit left when the overflow of discussion of mental healing has subsided

Bakin' Day

By John Kendrick Bangs.

Have you any smiles today?
  Send me up a peck—
Kind that reaches all the way
  Round behind your neck.

Send a dozen boxes of Best assorted cheer;
Also twenty quarts of love—
  Must be warm and clear.

Happy thoughts and pleasant words—
  Mix 'em good and strong—
Kind to make you think of birds
  Burstin' into song.

'Leven bars of kindliness
  Free from flaw and chill;
And two dozen packages
  Of the best good-will.

Send me all the charity
  You can rightly spare,
And a box of sympathy—
  Pizenness to care!

This is bakin' day, and I
  Have a sort of plan
For to make a tasty pie
  For my fellowman.

Courting in China

Ah Showe, an intelligent Chinese merchant, doing business in Boston, was recently interviewed and gave to the reporter the following account of the way marriages are brought about in China.

There is no such thing as courting among young people in China. The bride and bridegroom never see each other until they are about to become man and wife.

Their courting is all done by their parents.

Let us suppose that you have a son and I a daughter of marriageable age, and we are friends.

You tell me you want to get your son married, and ask if I am willing to give my daughter to him.

I say yes. I have seen your son and like him, and you have not seen my daughter.

But you hire a female broker to go and inspect my daughter, and she does for a consideration.

Indeed, this is a regular business, and many make a good living out of it.

She visits my house, sees and talks with my daughter, finds that her feet are so small that she can hardly walk—that absurd custom of deforming the feet is still very prevalent in China—and returns and makes a most flattering report.

Then you and I come together, and I give you a written paper embodying my consent to the union, while you, in like manner, signify your approval, and give me a paper signed by you, and the engagement is completed.

You then cause a great number of sweet cakes to be sent to my daughter from your son, and these are given around to our friends as an announcement of the betrothal of our daughter.

The marriage itself may not take place for a month, six months or a year after the engagement, according to agreement.

There is no religious ceremony of marriage in China.

A friend of the bridegroom's family—usually a man of respectability and position—is chosen, who reads the marriage ceremony from a book, which binds the couple, who, before that time, had been strangers to one another, to live together during life.

"Are there not frequent instances of unhappy marriages in this way?"

"No, indeed. On the contrary such marriages are nearly always happy. The young couple soon learn to love one another, and live in harmony together."

"Do men give dowers to their daughters in marriage?"

"Quite often; but if a parent dies without giving anything to his daughters, his property all goes to the sons. The daughters get nothing.

"The father of the newly wedded young man furnishes his house, though if he is poor, the father of the bride does so secretly, so as not to expose his poverty. The bride, however, is expected to furnish her chamber and bedding."—The Standard.

The Courage of the Losing Fighter

BY LILIAN BELL IN THE CIRCLE.

Success does not interest me at all. I have come to this conclusion reluctantly and after years of patient investigation. My acquaintances are all successful, but I find them smug, and I do abominate the smug so thoroughly that I drop all such as softly and unobtrusively as possible and cling to my friends—the losing figh ers.

Though I call them my friends it does not follow that I know them personally. Some I hear of; others I have seen. Some I know to bow to. Yet, whether I know them to speak to or not, they are my friends and I love them for fighting their desperate, losing fight.

By a losing fight I do not mean that my men and women must be frayed at the edges, carry baggy umbrellas, and owe the butcher. No, most of those I love best present to the world a surface success which is honorable and true. They are neither hypocrites nor fakers. But they are bearing up under untold difficulties. They are fighting as valiantly today as they fougnt in the beginning—and the beginning for some was long ago—yet the cruelty of life is daily and hourly driving them back step by step. But the glory of it to me is the unfaltering courage with which they covet and contest each inch.

Many persons claim to have a heart because when they are witnesses to a fight their sympathy is always with the under dog. But did you ever stop to think that possibly the upper dog is the loser after all? That possibly his is the courage of desperation; that his is the nobler cause, and that he conquers greed or treachery or masked cowardice at the expense of his strength? That, perhaps, this is his last fight?

Then, too, sex shows up unerringly in the manner in which these losing battles are fought. A man, when he fully realizes that he is a loser, that, even if he wins one thing he is losing the greatest, the best, and the only thing he cares for, generally puts his back against the wall and fights to a finish. He faces death courageously but he wants it to come quickly.

A woman—a woman who knows that her best is lost to her, faces not death, but life, courageously, and fights continuously, patiently, bravely, not to a finish, but to an end not yet in sight. There are the women who, after the husband idol has fallen from its pedestal, are keeping the home together for the sake of the children, fighting a courageous fight with the goal already hopelessly lost.

I know a woman who writes. She writes gaily, blithely, helpfully. Thousands regard

RICHARD W. GENTRY, PREACHER

THE WHAT IF SERIES: "WHAT IF I SHOULD DIE BEFORE I WAKE?"

An After-Easter Thought.

I wonder if when we say, "if I should die before I wake," we don't think there isn't much use in saying it. We are feeling so good and sleepy tonight, and we are pretty sure that we'll wake up right there in the bed in the morning. We did it yesterday and have been doing it since "way-way back yonder."

Looks like we might leave that out, doesn't it? There isn't any more danger of our dying than of old Ben's running off. Of course he might run off. He's got legs just like the horse that tore things up the other day. He could run off. But he doesn't. He just switches his tail and goes along day by day. He sometimes shies. But that's all over in a minute. And so mother lets us drive him ourself.

We sometimes shy too. We get "out of order." Last June when we ate green apples we felt pretty serious about things and we cried, "Mother, I just know I am going to die." But we didn't. And mother just laughed, as she does when Ben shies, and gave us a jerk on the lines, so to speak, and had us all right in no time.

But just supposin'. Supposin' old Ben did run off. There would be problems. Just suppose we did die before we woke. There would be problems. I think the first thing that we would think of is that we would want to be ready for the new life, we would want to be fit to meet Christ. So to-night when we say, "if I should die before I wake"—we should ask ourselves "If I did, would I be ready for the more perfect life that the 'I' will live beyond?" Then we'd say to ourselves, "I'm almost sure that I will not die before I wake. But tomorrow I am going to be just as good as I can be."

her as the apotheosis of easy success and envy her position and the happiness which must accompany her supremacy. Yet I happen to know that the one she loves best on earth is dying a lingering death of an illness which neither money nor human skill may even subdue the pain thereof.

She is both nurse and breadwinner, and doing the work of two is robbing her of health and strength, yet not one complaint ever passes her lips. With her back against the wall she fights her losing fight, which, though won each day, yet loses, loses to her all that she loves best. Such courage as is in her little slender frame and blazes from her dauntless eyes! Yet her success—even though she daily wins her losing fight—brings tears to my eyes.

The woman who scrubs for me, earning her dollar and a half a day on her knees, is kneeling, not only to her work, but before an altar whereon lies the crippled child she adores. He can never grow up—she must know this in her heart, even though we talk of what he will do when he grows strong and well—he is failing daily, and her eyes know the truth though her lips still speak brave lies. He will live, he is eating better, his lips have more color, his eyes are brighter! Yet as she lifts him in her arms at night she feels that his little frame is daily growing lighter and his feeble clutch on life is nightly growing looser. She talks to me—this poor mother! this brave, losing fighter!—of the time when he will walk, well knowning that the first step his poor little crippled feet will take will be in another world. Oh, the poor souls on this earth who fight blindly against the ever-dancing, grimly stalking Death!

It is hard enough for the grown-ups to fight, when, for each step forward their souls are driven two paces backward, but when you think of the children—the little, little children, whose heritage is sunshine and flowers and song of birds, yet who are forced to live within brick walls and do the work of men and women! Their fight is losing them health and strength and good blood and sound bodies and strong nerves, and leaving them alive, to be sure, but crippled in mind, dwarfed in body, and stunted in hope.

You who are successful in that you are not fighting your battle of life against hopeless disease or a nearby approaching death; you whose wage is equal to your necessities; you who lay by a little each month for a rainy-day fund, or you who count your wealth by millions, will you not give the right hand of fellowship, share your sympathy, or in some manner cheer the heart of some proud, courageous, silent-lipped, losing fighter of your acquaintance?—grip the hand of some man struggling with increasing expense and dwindling wage?—write a note of gratitude to some one whose work has inspired you?

Best of all, won't you pause long enough each day to bestow a helpful thought on the great and noble army of losing fighters in this world?

Woman's Sphere

Both were in automobiles, and the two machines met in the tunnel connecting the Casa de Campo with the palace. As the passage is very narrow, the chauffers could not avoid a collision. The front wheels and lanterns of the king's car were smashed. The queen proceeded to the palace on foot, while the king continued his drive in the queen's auto.

For Christ in the Home

"It will sweep through the churches of America just as the Christian Endeavor did a generation ago," is the way one pastor put his opinion of the Family Altar League. And the letters which have come pouring into the headquarters of the League from all parts of the country have expressed the same enthusiastic faith in the new organization, which is now only in the seventh month of its existence.

The League was organized and inaugurated in the autumn of 1908 by Rev. William Edward Biederwolf, the Indiana evangelist, on whom had grown the conviction that the church must get back to the simpler devotional life if it was to retain its spiritual power, and that the home must again be recognized as the bulwark of the Christian faith. The founder, and the other workers interested, felt that such a conviction was general among earnest, thinking Christians, and that the League would be welcomed, but they were entirely unprepared for the flood of approval and endorsement that burst upon them as soon as the undertaking was made public.

There is no doubt that the Family Altar League has come to stay, for it is filling a breach where help has sorely been needed. Already thousands of family altars have been established because of it, and its influence and work are growing every day. Pastors see in it a means of awakening the spiritual life of their churches, and most of the requests for covenant cards are from the ministers, although the laity is not slow to join in the work. One of the prominent pastors of New Orleans, in ordering cards for his people, says, "Already I feel under lasting obligation to the brethren who, under God, originated this movement. I am sure that many of our serious church problems will be solved by the cultivation of the religious life in the home."

Covenant cards will be sent free to anyone on application at the headquarters of the League at 602 Lakeside Building, Chicago, and to everyone who takes the covenant a beautiful four-color wall card certificate of membership is sent free of cost. The wall card is a product of artists in Germany and America, and is truly a thing of art, worthy to hang on the wall of any home. Requests have come in for over thirty thousand covenant cards and they have gone to every state in the Union, and to foreign lands. The actual cost of the cards, including mailing, is twenty-six cents a hundred, and if those ordering cards desire to bear all or part of the expense, it will be appreciated, but in any case, orders will be promptly filled.

The cards are being used in the famous Water Street Mission in New York city, and their missionary says, "We urge the erection of the family altar in the wrecked home that has become rebuilt by Grace Divine, and also in the homes of the 'newly-wed.' God bless the work."

An Old Song: "There's No Place Like Home"

Blanche Elizabeth Wade.

When people ask me where I live,
I hate to have to go and give
A name like Smithville, plain.
I'd rather say:—"Sir, if you please,
My home is in the Hebrides,"
Or, "High up in the Pyrenees,"
Or, "At Gibraltar, Spain."

"Constantinople," too, sounds fine,
And "Drachenfels-upon-the-Rhine,"
And "Madagascar," too;
And "Yokohama" sounds so great,
And "Hindustan" is just first-rate;
I rather like even "Bering Strait,"
And "Cuzco" in Peru.

And yet, I would not be at night
Alone upon the "Isle of Wight,"
Or on the "Zuyder Zee."
At "Nova Zembla," in a gale,
I know that I should just turn pale;
For fear of earthquakes, I should quail
In "sunny Italy."

A place that sounds nice on the map,
May have a little too much snap
To keep within its wall;
And so, though many names I see,
That sound as stylish as can be,
There's no place quite so good for me,
As Smithville, after all!

—May St. Nicholas.

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XIII

A Fair Advocate.

Thanks to the fashion in which the hotel keeper managed the affair, the gambler, after Winston had rescued young Ferris from his clutches, left the settlement without personal injury, but very little richer than when he entered it. The rest of those who were present at his meeting with Winston were also not desirous that their frends should know took for granted the insanity of any one that they had been victimized, and because Lane was discreet news of what had happened might never have reached Silverdale had not one of the younger men ridden in to the railroad a few days later. Odd scraps of conversation overheard led him to suspect that something unusual had taken place, but as nobody seemed to be willing to supply details, he returned to Silverdale with his curiosity unsatisfied. As it happened, he was shortly afterwards present at a gathernig of his neighbors at Macdonald's farm and came across Ferris there.

I heard fragments of a curious story at the settlement," he said. "There was trouble of some kind in which a professional gambler figured last Saturday night, and though nobody seemed to want to talk about it, I surmised that somebody from Silverdale was concerned in it."

He had perhaps spoken a trifle more loudly than he had intended, and there were a good many of the Silverdale farmers with a few of their wives and daughters whose attention was not wholly confined to the efforts of Mrs. Macdonald at the piano in the long room just then. In any case a voice broke though the silence that followed the final chords.

"Ferris could tell us if he liked. He was there that night."

Ferris, who had cause for doing so, looked uncomfortable, and endeavored to sign to the first speaker that it was not desirable to pursue the topic.

"I have been in tolerably often of late. Had things to attend to," he said.

The other man was, however, possessed by a mischievous spirit or did not understand him. "You may just as well tell us now as later, because you never kept a secret in your life," he said.

In the meantime, several of the others had gathered about them, and Mrs. Macdonald, who had joined the group, smiled as she said, "There is evidently something going on. Mayn't I know, Gordon?"

"Of course," said the man who had visited the settlement. "You shall know as much as I do, though that is little, and if it excites your curiosity, you can ask Ferris for the rest. He is only anxious to enhance the value of his story by being mysterious. Well, there was a more or less dramatic happening, of the kind our friends in the old country unwarrantably fancy is typical of the West, in the saloon of the settlement not long ago. Cards, pistols, a professional gambler, and the unmasking of foul play, don't you know. Somebody from Silverdale played the leading role."

"How interesting!" said a young English girl. "Now, I used to fancy something of that kind happened here every day before I came out to the prairie. Please tell us, Mr. Ferris! One would like to find there is just a trace of reality in our picturesque fancies of debonair desperadoes and big-hatted cavaliers."

There was a curious expression in Ferris' face, but as he glanced around at the rest, who were regarding him expectantly, he did not observe that Maud Barrington and her aunt had just come in and stood close behind him.

"Can't you see there's no getting out of, Ferris?" said somebody.

"Well," said the lad in desperation, "I can only admit that Gordon is right. There was foul play and a pistol drawn, but I'm sorry that I can't add anything further. In fact, it wouldn't be quite fair of me."

"But the man from Silverdale?" asked Mrs. Macdonald.

"I'm afraid," said Ferris, with the air of one shielding a friend, "I can't tell you anything about him."

"I know Mr. Courthorne drove in that night," said the young English girl, who was not endued with very much discretion.

"Courthorne," said one of the bystanders, and there was a momentary silence that was very expressive. "Was he concerned in what took place, Ferris?"

"Yes," said the lad, with apparent reluctance. "Mrs. Macdonald, you will remember that they dragged it out of me, but I will tell you nothing more whatever."

"It seems to me you have told us quite sufficient and perhaps a trifle too much," said somebody.

There was a curious silence. All of those present were more or less acquainted with Courthorne's past history, and the suggestion of foul play coupled with the mention of a professional gambler had been significant. Ferris, while committing himself in no way, had certainly said sufficient. Then there was a sudden turning of heads as a young woman moved quietly into the midst of the group. She was ominously calm, but she stood very straight, and there was a little hard glitter in her eyes, which reminded one or two of the men who noticed it of those of Colonel Barrington. The fingers of one hand were also closed at her side.

"I overheard you telling a story, Ferris, but you have a bad memory and left rather too much out," she said.

"They compelled me to tell them what I did, Miss Barrington," said the lad, who winced beneath her gaze. "Now, there is really nothing to be gained by going any further into the affair. Shall I play something for you, Mrs. Macdonald?"

He turned as he spoke, and would have edged away, but that one of the men at a glance from the girl laid a hand on his shoulder.

"Don't be in a hurry Ferris. I fancy Miss Barrington has something more to tell you," he said dryly.

The girl thanked him with a gesture. "I want you to supply the most important part," she said, and the lad, saying nothing, changed color under the glance she cast upon him. "You do not seem willing. Then perhaps I had better do it for you. There were two men from Silverdale directly concerned in the affair, and one of them at no slight risk to himself did a very generous thing. That one was Mr. Courthorne. Did you see him lay a single stake upon a card, or do anything that led you to suppose he was there for the purpose of gambling that evening?"

"No," said the lad, seeing she knew the truth, and his hoarse voice was scarcely audible.

"Then," said Maud Barrington, "I want you to tell us what you did see him do."

Ferris said nothing, and though the girl laughed a little as she glanced at the wondering group, her voice was icily disdainful.

"Well," she said, "I will tell you. You saw him question a professional gambler's play to save a man who had no claim on him from ruin, and, with only one comrade to back him, drive the swindler, who had a pistol, from the field. He had, you admit, no interest of any kind in the game."

Ferris had grown crimson again, and the veins on his forehead showed swollen high. "No," he said almost abjectly.

Maud Barrington turned from him to her hostess as she answered, "That will suffice, in the meanwhile, until I can decide whether it is desirable to make known the rest of the tale. I brought the new song Evelyn wanted, Mrs. Macdonald, and I will play it for her, if she would care to try it."

She moved away with the elder lady, and left the rest astonished to wonder what had become of Ferris, who was seen no more that evening, while presently Winston came in.

His face was a trifle weary, for he had toiled since the run rose above the rim of the prairie and when the arduous day was over and those who had worked for him were glad to rest their aching limbs, had driven two leagues to Macdonald's. Why he had done so, he was not willing to admit, but he glanced around the long room anxiously as he came in, and his eyes brightened as they rested on Maud Barrington. They were, however, observant eyes, and he noticed that there was a trifle more color than usual in the girl's pale-tinted face, and signs of suppressed curiosity about some of the rest. When he had greeted his hostess he turned to one of the men.

"It seems to me you are either trying not to see something, Gordon, or to forget it as soon as you can," he said.

Gordon laughed at little. "You are not often mistaken, Courthorne. That is precisely what we are doing. I presume you haven't heard what occurred here an hour ago?"

"No!" said Winston. "I'm not very curious if it does not concern me."

Gordon looked at him steadily. "I fancy it does. You see that young fool Ferris was suggesting that you had been mixed up in something not very creditable at the settlement lately. As it happened, Maud Barrington overheard him and made him retract before the company. She did it effectively, and if it had been any one else, the scene would have been almost theatrical. Still, you know nothing seems out of place when it comes from the Colonel's niece. Nor if you had heard her would you have wanted a better advocate."

For a moment the bronze deepened in Winston's forehead, and there was a gleam in his eyes, but though it passed as rapidly as it came, Gordon had seen it, and smiled when the farmer moved away.

"That's a probability I never counted on," he thought. "Still, I fancy if it came about, it would suit everybody but the Colonel."

Then he turned as Mrs. Macdonald came up to him. "What are you doing here alone when I see there is nobody talking to the girl from Winnipeg?"

The man laughed a little. "I was wondering whether it is a good sign or otherwise when a young woman is, so far as she can decently be, uncivil to a man who desires her good-will."

Mrs. Macdonald glanced at him sharply, and then shook her head. "The question is too deep for you—and it is not your affair. Besides, haven't you seen that indiscreet freedom of speech is not encouraged at Silverdale?"

In the meanwhile Winston, crossing the room, took a vacant place at Maud Barrington's side. She turned her head a moment and looked at him.

Winston nodded. "Yes, I heard," he said. "Why did you do it?"

Maud Barrington made a little gesture of impatience. "That is quite unnecessary. You know I sent you."

"Yes," said Winston, a trifle dryly, "I see. You would have felt mean if you hadn't defended me?"

"No," said the girl, with a curious smile. "That was not exactly the reason, but we cannot talk too long here. Dane is anxious to take us home in his new buggy, but it would apparently be a very tight fit for three. Will you drive me over?"

Winston only nodded, for Mrs. Macdonald approached in pursuit of him, but he spent the rest of the evening in a state of expectancy, and Maud Barrington fancied that his hard hands were suspiciously unresponsive as she took them when he helped her into the Silverdale wagon—a vehicle that a strong man could have lifted, and in no way resembling its English prototype. The team was mettlesome, the lights of Macdonald's homestead soon faded behind them, and they were racing with many a lurch and jolt straight as the crow flies across the prairie.

There was no moon, but the stars shone far up in the soft indigo, and the grasses whirled back in endless ripples to the humming wheels, dimmed to the dusky blue that suffused the whole intermerging sweep of earth and sky. The sweetness of wild peppermint rose through the coolness of the dew, and the voices of the wilderness were part of the silence that was but the perfect balance of the nocturnal harmonies. The two who knew and loved the prairie could pick out each one of them. Nor did it seem that there was any need of speech on such a night, but at last Winston turned with a little smile to his companion, as he checked the horses on the slope of a billowy rise.

"One feels diffident about intruding on this great quietness," he said. "Still, I fancy you had a purpose in asking me to drive you home."

"Yes," said the girl, with a curious gentleness. "In the first place, though I know it isn't necessary with you, I want to thank you. I made Dane tell me, and you have done all I wished—splendidly."

Winston laughed. "Well, you see, it naturally came easy to me."

Maud Barrington noticed the trace of grimness in his voice. "Please try to overlook our unkindness," she said. "Is it really needful to keep reminding me? And how was I to know what you were, when I had only heard that wicked story?"

Winston felt a little thrill run through him, for which reason he looked straight in front of him and shifted his grasp on the reins. Disdainful and imperious as she was at times, he knew there was wealth of softer qualities in his companion now. Her daintiness in thought and person, and honesty of purpose, appealed to him, while that night her mere physical presence had an effect that was almost bewildering. For a moment he wondered vaguely how far a man might dare to go, with what fate had thrust upon him, and then with a little shiver saw once more the barrier of deceit and imposture.

"You believe it was not a true one?" he asked.

"Of course," said Maud Barrington. "How could it be? And you have been very patient under our suspicions. Now, if you still value the good-will you once asked for, it is yours absolutely."

"But you may still hear unpleasant stories about me?" said Winston, with a note the girl had not heard before in his voice.

"I should not believe them," she said.

"Still," persisted Winston, "if the tales were true?"

Maud Barrington did nothing by halves. "Then I should remember that there is always so much we do not know which would put a different color on any story, and I believe they could never be true again."

Winston checked a little gasp of wonder and delight, and Maud Barrington looked away across the prairie. She was not usually impulsive and seldom lightly bestowed gifts that were worth the having, and the man knew that the faith in him she had confessed to was the result of a conviction that would last until he himself shattered it. Then, in the midst of his elation, he shivered again and drew the lash across the near horse's back. The wonder and delight he felt had suddenly gone.

"Few would venture to predict as much. Now and then I feel that our deeds are scarcely contrived by our own will, and one could fancy our parts had been thrust upon us in a grim joke," he said. "For instance, isn't it strange that I should have a hand in the rousing of Silverdale to a sense of its responsibilities? Lord, what I could make of it, if fate had but given me a fair opportunity!"

He spoke almost fiercely, but the words did not displease the girl. The forcely ring in his voice set something thrilling within her, and she knew by this time that his assertions seldom went beyond the fact.

"But you will have the opportunity, and we need you here," she said.

"No," said Winston slowly. "I am afraid not. Still, I will finish the work I see in front of me. That at least—one cannot hope for the unattainable."

Maud Barrington was sensible of a sudden chill. "Still, if one has strength and patience, is anything quite unattainable?"

Winston looked out across the prairie, and for a moment the demons of pride and ambition rioted within him. He knew there were in him the qualities that compel success, and the temptation to stretch out a daring hand and take all he longed for grew almost overmastering. Still, he also knew how strong the innate prejudices of caste and tradition are in most women of his companion's station, and she had never hidden one aspect of her character from him. It was with a smothered groan he realized that if he flung the last shred of honor aside and grasped the forbidden fruit it would turn to bitterness in his mouth.

"Yes," he said very slowly. "There is a limit which only fools would pass."

Then there was a silence for a while, until, as they swept across the rise, Maud Barrington laughed as she pointed to the lights that blinked in the hollow, and Winston realized that the barrier between them stood firm again.

"Our views seldom coincide for very long, but there is something else to mention before we reach the Grange," she said. "You must have paid out a good many dollars for the plowing of your land and mine, and nobody's exchequer is inexhaustible at Silverdale. Now I want you to take a check from me."

"Is it necessary that I should?"

"Of course," said the girl, with a trace of displeasure.

Winston laughed. "Then I shall be prepared to hand you my account whenever you demand it."

He did not look upon his companion again, but with a tighter grip than there was any need for on the reins, sent the light wagon jolting down the slope to Silverdale Grange.

Paul in Galatia*

The evangelistic work of Barnabas and Saul in the Island of Cyprus did not consume much time. At the close of their residence in Paphos on the western coast they determined to strike directly for the main land of Asia Minor where there was more abundant opportunity for missionary work. They, therefore, sailed from Paphos and came to the town of Perga, which was only a short distance from the sea-coast in the province of Pamphylia. Perga is about 175 miles northwest from Paphos across the channel which separates Asia Minor from Cyprus. It is at this point in the narrative that the changing leadership of the little company is recognized by the narrator. It was "Barnabas and Saul" who had come to Cyprus; it was "Paul and his company" who departed for the north.

John's Departure.

The two evangelists were accompanied by John, the son of Mary of Jerusalem, and later the evangelist of the Second Gospel. At this point in the progress of the work John suddenly changed his plan and went back to Jerusalem. The reasons for this sudden step are not given. Was he finding the journey which had promised him both pleasure and adventure proving tiresome in its steady devotion to one object? Was he resentful of the growing influence of Paul and the lessening importance of his cousin Barnabas in the enterprise? Was he troubled regarding the safety of his mother in Jerusalem in the midst of the persecution? All of these are possible reasons for his abrupt departure.

But whatever his excuse may have been, it was deemed insufficient by the apostle Paul who could not quite forgive the defection at such an important moment in their work. A young man like Mark could be of great help to Paul and Barnabas in their earnest efforts to reach the outer world with the gospel. To be deprived of his help just when the work was becoming fruitful was a misfortune, amounting in Paul's thought to denial of missionary obligation. The result of this unhappy act of Mark is to be seen in the later narrative (Acts 15:36-39). Nevertheless it was no standing grievance on the part of the apostle. In later years he spoke kindly of the younger man and even wished Timothy to bring Mark with him when he returned to the apostle in Rome (2 Tim. 4:11).

Why Did Paul Go to Antioch?

It was perhaps Paul's purpose to labor in the vicinity of the sea and in the region of Perga, but something caused him to abandon this plan and push on into the highlands in the interior. The movement of the narrative is very rapid and it is difficult to determine the motives for the different features of the work, but Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, which was addressed to the churches of Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium and Lystra, recounts the fact that it was by reason of sickness that he at first entered their district and preached to them (Gal. 4:13). Perhaps he had intended to remain near the sea but when attacked by some malady, perhaps that "stake in the flesh" which was his constant physical enemy, he betook himself to the higher regions of the interior to escape the danger of the low malarial coast. This would explain the implication that it was not originally his purpose to visit them but that incidents connected with his physical condition had led to his life among them.

In the Synagogue.

Proceeding northward, Paul and Barnabas came, after a journey of ninety miles from Perga, to Antioch, the chief city of Pisidia. This district was included in southern Galatia, as has been abundantly proved by Professor Ramsey, and it was to these churches rather than to a group in the far north that the epistle to the Galatians was written. Antioch had become a Roman colony under Augustus and was a city of considerable importance. Arriving here the two evangelists at once prepared to meet the Jewish community. This was done by visiting the synagogue on the Sabbath. They knew that the Jews of the city would be present on that occasion. They recognized themselves as ambassadors to the Gentiles, but they felt not only the obligation by the privilege of speaking first to their own brethren.

In a company of that kind two strangers could not fail to be noticed, especially since they were probably dressed in the garb of Palestine. Men who came from the holy city would be sure to awaken interest in the minds of their brethren in the remoter districts, and it was natural that they should be asked to speak at the appropriate time after the more formal parts of the service, such as the reading of the law and the prophets was finished. At that moment the elders in charge of the synagogue service called upon them to speak if they desired.

Paul's Address.

Then Paul arose and with that peculiar gesture, which is several times noted in connection with his public addresses, began to speak. It was the very opportunity he desired. We do not know what the lesson of the day may have been. If the date could be determined, it would still be possible to learn just what had been the prescribed reading of the law and the prophets, for the calendar of the Jewish synagogue has been preserved through all the centuries. But it is clear that any sections of the Old Testament would suggest to so well informed and active a mind as Paul's the great redemptive facts of God's work among that people which had prepared for the coming of the Master. He, therefore, took up the review of the history of Israel and showed that as a climax to that history Jesus had come into the world to be the Prince and Savior.

No one who reads this address of Paul and compares it with the defense of Stephen (Acts 7) can fail to be struck by the similarity. Stephen had reviewed the history to give point to his charge that they had been unfaithful to the very purposes of God manifested through all those centuries. Paul, with less hostile intent but rather with the purpose of showing how naturally that previous experience of the nation led up to and demanded the coming of Jesus, went over the same territory. The influence of Stephen's preaching upon Paul is not easily missed. Perhaps it was one of the strongest formative forces in his life.

Effects of Paul's Words.

The address of Paul in the synagogue is full of most significant utterances, especially his emphasis upon the death and resurrection of the Lord and the apostolic witness of these events. But instead of issuing in a condemnation of his listeners, he appropriately closed with an appeal to them to accept the program of the Messiah whom God had long ago promised but who had been manifested only in their times. By appeals to the Old Testament and especially to the Book of Psalms he emphasized the necessity of their submission to the will of God as it was thus clearly revealed in the events of their history.

The effects of Paul's address were various. Some were already convinced, others questioned, and some were hostile. They went out to discuss the matter in every home and gathering place. The week that followed was one of busy conference and argument, and on the following Sabbath a great concourse of Jews gathered to hear what Paul would say. He and his companion spoke courageously and with full conviction of the great facts of the gospel. But it was increasingly apparent that they could not win the majority of the Jews to their views. When this became evident they boldly announced that their preaching, though first intended for the Jewish people was not to stop with them, and that now, since many of them manifested so little interest in the great questions of life and duty for which their whole history should have been preparing them, the apostles felt justified in turning to give attention to that waiting group, the Gentiles, who would listen with larger reverence and more definite purpose.

Driven Forth.

The mission in Antioch had by no means failed, but it had stirred up hostile elements against the apostles and they were soon compelled to leave the place. But not until the church was established and the foundations of a Christian community securely laid. When Paul and Barnabas finally left the city, thrust out by mob violence, they went on to Iconium, about eighty miles to the southeast, confident that the seed they had sown would grow into a harvest and that no persecution could permanently daunt the hearts of those faithful men and women who had given their hearts to the Lord. Thus the faith took root in the soil of Asia Minor, in a new province far to the west of those cities where Paul had labored in his earlier years. And in these regions some of the most remarkable experiences of the early church were later recorded.

PRAYER MEETING

By Silas Jones

OUR INHERITANCE IN CHRIST.

Topic, May 5. Eph. 1:1-14.

For the next eight weeks our studies will be in the book of Ephesians. These studies will test our ability to appreciate the truth apart from its controversial uses. "The Ephesian letter is positive and constructive, not polemical or even distinctly corrective." Increase of gratitude in the heart, not greater skill in the art of theological warfare, is to be sought in the study of Ephesians.

The Eternal Purpose.

While the scientist and the philosopher are debating whether there is any purpose discernable in nature and history plain men and women in the churches are acting vigorously on the assumption that there is such a purpose and that they have some knowledge of what it is. They are not at all aware that their assumption savors of presumption. In fact, they are astonished that any one should be surprised at it. If you ask them why they are walking with certain step where the wise fear to go, they will tell you that the eternal purpose of God respecting men has been revealed in Christ. They will admit that theologians have often tried to explain the ways of God only to make them darker. But they insist that man has sufficient knowledge of God for the guidance of life. God is love, hence all that he does is a manifestation of love. Man can trust him in the hour of direct need.

"Thou wilt not leave us in the dust:
Thou madest man, he knows not why,
He thinks he was not made to die;
And thou hast made him: thou art just."

Ideas of man's destiny toward which ancient thought was groping are the property of the uneducated in the church. In so far as the church has become Christian, it has banished from its teaching ideas of retribution which had their origin in the minds of ignorant and brutish men. The Christian believes that God holds men accountable for their deeds, but he does not represent the God of our Lord Jesus Christ as a monster of cruelty.

Redemption.

A part of our Christian inheritance is the conviction that God cares not only for the good people but also for the bad and that his love is signally displayed in the making of bad men into good men. A part of this conviction is that the best condition of society today is but a prophecy of what humanity will be when God's purpose is fully realized. All the institutions of a Christian society are therefore redemptive. The school is established that deliverance may be had from superstition and the fears and misunderstandings that go with ignorance. The state is putting less emphasis on its political functions and is devoting more of its energies to developing its resources—material and spiritual. And the church, let us hope, is becoming more and more an agency of redemption. No theory of the atonement will save the world. The church has quarreled a great deal about schemes of redemption. It may be doubted whether any of its theories ever saved a soul. But the belief that through Christ there is redemption has saved millions. We have no right to ask scholars that they cease trying to understand the message of God in Christ in all its aspects and we must not imagine that we are very wise because some of their conclusions do not suit our notions. Plain people can be just as foolish as scholars. Let us be modest. But I am sure that the love of Christ in the heart and going forth in wisely directed efforts to benefit the sinful is now, has been, and will be the saving power of the church. It is our privilege to be dogmatic on this point. This kind of dogmatism we inherit with our Christianity. What the Lord can do without the help of his people it is unprofitable to discuss. It is our duty to let the world know what he can do through willing disciples.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

LIFE LESSONS FOR ME FROM THE BOOK OF ISAIAH.

Topic, May 1, 1909, Isaiah 6:1-9.

To enter into the spirit of these remarkable nine verses of Isaiah one should be to some extent familiar with his style. Someone has most aptly called it, "rapt seraphic fire." The term fits splendidly our present lesson. Isaiah was one of those marvelous combinations of many gifts which the world does not often see. He was a great statesman and a social reformer. But he was also, almost uniquely, a seer of visions and a dreamer of dreams. And with this was combined in a high degree the literary power to depict his visions.

The Call.

Our lesson for study is one of the sources from which we get our idea of one's being "called to the ministry." It shows that there is such a thing, real in human life. For if ever man was called to the service of God, Isaiah certainly was the man. Although he allows his imagination to richly adorn this, the most important of his life, the deep religious experience he undergoes comes out clear and strong. It contains two elements, in the light of which we do not wonder at the fact that his personality stamped itself indelibly upon Israel. The two are:

I. His Attitude Toward God.

Isaiah's attitude toward God had itself two sides. One was his thought of God's character. His words seemed to be imperfect vessels, conveying inadequately his thought. In the word "Holiness" he grasps for the character of the infinite God. "And one cried unto another and said, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of Hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory." The other side of his attitude toward God is the sense of his own smallness and sinfulness beside Him. True greatness has as one of its essentials humility, and Isaiah was thus great. He is not fit to see God. "Then said I, Woe is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips: for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts." The other element in Isaiah's call was his

II. Willingness to Go.

This willingness to go also had its two sides. Isaiah must first be sure that God had chosen him, and that he was fit to go. He had to "get right with God." In verse seven he is lifted up and some spiritual change takes place in him by which he is made a co-worker with God. "And he laid it upon my mouth and said, Lo, this hath touched thy lips; and thine iniquity is taken away and thy sin purged." When this had occurred he became a religious dynamo and the call passed over from God to himself, a call to go. "Then said I, Here am I; send me." No thought was given to the material consequences. Isaiah had aristocratic connections who probably objected vigorously to his calling and his radical acts in the streets of Jerusalem. When a young preacher of the south took up his work his land-owning kith and kin sardonically said, "Spoil a good farmer and make a mighty poor preacher." And now in memory of him, in the window of a great church, an angel, weeping, bends above a broken tomb, and an old white-bearded citizen sits in the rustic porchway of a village inn and says of his brief but God sent life, "He was a meteor that shot across the sky." If God should call you, what would you do?

Campaigning for the Boys

A. W. Conner's New Form of Christian Service.

By A. W. Taylor.

Most pastors are struggling with the "boy problem." The Bible School finds it difficult to hold him and he deserts the church services in large numbers. This is a man's epoch religiously and we are at the dawn of it. Every fourth person is a young man between the ages of twelve and thirty-five years. If we are to win the men to the church it must be at sometime within this period and experience abundantly proves that it must largely be while the boys are yet in their teens. About one-third of these make up one-fifth of the church membership.

In other words, out of every 100 church members about twenty are men and boys between the ages of twelve and thirty-five while of that same 100 it will be found that thirty-seven are men and boys and sixty-three are women and girls. There are at least 13,000,000 men and boys between the ages of twelve and thirty-five that are not church members. Fully one-half of these are attendants on church services with more or less regularity but generally with less. This leaves the astonishing total of at least 6,000,000 young fellows who seldom enter a church door. They are lost between the ages of twelve and eighteen, the most impressionable time of their lives religiously. Where are they? Here are some figures that will give a clue, a terrible clue, to where many of them are in the great cities at least. In Chicago, in two hours time one Sunday evening 1002 were observed entering one low saloon and on that same evening 17,000 were counted in seventeen of the lowest theaters of that same city.

A. W. Conner is a great-souled Christian man with the spirit of a missionary. His own only son was taken from him at the dawn of young manhood. He saved his heart from breaking by turning to other boys like his own. He loves the boys and they instinctively love him and vote him the greatest man they know. He has the art of catching their ears and enlisting them in any proposition he proposes. He amuses them and teaches them and fills them with an ambition to be worthy men and do worthy things as boys. The discipline in the schools noticeably improves while Conner is in town. He is the one topic of conversation on the play grounds and in the homes. He talks to the boys alone at the close of school hours and one marvels at how he gets a hundred at once to listen as they do. In the evening he talks to the friends of the boys, which includes everybody worth mentioning, and searches the hearts of the fathers and exposes the scolding souls of the boy haters and keeps everybody laughing while he discovers new wonders in boy possibility to people who have boys and thought they knew them. At the close of the ten days' campaign he gives all the boys an initiation that clinches the lessons of the afternoon hours and makes "Princely Knights" of them. The final evening is given to a play which dramatically sets forth the fact that every boy is a prince. The church provides a banquet for all boys who "make good" and it is a gladness to the eyes to see the little gentlemen around the festive board. The church is left with a live boys' club on their hands and the desire of the pastor's heart has the beginning of its fulfilment.

Mr. Conner makes such terms that any live church can support the campaign and his work is of such merit that he ought to have more requests than he has time to fill. Write him at Indianapolis, Ind., 413 Majestic Bldg. He will do you good.

Professor Garvin Replies

My dear Doctor Willett:—I wish to thank you for your candid review of my book, and still more for the privilege you have granted me of replying or of offering further considerations. This is something unusual and shows clearly your love of truth and fairness.

Any misunderstanding of the book, I admit, may fairly be considered a fault of the book, for if it were better written, it would be better understood. Yet you know how difficult it is to write so that no one will misunderstand. Even Paul did not succeed in doing this, as is abundantly shown by the numerous commentaries. Generally speaking, perception is affected by the content of the mind. This is more fully true of the perception of thought than of that of physical objects.

You say of the book, "It is an essay on the nature and evils of sacramentalism in the Christian church." Again, "It overstates its thesis attempting to prove more than is possible or necessary in its contention against sacraments." Again, "It fails of effectiveness in its inclusion of too many topics unrelated to its purpose." Beginning with the last statement I will try to explain. The book was written under the title, Outline of Biblical Theology. By the advice of others I was induced to change the title after the manuscript was put into the hands of the printer. But the one the book now bears is not less comprehensive. The criticism I expected is, that very important themes have been omitted. There should be a chapter on prayer, on the answer to prayer, on worship, on what is commonly called divine service, etc. I should gladly have treated these subjects, but certain considerations seemed to forbid it.

I did not and do not think of the book as an essay on sacramentalism, nor is its thesis the evil of sacramentalism. The thesis I had in mind is, God's purpose of the ages is that man shall be conformed to the likeness of His Son, with the corollaries: (1) Salvation is the realization of God's purpose with man; (2) Whatever is in harmony with God's purpose or conducive to its realization is right; (3) Whatever is out of harmony with God's purpose or hinders its realization is wrong. I hold that the above is the fundamental proposition of the Bible message to man, and that if Jesus did not overstate it when he said, Ye shall be perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect, it cannot be overstated. It might seem that it would have been better to have stated and considered this thesis with its corollaries and to have left everything else out. But the minds of people generally are filled with sacramentalism and for this very reason there prevails a false conception of sin, a false conception of forgiveness, a false conception of righteousness, a false conception of the atonement. These false conceptions must be removed if the truth with regard to God's purpose is to find lodgment in the mind and control the life. The book offers help towards the removing of these errors. I wish such help were unnecessary, but it seems that more should have been given instead of less.

You do not say what the impossible thing is that the book attempts to prove, but it seems to be what you call the startling contention that only self-washing was known and practiced in New Testament times. You say of this, "Here we are unable to follow the author's argument." This no doubt means that you think the reasons given do not justify the conclusion. Very well. What then? If some blundering fellow should try to prove that the sun does not move around the earth, and his arguments should be found inconclusive, would that justify the affirmation that the sun does go around the earth? The author was under no obligation to prove that modern baptism was not practiced in primitive times. He was only offering kindly help to those who may wish to find their way out of real and admitted darkness into the true light. But the man who says that some form of modern baptism was practiced by the apostles is morally bound to confirm his assertion with sufficient evidence. I greatly desire to see some competent man try to do this. Indeed for a long time I have been unable to understand how the Disciples can close their eyes to the necessity of doing this. If some persons make a selection from the opinions and practices of the sects around them and then arrange these opinions and practices according to their own fancy and then stand forth as the restorers of the ancient order of things, we could not commend their procedure however earnest and zealous they might be. If a man proposes to restore the primitive ordinances, he must first show that there were primitive ordinances. A man who proposes to restore the primitive ordinances and the primitive practices must assume that the primitive practices were in harmony with the primitive ordinances, which would mean to such a man, that all the practices of the first century were in harmony with the divine will. To make such an assumption is to close the eyes not only to the plain reading of the Bible, but also to a most patent and appalling fact, viz., the perversity of humanity. This is said to impress upon the Disciples the necessity of doing without further delay the critical work which their position demands. What my book says about baptism cannot be set aside by a magisterial wave of the hand. The burden of proof is on the man who affirms that Jesus commanded and the apostles practiced dipping. If he succeeds in proving this he will have established the validity of sacramentalism and done some other things that will surprise him when he sees them. If he fails he will be found to be a perverter of the truth, an advocate of a false theory of salvation. Is there no Disciple today who is willing to discuss in a manly way what he calls God's plan of salvation?

Befogged

Our old friend, W. T. Moore, is befogged and wonderfully mixed up and, he says, even "flabbergasted," and that too in the very year we are going to Pittsburg to celebrate a declaration of principles, and in some way he seems to think that the design of baptism, as it is called, has some connection with it, and that it was settled, if anything ever was settled, by "our fathers." This talk about "our fathers" settling anything is occasionally heard from Kentucky as well as from Missouri, and will get a looking into one of these days in a way that will fire up all the settlers of such things.

The capital error is in settling. Now let it be stated broadly that the Bible cannot be held to settle any question which it does not first entertain, and those who claim that it has settled any question must first show that it entertains that question, that same veritable question. It would not be amiss to celebrate this declaration also when you get to Pittsburg, if it is old enough. It will save a lot of controversy to keep it in mind. There is another principle equally important, that is to determine the relative genealogy of an idea and its practice. In all such cases the deed, the practice came first and the doctrine afterwards. Christ yielded to be baptized when it was in practice, and against John's protest, and when it could not have had reference to the remission of Christ's sins.

John prophesied a higher baptism from Jesus which he craved for himself, and said that as baptism in water was characteristic of his own mission, the Holy Spirit should be characteristic of Christ's, and in the first chapter of Acts Christ quotes this saying of John's, and draws the same antithesis; and Christ himself did not baptize, and Paul disclaims that there was any baptism in his commission, though he was himself also baptized.

Having supposed as we once did that Christ coupled baptism with the commission, it was easy to believe that he meant baptism when he spoke to Nicodemus, but we have only to put in the facts and the thing falls in ruins. That is, Christ said to Nicodemus: "Though I do not myself baptize anyone, yet it is essential that you be baptized in order to be saved." And by just so much would Christ be less than a full saviour. Doctor Gates has intrenched himself where he cannot be driven out: "Ye shall know a tree by its fruits."

When the commission in Mark's Gospel was discredited, it threw suspicion on that in Matthew, which has fallen, in my opinion, under still greater discredit. As for Luke and John, they would be repudiated for writing a gospel and giving the commission and then leaving out baptism as they did. The doctrine grew out of the practice and followed it. A fiat remission of sins on an external program instead of an internal reality collapses before a method that is of the highest authority to a thinking mind. "Ye shall know them by their fruits." Doctor Moor's resort to a preposition and to Peter in Acts, and to Peter's Epistle, where he seems to be a repeater shows that the defence of Walter Scott's contribution to our distinctive plea is about to peter out.

J. S. HUGHES.

Creeds and the Denominations

In the Christian Century of March 20, Dr. W. T. Moore, writing of "The Tyranny of Opinion," quotes Alexander Campbell as asking "Are not the opinions of men placed upon the same footing with the commandments of God in all the creeds in the Christian World?" And as answering "They are; very generally if not universally so."

Possibly Mr. Campbell was not correctly reported. It seems incredible that he would have made a statement so grossly unfair, and as to things essential to salvation wholly untrue.

The chief doctrines of all the great creeds of the church, ancient or modern, are either quoted verbatim from the sacred Scriptures, or supported by long lists of references thereto. The Protestant creeds of 1553 and 1571 affirm that "The Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation, so that whatever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought necessary to salvation." This was the one article upon which John Wesley founded his societies, and it is yet one of the first in the Methodist "Articles of Religion."

The convention which framed the Westminster Confession of Faith adopted unanimously at its first meeting, a resolution to "consider nothing as of faith which is not clearly taught by the word of God." The Baptists have always affirmed that "The Word of God is our only rule of faith and practice." John Calvin's famous doctrine of predestination was taken from the writings of Saint Paul, especially his Roman letter. If any disciple think Calvinism wholly "unscriptural," a mere "human speculation," let him challenge some well informed Calvinist to a logical and theological duel, with Bibles as weapons, and he will speedily bump into the surprise of his life. It is said that Thomas Campbell himself never gave up his belief in the doctrine of predestination. That in his earlier days he had become saturated with the doctrines of Calvin; and while in his later years, after fresh investigation, and under the influence of his son and his associate reformers, he was persuaded to yield a sort of assent to their more liberal and humane views, yet he was accustomed to state that he had become so fascinated by that doctrine of fatalism that he was unable to break the chains of its merciless logic.

That conditions in the church of a hundred years ago were very far from ideal may not be doubted. But that Thomas Campbell landed in a "Darkest America" where "Human creeds were of supreme authority; the ministers took their creeds into the pulpits and took their texts from the creeds, and their sermons were expositions of the creeds rather than of Scriptures. The people were taught that the Bible was a dead letter which they could not understand unless the clergy gave them the key," may safely be classed as wild exaggeration in which there is little if any truth.

That even in our own country "Darkness covered the earth, and gross darkness the people" until the Star of Bethany arose, by whose light the Bible was re-discovered, and the real apostolic church was awakened from a Rip Van Winkle sleep of seventeen centuries, is nonsense. But, surprising as it seems, a good deal of just such absurd stuff is found in the writings of men, who are, or have been prominent among the Disciples.

The Christian Evangelist points out that while the Disciples reject written creeds as of authority they do not reject the evangelical doctrines of the creeds. The point is very well taken. In fact the Disciples do not differ materially, in either faith or theology, from other denominations of Protestants.

There is nothing to show that the spread of Christianity has been, or is hindered by its creeds. On the contrary they have been, in some ways, of great value, and even essential to its life and progress. F. M. WILEY.

The Two Dispensations

Editor Century: In your editorial on "Lord's Day," March 13 issue, the use of the word "obsolete" suggests that discussion on the change of days is closed by the change of two of our vowels, in recent things. Here is the conclusion of the whole matter:

First Covenant (Jewish. Sabbath Incorporated)—Obsolete.

Second Covenant (Christian. Lord's Day Incorporated)—Absolute.

Does It Work?

We are a Bible people. We stand upon the New Testament. The Gospels were written for evangelistic purposes. Paul wrote his letters to the newly evangelized communities. We owe the Scriptures to missionary work and fervor. Their best defense is a wholesome practice of them. Missionary work is an apologetic that has never been answered by doubt or atheism. Jesus appealed to his works when he thought men might doubt his words. Paul's last appeal was to his own sacrificial evangelism in the name of his Lord. The Salvation Army thrived upon epithets and persecution because no power could defeat its good works. Roman

The Price of Goodness

The goodness of Uneeda Biscuit is not a matter of cost to you. It is assured by the careful selection of the best materials for Uneeda Biscuit; by the skill of experts who bake nothing but Uneeda Biscuit; by the perfect cleanliness and appliances of great bakeries built expressly to bake Uneeda Biscuit; and, finally, by the perfect protection of a package that excludes all dust and moisture.

All this has resulted in quality out of all proportion to the price.

Catholicism maintains itself in spite of its medievalism because of its philanthropic and missionary work. We will be irresistable when we say "If you cannot believe us for our words' sake, then believe us for our works' sake."

The American Christian Missionary Society can site facts to prove its claim on the generosity of a people who have a message for America. They can also show where the need is and with what economy they will administer of our stewardship. But best of all they can appeal to the "works" of the preaching at the hands of their missionaries. They have baptized 150,000 persons and organized 3,350 churches and the average cost has been much less than that of any of our local churches in doing the work on their own local fields.

The pioneers were all home missionaries. They went hither and thither evangelizing and founding new churches. We are now a great body and organized work alone can cope with the needs or handle the resources. The American Missionary Society keeps up this evangelistic and pioneer work of the fathers. There are yet new communities and there are many weak churches. They know where they are and how much they need. Put funds into their hands as an investment. They will return large profits.

Special to Sunday-school Superintendents

All Sunday-schools that have not sent in their offerings for Home Missions, are requested to make an offering in connection with the church offering to be made Sunday, May 2.

In order to have your Sunday-school listed with the Honor Schools of the Brotherhood of the Centennial year, it will be necessary to have this offering in by June 1. Immediate attention is asked to this important matter.

Pittsburg News

There were twenty-seven present at the Monday meeting, and among these quite a number of strangers. In fact as we draw near the Centennial our Monday morning meetings increase in interest. If by any chance the regular appointee fails there is always someone present to fill up the hour with some interesting address. W. C. Pearce happened in on us this Monday and spoke on Adult Bible Class work in a most pleasing and profitable way. Following this was a half hour devoted to asking questions, and the way the questions came in indicated great interest in adult work. In fact our churches here in Western Pennsylvania are falling in line with the general movement all over the country and some very large and interesting classes have been formed. Notably a woman's class at Charleroi numbering eighty-three, which is the largest class of women in Western Pennsylvania.

Evangelistic report for two weeks was as follows:

Duquesne, 14 confessions and 5 otherwise.
McKeesport, 1 by statement.
Hazelwood, 4 confessions.
Herron Hill, 2 confessions.
Knoxville, 2 confessions and 13 otherwise.
Squirrel Hill, 2 confessions.
Turtle Creek, 2 confessions.
Johnstown, 1 confession and 4 by letter.
Charleroi, 1 confession.
Beaver, 1 confession.

Oliver W. Stewart holds an all day meeting at the Fourth Ave. Baptist Church, Thursday, April 22.

A fine rally of Bible School workers was held at the Central in the evening with President Miner Lee Bates making the address. The Hazelwood Church took the flag for the largest attendance, and the Squirrel Hill Church took another for the most miles traveled.

W. R. Warren, the Centennial Secretary, left in the evening for New York and will return Friday.

Notes from the Foreign Society

A. F. Hensey, Bolenge, Africa, will reach Bedford, O., May 18 on his first furlough. The church at Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, O., supports him. He will preach for this church June 6, and will attend the commencement exercises of the College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky., in June. He was graduated from this institution.

Last week the Foreign Society received two gifts of $500 each on the Annuity Plan, one from a friend in Maryland, and one from a friend in California.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the twenty-one days of April amounted to $28,486, a gain over the corresponding twenty-one days of 1908 of $4,430. The receipts from the churches as churches amounted to $23,744, a gain of $3,254. There was also a gain of forty-nine contributing churches. The total receipts for the year amount to $109,837, a gain of $29,804. The churches as churches have given $72,134, a gain of $9,276. It is hoped that the gain will continue to increase until the close of the year.

The prospects for Children's Day, the first Sunday in June, were never before so bright. It is to be a real Centennial event. It is believed that the children will give $100,000 this year.

The brethren in the state of Oregon are moving forward for the new boat to float on the upper Congo in Africa. They are to provide this boat for Dr. R. J. Dye and his associates, and it is to be known as the "SS. Oregon." George C. Ritchie, Newberg, Ore., who is leading in this enterprise, reports cash and good pledges amounting to $10,566. He expects to report the whole amount secured soon. He is a "live wire" and the friends in Oregon are a rope of "live wires." How Oregon does grow! In 1893 the total receipts from that state were only $199. Last year they were $3,475. Look out for this year!

Third District Michigan Convention

A two days' convention of the Third District of the M. C. M. S. was held with the Lyon Street Church of Christ, Grand Rapids, Mich., March 31 and April 1, 1909. While the number of delegates in attendance was not so large as could be desired, there was a marked advance in this respect. However, the churches of the district seem to have little interest in each other. Something should be done to cultivate a spirit of brotherhood and co-operation. Such a spirit is a crying need of the district.

The program was full of good things. Addresses were made by Rev. F. P. Arthur, Cor. Sec. of the state, Mrs. A. L. Benedict of Belding, Miss Mary E. Ballard of Grand Rapids, C. A. Preston of Ionia, A. Per Lee of Grand Rapids, Rev. G. N. Stevenson of Muir, Rev. J. W. Curch of Ballards, Rev. O. E. Tomes of Ann Arbor and Dr. Royal J. Dye of Bolenge. The address by Brother Stevenson on "What the Pulpit has a Right to Expect of the Pew" was of exceptional merit. The convention requested that it be published.

Wednesday evening, Brother Arthur gave a stirring address on "The Call of Lansing." He showed conclusively that steps should be taken to establish a church in the state capital. The following resolution was unanimously adopted: "Resolved that we ask the churches of the Third District to raise one thousand dollars for the Lansing work, the matter of detail to be left to a committee from the State and District Boards."

Brother Arthur was followed by Dr. Dye with a stereopticon lecture which held the audience spell bound. Dr. Dye is one of the truly great men of our Brotherhood and of the Kingdom. That he is a representative of the Third District is a fact of which we are justly proud. Tuesday afternoon was given over to the C. W. B. M. The president, Mrs. B. C. Kimes being absent on account of illness in her home, Mrs. F. P. Arthur was called to the chair and presided with dignity and grace. Devotionals were led by Mrs. Morly of the Fifth Avenue Church and a reading rendered by Mrs. John Hansen. Addresses were given by Mrs. G. W. Moore of Ionia, and Miss Ida Vandenberge and a conference on the general work by Mrs. Arthur. The Thursday evening address was by Brother Tomes on "The Larger Brotherhood." We hope Brother Tomes will visit us again. Sister Nanna Crozier, on account of illness, was not able to speak, but Brother Tomes generously consented to serve as her substitute, and gave an interesting and instructive stereopticon lecture on the Field work of the C. W. B. M.

Abundant provisions were made by the church for the material comfort of all in attendance. Brother E. B. Barnes, the pastor had made thoughtful preparation for the royal entertainment of the delegates. At the church the ladies served with credit to themselves and in their homes, entertained to the great delight of their guests. The next convention will be held with the Belding Church some time next fall.

Kansas Christian Ministerial Institute

We met at Manhattan, April 13-15, with W. T. McClain and his hard-working congregation, who housed us in the basement of their new $20,000 church building, which when completed, will be one of the most commodious in the state.

It will not be possible in the brief space allotted me to give a detailed account of the Institute, but must say right here that each and every paper was worthy of special mention.

The leading feature as a matter of course, was the line of addresses delivered by F. D. Power, of Washington, D. C. These were all highly enjoyed and appreciated by the Institute. The themes were, "The Story of a Thirty-three Years' Pastorate," "The Old Gospel for the New Times," "The Mastery of Jesus," and "The Standard of Appeal in Religion." Brother Power's scholarship, experience and wide reading and travel fitted him in an eminent degree to deal with such themes. He was given a very attentive hearing, many of the pastors of the town being present most of the time.

The discussion of the union of Baptists and Disciples was a very interesting part of the program. The first paper was read by Thos. S. Young, pastor of the First Baptist

FOOD FACTS
What an M. D. Learned.

A prominent Georgia physician went through a food experience which he makes public:

"It was my own experience that first led me to advocate Grape-Nuts food and I also know, from having prescribed it to convalescents and other weak patients, that the food is a wonderful rebuilder and restorer of nerve and brain tissue, as well as muscle. It improves the digestion and sick patients always gain just as I did in strength and weight very rapidly.

"I was in such a low state that I had to give up my work entirely, and went to the mountains of this state, but two months there did not improve me; in fact, I was not quite as well as when I left home.

"My food did not sustain me and it became plain that I must change. Then I began to use Grape-Nuts food and in two weeks I could walk a mile without fatigue, and in five weeks returned to my home and practice, taking up hard work again. Since that time I have felt as well and strong as I ever did in my life.

"As a physician who seeks to help all sufferers, I consider it a duty to make these facts public."

Trial 10 days on Grape-Nuts, when the regular food does not seem to sustain the body, will work miracles.

"There's a Reason."

Look in pkgs. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WITH THE WORKERS

Church, Topeka, and the review by Geo. E. Lyon, of Topeka, our State Secretary. It was decided to publish these papers in full in pamphlet form and sell them at twenty-five cents each until the expenses were met. This will be done by the State Board.

In his paper, Brother Young considered the difficulties in the way of union, dwelling somewhat at length upon them, while Brother Lyon emphasized the desirability and possibility of union between the two bodies. I advise everyone to obtain a copy of the pamphlet. Address Geo. E. Lyon, Topeka.

On the last evening Brother McClain and the church gave a banquet to all visitors, of which there were many, and the after-dinner speeches were greatly enjoyed. Among these were Brother Power, Sister J. E. McDaniel, and William E. Irelan, now of Monterey, Mex. But for years a resident and preacher in Kansas. It was a real pleasure to meet him once more.

The new officers are, L. M. Wiles, president; J. W. Carpenter, vice president; O. L. Cook, secretary and treasurer. Executive committee: Geo. E. Lyon, Frank E. Mallory, and W. S. Lowe.

The next meeting will be held with the church at Junction City, where we have a new work under way led by John Williams.

There ought to be a more general attendance of the preachers upon the Institute. The attendance this year, while not quite up to that of last year yet sixty who attended last year did not do so this year. The attendance is too sectional.

W. S. Lowe, Secretary.

Chicago Church Notes

C. G. Kindred is in his pulpit every Sunday but is not as strong as formerly.

George F. Chandler is back at the University again and visited our ministers' meeting on a recent Monday.

The Metropolitan Church has just closed a meeting under the leadership of Evangelist Brown. He was sent to them by Charles Reign Scoville.

Mrs. Tobey is drilling a chorus of fifty children to sing in the Evanston Church on Sunday evening, April 25. These large chorus choirs gathered from different groups in the church community have rendered most excellent service to the church.

The West End Church has been giving special attention to their music. Special musical services have been given recently. The West End choir is to furnish the music at the rally of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society.

A. W. Taylor is now duly installed at Irving Park and his family have been moved to the city. A reception was held for him on a recent Friday evening. The church at Eureka showed their love of their departing pastor in no uncertain way. The departing pastor was given a purse of four hundred dollars. The business men on the street who were not members of the church made up a purse and bought Mr. Taylor a fine railroad watch.

The Armitage Avenue Church is prospering under the ministry of J. K. Arnot. A series of good entertainments is revealing the presence of a large English speaking constituency. It is the only English speaking church in almost a mile of thickly populated territory. They rent the building vacated by the Norwegian Free Church. This building and lot has been offered for sale for four thousand dollars.

Two of our Chicago churches are without pastors with rumors of more resignations in the air. It is trite to remark it, but no one realizes the problem of propagating religion in Chicago unless they have engaged in it for a time. Our greatest need has always been men. Few can endure the fearful physical strain. Few can endure the slow grind which makes the establishment of a church the work of the generation. Our present ministry will measure up with that of any denomination in the city in education and ability. The task, however, is beyond the limits of endurance for many men.

The meeting at the Sheffield Avenue Church is proving a great uplift. Large mid-week audiences have been secured and ten additions to the church resulted the first week. Chas. Bloom of Newman, Illinois, is doing the preaching. W. F. Shaw, the pastor, fills the Sunday appointments of the visiting pastor.

A. W. Taylor and O. F. Jordan have collaborated on getting a set of lantern slides on the work among the negroes at the Southern Christian Institute, Edwards, Mississippi. The Eureka Church furnished the material for making the slides. They are being presented to the C. W. B. M. at Indianapolis.

O. F. Jordan whom someone the other day called "a pocket edition of Chicago" is spending a few days on a farm near Gifford, Indiana. He is resting after his three weeks' meeting in the Evanston Church. Incidentally, he says, he is exercising that famous camera of his in taking bust portraits of the old cow. The church board at Evanston voted for a new building last Sunday. It is likely the old building will be wrecked at once and the new one started in June. The Evanston Church is growing in the substantial elements of strength.

The presence of George Adam Smith at the University of Chicago this summer will doubtless attract more Disciples than have attended the University for many a summer. George Adam Smith is regarded by many today as the formost Old Testament scholar of the world. Other strong visiting professors giving courses at the University this summer are Professor Woelfkin, of Rochester and Dr. Mullins, of Louisville. The Disciples who attend the summer quarter find the courses of our own teachers, Dr. Willett, Dr. Gates and Dr. Ames of a standard that is up to the best scholarly ideals of the university.

A Call to Special Prayer

Sunday, May 2, 1909, is the time appointed by the Brotherhood and generally accepted by the churches for the annual offering for Home Missions—the preaching of the gospel in the needy places in the United States and Canada. Most of the churches will take the offering upon that day. Thousands of congregations will fix their attention upon the great cause of American evangelization, and hundreds of thousands of the disciples of Christ will join in making an offering for this great work.

Some churches have, however, for their own good reasons planned to take the offering upon another day. Others, alas, who have not yet seen the vision, or who have not entered into a full appreciation of the meaning have not lined up with the working churches heretofore, may not line up this year. A great brotherhood like ours ought to do things unitedly. If every church cannot unite in the great Home Missionary Offering to be made on May 2, certainly every church in the brotherhood can unite in special prayer for the extension of the Kingdom in America.

The Home Board requests, therefore, that in all churches without regard to whether the offering is taken or not, a special prayer be offered Sunday, May 2, for the general cause of Home Missions; for the workers in the field; for the Board of Directors; for the Secretaries; and especially for the great body of scattered disciples who are waiting anxiously for the help which ought to be readily granted to them for the purpose of establishing the cause in the frontier places.

We believe that every church will unite in this great prayer service upon the day appointed, and we sincerely trust that even those who are not heartily in sympathy with the work of missionary societies may join with us in a prayer for the evangelization of our own country upon that day.

The Students' Ministerial Association at Canton, Mo., was fortunate in having as lecturer, April 13, W. H. Cannon, who discussed with much force the subject of "The Preacher at His Work."

The Missouri Education Society is preparing for a strong program during its session at the Missouri Centennial, St. Louis, June 18-23. The committee on speakers met April 17 at Moberly to arrange details.

A copy of the beautiful new catalogue of Hiram College has reached our desk. The college will send a copy to anyone who wishes it upon request. The beautiful illustrations of scenes about Hiram give it value to old students of Hiram.

E. S. Baker of Jackson, Tenn., was with the church at Water Valley, Miss. for a short meeting of four days. There were four baptisms, six by letter and five hundred dollars pledged for the liquidation of the church debt and for improving the building.

Ralls County, Mo., has through its annual convention and co-operation, already realized one of its Centennial aims, viz., the accumulation of a County Student Aid Fund of $500. Work was begun towards this August, 1907. Two men are being helped this year. The money is loaned at three per cent simple interest for four years.

The church at Pawnee City, Nebraska, under the leadership of the pastor, Charles Lawrence Wheeler, is preparing for a great evangelistic expert next month. The meeting is to be led by Wilhite, Tuckerman and wife. The minister reports that the Pawnee Church is making splendid progress along all lines. During the past year all missionary offerings were practically double those of former years.

At the Nelsonville, Ohio Church, a new $14,000 house has been dedicated, about 170 persons added to the membership, the Bible School enrolls about 800 and has averaged since January first 540, and has an average attendance of men in the two men's classes of about 100. A unanimous call has been extended to the minister, Walter Scott Cook, for the fourth year at an increase of salary. The membership is now about 475 and is united and harmonious.

LEARNING THINGS

We are all in the Apprentice Class.

When a simple change of diet brings back health and happiness the story is briefly told. A lady of Springfield, Ill., says:

"After being afflicted for years with nervousness and heart trouble, I received a shock four years ago that left me in such a condition that my life was despaired of.

"I could get no relief from doctors nor from the numberless heart and nerve remedies I tried, because I didn't know that coffee was daily putting me back more than the doctors could put me ahead.

"Finally at the request of a friend I left off coffee and began the use of Postum and against my convictions I gradually improved in health until for the past 6 or 8 months I have been entirely free from nervousness and those terrible sinking, weakening spells of heart trouble.

"My troubles all came from the use of coffee which I had drunk from childhood and yet they disappeared when I quit coffee and took up the use of Postum."

Many people marvel at the effects of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum, but there is nothing marvelous about it—only common sense.

Coffee is a destroyer—Postum is a rebuilder. That's the reason.

Look in pkgs. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WITH THE WORKERS

D. A. Anderson reports twenty-one additions at the Central Church, Denver, April 18.

The Arkansas State Convention will meet at Hot Springs June 8-11. Entertainment is free and low rates on all railroads.

Frank Thompson, Cairo, Ill., writes:—"Six confessions, and two by letter April 11. Church worshiping in a hall, pending the completion of our new building."

The church at St. Thomas, Canada, where G. J. Chapman ministers is in a meeting with home forces. In the first two weeks there were fifteen additions. There have been twenty-six additions since Mr. Chapman began work here January 1.

A beautiful and modern new building was dedicated by the church at North Yakima, Washington, April 18. Immediately after the dedication the church began a meeting under the leadership of Chas. Reign Scoville and his helpers. Morton L. Rose is the minister of this flourishing church.

"The Varneys and Marks" is the title of an attractive announcement made by the new evangelistic company composed of Chas. E. Varney and wife and Oscar J. Marks. The announcemen contains portraits of each member of the company with commendations by such men as Chas. Reign Scoville, W. J. Lhamon, Carl Johann, and others. Mr. and Mrs. Varney may be addressed at Paw Paw, Michigan.

From E. G. Campbell comes the word of the death of Mrs. Hattie Rawson, wife of Myron B. Rawson, one of our retired ministers, whose home is at Wayland, Michigan. Through thirty years Mrs. Rawson has fulfilled with unusual success that difficult and important position of minister's wife, and has by the strength of her personality drawn to herself a host of friends.

The Home Board is asking for $200,000 this year. There are 1,300,000 of us. We preach Christian Union. We believe we have the plea for the whole world. If we believe it as we say we do, why do we not cease our baby-play and do manly things for Jesus Christ our King. $200,000 for the preaching of the gospel? 1,300,000 Christians should be ashamed to give less than a round million for America.

In a personal letter, L. C. Marion, Veedersburg, Ind., who has served long years in the ministry and is not so feeble from age that he can attend church only occasionally, he tells of his joy at the thought that many whom he has led into the Christian life, are now occupying positions of trust and influence in many different callings. Incidentally he speaks of the success of the church at Veedersburg, which is being forced to build larger that it may accommodate its audiences and the Sunday-school.

The First Church of Moline, Ill., was dedicated April 16. O. W. Lawrence, Decatur, Ill., W. B. Clemmer, Rock Island, and S. M. Perkins, Davenport, Ill. had part in the three services which were held, Sunday morning, afternoon and evening. This beautiful new church is a monument to the leadership of R. E. Henry, who about four years ago began the work there under the direction of the churches at Rock Island and Davenport. The church issued a beautiful eight page booklet, containing the picture of the building, the preacher, and the order of service as a souvenir of the occasion.

Mrs. J. J. Taylor sang during the meeting of the church at Little Rock, Arkansas, where the Pastor, W. S. Lockhart, did the preaching. Since Mr. Lockhart began work here last November, there have been five new classes organized in the adult department of the Sunday-school, increasing its attendance by about one hundred. The Pastor's wife teaches a class of seventy. In this time the church has become a Living Link in the Foreign, Home and State Missionary Societies; supporting, J. D. Curtis, Winslow, Ark., P. A. Sherman, Jubbulpore, India. In addition to his other work Mr. Lockhart is delivering a series of lectures at the State University on "Industrial Reform."

E. B. Bagby, minister of the First Church, Fort Smith, Ark., is delivering the following series of Sunday evening sermons:

MUCH NEEDED LESSONS FROM LESSER KNOWN CHARACTERS.

"Luke and Demas, or True and False Friendship."

"Euodia and Syntyche, or Church Quarrels."

"Mary Magdalene, or the Unused Spices."

"John Mark, or the Retrieval of Mistakes."

"Eutychus, or Sleeping in Church."

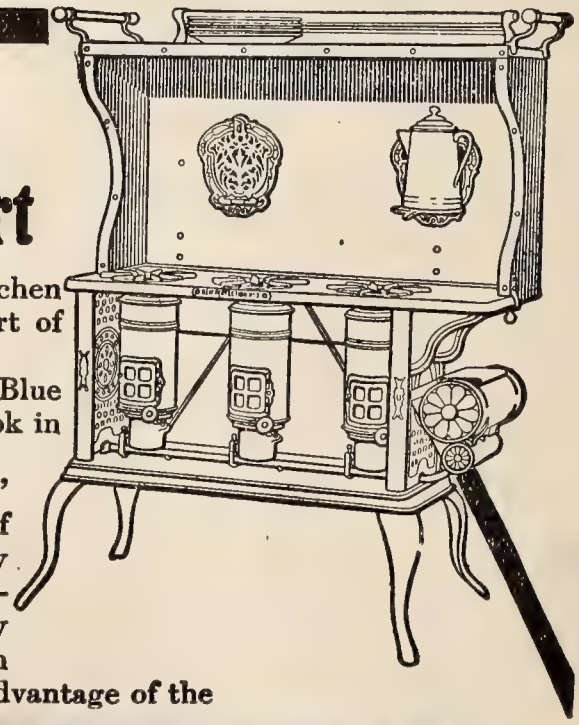
The church at Heppner, Oregon, where J. P. Comder is the minister, has given over $120 to the "Oregon" boat fund. They will reach their apportionment for foreign missions The pastor is organizing a union teacher normal class.

The church at Booneville, Mo., J. B. Weldon, minister, will hold a Centennial Celebration, April 25 to May 2, which is worthy of emulation. The program begins on Sunday with J. H. Garrison, speaking at 11:00 a. m. on "The Unity of the Early Church," and at 8:00 P. M. on, "The Origin and Contention of the Restoration Movement." Monday evening address, A. W. Kokkendorffer, Sedalia, Mo., "The Place of Prayer in the Divine Economy." Tuesday evening, "The Place of the Holy Spirit in the Christian Dispensation," by J. B. Jones, Fulton, Mo.; Wednesday, "Our Use of the Hammer that Builds and does not Knock," by W. J. Lhamon, Bible College, Columbia, Mo.; "Union of Baptist and Disciples," E. B. Wonger, Jefferson City; Friday, "The Restorations Contribution to Religious Progress," by M. A. Hart, Columbia, Mo.; Saturday, "The Restoration and the Religious Life of Missouri," by T. A. Abbott; Sunday, two addresses by P. C. MacFarlane, secretary of the Men's Brotherhood.

G. W. Mills has closed his work at Madisonville, Ohio, and entered upon his labor with the church at Owensville, Ky.

S. B. Moore of the Central Church, Moberly Mo., recently addressed the Friar's Club of the church at Paris, Mo., This church is planning a new building.

L. H. Stine writes that they have recently had five additions to the church at Gulfport, Miss., and cordially invites those coming to that coast to notify him.



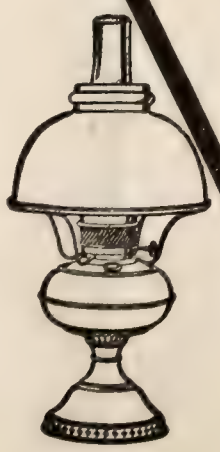
Under the leadership of J. Will Walters, the church at Sullivan, Ill., has paid the final nine hundred dollars on its mortgage, installed an individual communion set, and organized a senior C. E. society in the last few weeks.

From J. N. Jessup, Little Rock, Arkansas we have the word that there were seventeen additions by confession, and seven by letter at the church there April 11. They expect to dedicate their new $60,000 building early in June.

Austin Hunter is assisting W. D. Ward and the church at Rockford, Ill., in a meeting. There were seventeen additions the first week, and good audiences. A men's meeting was held Sunday afternoon, April 18, and a meeting for women the 25th.

From the bulletin of the Central Christian Church, Moberly, Mo., where S. B. White is the minister, we take the following: Easter was surely a glorious day for old Central. 557 in the Bible School. Thus we achieved the largest attendance in the history of our school. Now let us set a goal of 1,000 in the Bible School before the Centennial. There were thirty-three new scholars last Sunday. The Ahinadabs are about to begin a campaign for a century class in ninety days.

Plan for Summer Comfort



Don't add the heat of a kitchen fire to the sufficient discomfort of hot weather.

Use a New Perfection Wick Blue Flame Oil Cook-Stove and cook in comfort.

With a "New Perfection" Oil Stove the preparation of daily meals, or the big weekly "baking," is done without raising the temperature perceptibly above that of any other room in the house. Another great advantage of the

NEW PERFECTION

is its handsome CABINET TOP, which gives it every convenience of the modern steel range. Has an ample top shelf for warming plates and keeping cooked food hot, drop shelves for holding small cooking utensils, and is even fitted with racks for towels. Made in three sizes, and can be had with or without Cabinet Top. If not at your dealer's address our nearest agency.

Elbyn Esson has resigned his charge at Paris, Ill., and accepted a call to the church at Albany, Washington, which is said to be one of the best churches in that state.

President E. C. Sanderson of the Eugene Bible University has been visiting Bible Colleges in the East, and at the same time urging Portland's claim for the National Convention in 1910.

At El Reno, where O. L. Smith is pastor, the church has just closed a successful meeting and is planning the erection of a $30,000 building, the money for which is now mostly collected.

The Moody Institute, and the Moody Church announce a conference on Summer Evangelism and open air work to be held at the Moody Church, May 14-19. All who are interested in this sort of work are invited.

The churches of Southern California are making great reports on their March offering. There will be in this district this year not less than seven Living Link churches; among these are: Covina, First Church, Los Angeles, Long Beach, Magnolia Avenue, Pomona, Riverside, and San Diego.

Under the management of E. J. Arnot, pastor, the Trier Sisters are to give an entertainment at Batavia, Ill., Friday evening, April 23. Mr. Arnot who is a student at the University of Chicago, is pushing the work at Batavia with vigor, and is gaining the support of many people of the town who are not members of the church.

Telegrams

North Yakima, Wash., April 26.—Dedicated fifty-seven thousand dollar building here last Sunday. Raised six thousand over all indebtedness. Morton L. Rose, our pastor, has done great work here—worthy of a life-time. Two hundred and one converts the first week, 76 yesterday, 277 in seven days, 22 men at one service.—Charles Reign Scoville.

Watson, Ill., April 25.—Closed tonight with forty added. Only three children. Sixteen heads of families. A truly remarkable meeting, by the grace of God. Brother Zimmerman will continue this week. We must go to Red Oak, Iowa, for next Sunday. So we pray and preach for the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.—Thompson, The Egyptian.

Frankfort, Ky., April 25.—Eighty additional at the end of second week. Interest at fever heat. Impossible to accommodate crowds. Sellers and St. John great. This old historic church is heartily supporting Frankfort's greatest revival. Services conducted by Evangelist and Chaplain Severance at the state prison today resulted in sixty-one men accepting Christ. Breaks the prison record. We continue.—Charles R. Hudson, Pastor.

Hopkinsville, Ky., April 20.—Thirty-one added yesterday, the first day of invitations in Herbert Yeuell meeting here. Preaching full of fervor and power. Fascinating also in its oratorial character. Great audiences. Visitors from neighboring towns. Interest among members of other churches. Prof. Edward Faust of Chicago singing. College town. Revivals every year. Wonder is where additions come from. Great women's meeting yesterday afternoon. Overflow meeting last night.—H. D. Smith.

The church at Tucson, Arizona is mourning with its pastor, George T. Purves, in the death of his wife, April 8. Obituary notice is printed elsewhere.

The Douglas Park Church, Chicago, is now holding all its meetings in the Lawndale Hall to which they went at the beginning of April for the evening meetings. The audiences have greatly increased.

The Men's Brotherhood of the church at Newton Falls, Ohio, had as their guest of honor on a recent evening, F. D. Butchart of the Aetna Street Church, Cleveland, Ohio.

The Ohio State Convention will be held at Elyria, May 24-27. John P. Sala, the pastor at Elyria sends an urgent invitation, and says that the church will furnish lodging and breakfast free.

There were five additions by statement to the Atlanta, Ill., Christian Church, April 11. The foreign offering was $75.25; Easter offering from the Sunday-school for the N. B. A. was $20.00. The minister's salary was increased $160 annually, February 1. This is the second advance in salary since the present minister began working for this church nineteen months ago. Atlanta has one of the best parsonages in Central Illinois, being thoroughly modern, and the church now needs a new building to match up with the home they have provided for the preacher, Ralph V. Callaway, and to meet the needs of the growing Bible school.

America: A Field--A Force

The richest, most responsive, most strategic missionary field in the world is the United States of America.

A FIELD: 250,000,000 acres of land, the most fertile on the globe, are being reclaimed from aridity by the National Government. Hundreds of thousands of emigrants are crowding into the great Western commonwealths, founding new cities, townships and counties.

500,000 American farmers have moved into the Canadian Northwest to raise wheat, barley, flax and stock on the government free lands. The railroads are carrying settlers into Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, Oregon, Idaho, Wyoming, Washington, Colorado and Utah by the tens of thousands.

Puget Sound is the most marvelous inland waterway of the continent. It has 1,600 miles of coastline. Any vessel afloat, of any draught, in any weather, and any number of vessels may pass in and out in safety. Ships may anchor under the shade of the trees. A steamer leaving Puget Sound for China would reach port two days sooner than from San Francisco. It is the seaport for Oriental trade, the outlet for wheat, flour, ores, lumber and the general trades.

In Puget Sound is found the oldest Christian civilization in the United States west of the Mississippi. God sent Christian pioneers into the Willamette Valley to pre-empt the territory against such time as he might flood the Northwest with the sturdiest of the world's citizenship. Today that region is developing so rapidly and wonderfully as to seem almost a daily miracle. Cities are growing so rapidly that railroads are pushed to their best to serve them. Puget Sound is the gateway to the Orient, and God has seen to it that a superb civilization has possessed and fortified it. We must look toward Japan and China through the Strait of Juan de Fuca.

Forty years ago Illinois led in railway mileage. Today Texas leads with 12,500 miles and has five times the area of Illinois in which to develop. The Government is building its sea walls and safe harbors in Texas ports. The Burlington Railroad will in a few months run through freight and passenger trains from Galveston to Seattle, traversing the Mississippi Valley and the heart of the great irrigated region of the West. The Panama Canal will make Galveston, Houston and Port Arthur great shipping points to California and the Orient.

California is almost an ideal commonwealth in the golden glory of its superb citizenship no less than its wealth of agricultural and mineral resources.

In all this vast region of rapid growth and development, of ever increasing wealth and alluring opportunity, are people who need the gospel—thousands of them. Thousands more have cut loose from the moorings of home and the home church and become "scattered disciples." To preach to the unsaved and to shepherd the "scattered sheep of the house of Israel," is the duty of the church. The Committee appointed to do this work by the brotherhood of disciples is "THE AMERICAN CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY."

As rapidly as the funds were entrusted to it, "Our Home Board" has entered these waiting fields. But with our meagre offerings we have been, of necessity, all too slow. Many opportunities have slipped through our grasp. Many more are even now in jeopardy. THE EXIGENCIES OF THE OCCASION CALL FOR IMMEDIATE AND UNSTINTED HELP.

A FORCE: As far as opportunity is concerned, there is no field on earth comparable to America. Consider the intellectual, moral and religious quality of her people. Consider her high state of civilization; the means of rapid communication; the enormous wealth and resources of every kind which men redeemed are able to lay at the feet of the Master; the evangelistic value of a convert in America, his opportunities for development and service; the enormous potentialities of a redeemed America; and the evident purpose of our God in the preparation of our country for the twentieth century exigencies in the foreign field.

The whole wide world is open to the gospel—as never before. Not only are the doors of opportunity opening everywhere, but the heathen world itself is pleading for the gospel. Japan, China, Korea, India and Africa are sending deputations to America to plead for more missionaries and more missionary equipment. American boys and girls and American men and women, supported by American money and protected by the American flag, are to solve the problems of world-wide evangelization.

Dr. Ward Platt in his great book, "The Frontier," says: "It is evident to any who give the matter thought that the foreign field likewise demands a general and positive reenforcement. The West has the needed latent resources of every kind. It is clear that the older parts of our country will not alone furnish for the Foreign field what is instant and imperative. An extension of our base of supplies is essential. For the Missionary forces of the church to invest largely in the West is literally to reclaim an Empire whose revenues, spiritual and material, will in five years begin flowing into missionary treasuries, and with such liberality as to develop all preliminary expenditures. Have we not come to a time when we must, of necessity, arise and save our own land if humanity is to be saved? America for Christ means the world for Christ, but the whole round world for Christ means All America as his."

America, the field, appeals to us with all the vehemence of vision-stirred faith and courage. Our people have the opportunity of their history today.

THE AMERICAN CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY sets the vision before the brotherhood and bids the churches to join forces in a plan to possess America for Christ.

May 2 is the date set for a great offering—an offering that shall fitly celebrate our Centennial Anniversary, an offering that shall enable the Board of Trustees to answer at once every one of the 250 appeals for aid that await the issue of the May Offering.

Let us remember that we are giving the world this year our best evidence of our fitness to live and to push the glorious propaganda of the restoration into the farthest reaches of the earth. If we are to give the world a convincing proof of our business ability, our vision, our devotion, our loyalty to the great commission and our determination to do our utmost to evangelize the world, we must make the offering for our Home Missionary enterprises the greatest we have ever made.

NOW is the nick of time in America. Tomorrow will be everlastingly too late.

Let every Loyal Church wheel into line May 2. Send church offerings and individual gifts to

C. W. B. M. Notes

From the Secretary.

Our president, Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, is in Mexico studying the needs of the work there and on her return will participate in the dedicatory services of the new Bible Chair Building at Austin, Texas.

Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Wilkinson, of Bethany, Neb., sailed for Porto Rico, April 24, to take charge of the Boys' Orphanage at Bayamon.

Miss Bertha Lacock, our efficient teacher at the Girls' Orphanage, Porto Rico, because of serious illness, has returned to the United States for the summer vacation.

The new church building at Kingston, Jamaica, will be dedicated in the near future. $8,000 was pledged for this building by the auxiliaries of Indiana and is to be given in memory of Helen E. Moses. The churches in Jamaica have pledged $250 for this—Jamaica's Moses Memorial.

A new building for the Berkley, W. Va., Mountain school is to be completed by October.

The Centennial Mountain school in Tennessee will be located at Livingston. A generous gift has been made by citizens of Livingston which, with the Centennial offerings of the auxiliaries of Michigan and Tennessee, will make possible the establishing and aid in maintaining this new enterprise.

Dr. Oona Mae Robbins of Los Angeles, Cal., has recently been appointed to Rath, India, and will sail with Mr. and Mrs. Menzies in the middle of the summer. The auxiliary at the Central Christian Church, Wichita, Kan., has chosen her as their living link. In this effort the society has the sympathetic cooperation of the pastor and official board of the church.

The receipts of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions for the first six months, from October 1 to March 31, is $143,562.

Workers, friends, place this amount beside the financial aims for this year—see duty and go forward. This will assure success.

Mrs. M. E. Harlan.

National Bible-School Notes

The program for the Bible-school work at the Pittsburg Centennial Convention is nearly completed. The nine conferences will be in charge of the following persons:

Cradle Roll and Beginners, not yet selected.

Primary, Miss Lillie Faris, Athens, Ohio.

Junior, Mrs. Myron C. Settle, Topeka, Kan.

Intermediate, Myron C. Settle, Topeka, Kan.

Adult classes, W. C. Pearce, Chicago, Ill.

Teacher training, first and second years' work, Herbert H. Moninger, Cincinnati, O.

Superintendent's Conference, Robert M. Hopkins, Louisville, Ky.

State Bible-school Workers, J. H. Hardin, Kansas City, Mo.

The program for the three great conventions on Monday, October 18, is nearly completed. E. A. Cole of Washington, Pa., is preparing the program for the three morning conventions. Herbert H. Moninger is preparing the program for the three afternoon conventions. W. C. Pearce of Chicago, is preparing the program for the three night conventions. The monster men's parade will be a great feature of the evening Adult Bible class demonstration.

J. Walter Carpenter of Uniontown, Pa., is in charge of the Bible class exhibits. A number of fine awards will be given. A beautiful silk flag will be presented by I. W. Gill of Wichita, Kan., to the men's class making the best demonstration.

Pledges for the support of the National Christian Bible-school Association have been received from Arizona, Colorado, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Missouri, New Brunswick, Ohio, District of Columbia, Texas and West Virginia. These come from organized classes and individuals. Every mail should bring multitudes of these pledges in order that our association may stand alone financially.

W. R. Warren, Centennial secretary, has prepared a fine banner 2x10 feet, reading: "All the church and as many more in the Bible-school." This should be displayed in every one of our 8,000 Bible-schools. Send fifty cents to Brother Warren, 203 Bissell Block, Pittsburg, Pa., for the banner. You could not duplicate it at home for less than $3.00. It is printed in colors on heavy cloth.

The attention of the Bible-school superintendents everywhere is urged to the letters which are being sent them from the St. Louis office.

Marion Stevenson,
National Supt. of Bible-schools.

Vol. XXVI. CHICAGO, ILL., MAY 6, 1909. No. 19

The Union of Disciples and Baptists

We have had frequent occasion to point out the growing interest manifested in union between local congregations of our own and our Baptist brethren. The fundamental principles of both communions are so similar that the continuance of their separate existence seems unnecessary and inexcusable. To be sure, there are plenty of places where Baptists and Disciples still differ if the spirit of controversy is roused. The old debates have lost their interest for all who are truly concerned with the progress of the cause of Christ, but enough remains of the old spirit to keep alive faction and strife if it is not vigilantly repressed.

Yet with the enormous responsibility that our age has placed upon the shoulders of the church, open minded and discerning believers see less and less excuse for separation in the work of these two groups of immersionists. It is natural, therefore, that since the experiment has been successfully tried in a few places and is giving promise of great effectiveness and blessed results, there should be many others brooding the problem of similar union. We are cheered daily by reports from localities where negotiations are now being held in furtherance of just such plans.

There are a few matters which need to be kept clearly in mind in all such conferences. Each party must remember that any union which involves a surrender of convictions can only be a partial union and probably short lived. There must be on both sides the feeling that every essential principle for which each body has stood is to be conserved in the union of the two. Neither Baptists nor Disciples can possibly avoid those just feelings of pride in the work that has been done thus far in the Christian world by each. If we are proud of the one hundred years' achievements which we celebrate next autumn at Pittsburg, much more ought the Baptists to glory in that testimony which for more than three centuries they have borne to the principles of Christian liberty and apostolic Christianity. No union that attempts to obscure or minimize these achievements can endure. The Baptists and the Disciples must alike bring to the new congregations which are formed by these unions a sense of victory already achieved by each and of greater results yet to be obtained from the new relationship.

Among the points which inevitably fall to be considered in conferences relating to the union of congregations would be the name of the united church, the method of receiving members, the observance of the Lord's Supper and the distribution of missionary and benevolent offerings. Minor questions may arise, but we believe that these will be the matters of chief moment. Regarding the name it seems necessary to insist that the title chosen shall be scriptural and that no human designation shall prevail. Baptists, of course, are all conscious of the fact that that name under which so much effective Christian work has been done by them does not really represent the breadth and glory of their testimony. It relates to but a single article in their faith, and that by no means the most important. Indeed many Baptist voices are lifted in our day in expressions of regret that a title so partial and limited as this should ever have been given to a body whose mission has been so broad and beneficent. Of course the fact is that the name "Baptist" was first applied in derision to those who contended for the scriptural observance. It thus belongs to the list including Christian, Methodist, Puritan, etc., which were not chosen but grew out of persecution. For this reason we do not believe that any such names as "Christian Baptist" or "Baptist Christian" can ever meet the test of united experience. There is too much insistence upon the old denominational idea in these titles. We believe that the word "Baptist" must be eliminated, and something more biblical and catholic be substituted for it.

On the other hand, we believe our Baptist friends are perfectly justified in insisting that the word "Christian Church" is both unbiblical and denominational in the common acceptance of the term. As used today, it stands for one or the other of two bodies of Christians—either our own people or the old Christian Connection. As we plead for Bible names we are quite aware that the term "Christian Church" is indefensible from the standpoint of the New Testament. It seems, therefore, that some name must be chosen which has neither of these objectionable elements in it. The term "Church of Christ" is such a title. If there has been a local name attached to the Baptist church, such as "Calvary," "Emmanuel," or "Bethlehem," this may very well be adopted, and gives a certain familiarity to the new title which generally helps to endear it. "The Memorial Church of Christ" in this city is an example of this good custom. It preserves all that was best in the traditions of the "Memorial Baptist Church," and adds the significant feature of the new united organization.

In the admission of members to the church, the Baptists have been accustomed to initiate the candidate by some simple plan of conference with the pastor and two or three members constituting an advisory committee. The reason for this is the desire to make sure of the genuineness of purpose manifested by the candidate for baptism, and not to probe into any supposed "religious experience." This latter custom of some Baptist churches does not meet the approval of progressive members of that body. But some consultation with the elders or officers of the church seems highly advisable both in connection with the reception of members by letter or statement and in connection with profession of faith and baptism. We believe also that the custom of Disciples in giving the invitation at each preaching service is admirable and ought to be retained. Indeed most Baptists are quick to see the advantage of this plan. The order, therefore, which we should suggest is that of public invitation and confession of faith as now practiced in our churches, followed by a conference between the candidate and the elders to learn something further of the facts which have led to the step. Upon the recommendation of this group the congregation feels the greater assurance regarding the motives that have induced the candidate to present himself and can lend its hearty sanction and extend its warm welcome to the newcomer who completes the act of church membership by baptism, or public welcome in the case of church letters. The Disciples have always felt that the Baptists did not make enough of the public invitation and profession of faith, and the Baptists have always regarded the Disciples as over-hasty in the reception of members without some consideration of their motives for taking the step. We believe that the plan we have suggested insures emphasis upon both these admirable features.

The observance of the Lord's Supper is an item usually adjusted without difficulty. Many Baptist churches practice weekly communion. All Disciples have grown accustomed to this method and are greatly attached to it. Even in those cases where the Baptist portion of the membership would not desire to observe the communion weekly, they would have no objection to the table being spread and the service observed by those who chose to attend. This is practically the case in our churches today. There are few of our congregations whose total membership or anything approaching thereto actually observes weekly communion. But a united church might admirably and without protest arrange for the weekly observance of the Supper for those who desired it. It could then be placed either preceding the ordinary morning worship or at its close, and sometimes perhaps in the evening to accommodate those who find themselves unable to be present at the earlier worship.

The division of missionary funds is much more easily arranged than at first would appear. If the membership of the united church is about equally divided between Baptists and Disciples, an equal division of the funds between the missionary boards of the two bodies is a simple matter. If, however, for a time the officers of the church desire to have the missionary gifts designated, the envelope system makes this easy of accomplishment; and thus Disciples and Baptists contribute directly to those interests in which they are concerned. A missionary calendar can easily be arranged in which the great interests of both bodies can be combined in a few general offerings, such as home missions, foreign missions, state missions, city missions, and other interests which fall to the care of the churches. It is even possible to combine two or three of these objects of benevolence in one offering where the programs of the two communions differ, as, for example, the Church Extension fund of the Disciples may very well be combined with the Publication Fund of the Baptists, the proceeds of which go to church erection; and the offering for Ministerial Relief may be combined with the Baptist Society for the care of the aged ministers and their children.

A closing word of caution needs to be uttered. It is unfortunate that it should be needed, but such seems to be the case. We wish to emphasize the fact that where two local churches of the Disciples and Baptists are in conference over this question of union, they must expect to work out the plan largely for themselves upon the basis of those successful efforts which have been made in the same direction. They will not be able to count very much upon the friendly advices of men in official position in either religious body. It is a perfectly demonstrable fact that several cases in which negotiations had reached almost a final and happy issue have been blocked and thwarted by the negative counsels of men called in because of their official position in the respective denominations. Such men are often cautious to the point of coldness. Their chief concern is denominational prestige. If they are connected with the missionary or educational interests of the bodies with which they are identified, they are quite likely to be troubled lest these interests shall suffer from the change contemplated. We insist upon the fact that in most instances such outside advice is certain to be unfriendly to the plan of union. This is truer of the Baptists than of our own people.

But we are satisfied that if the plan of union above set forth, which we believe to be the only practicable plan at the present time, is to be made effective in local churches, it will have to be without waiting for the approval of the denominational authorities. It is a pathetic fact that men who will in public advocate Christian union and even appear to approve what has been done in the direction of actual unification, will in private discourage the churches which are making efforts in that direction. The time will come and is not far distant when the number of these unions will have become a factor important enough to require no apology or defense. But at the present time they are not numerous, and for that very reason they are sure to be viewed by the denominations concerned with a certain degree of suspicion and even of opposition. But the cause of union must justify itself, and we are encouraged by the number of those now working at the question in local fields. We believe that ere long the number of united churches will be the strongest answer to the lingering spirit of denominational pride now too frequently encountered.

Armaments As Irritants

The English press has of late been concerned with the question of the naval equipment of Great Britain. England has long maintained the position of supremacy upon the sea. This has not been questioned since Nelson's great victory at Trafalgar when the combined fleets of Spain and France were shattered.

But England is now confronted with a new and formidable rival for naval empire. Germany, which has not hitherto been considered a seapower of great importance, has come with extraordinary rapidity to the front, and under the able leadership of Emperor William, has equipped a navy which promises to rival that of Great Britain in two years. England's immense opportunities for shipbuilding on the Clyde and the Thames were supposed to cast into shadow all efforts of her rivals. But Germany has developed a series of shipyards with building facilities almost equal if not actually superior to those of Great Britain.

The question has been agitated in the English press for some weeks, but it became an important problem of government a few weeks ago when Mr. Balfour, the leader of the opposition in Parliament, openly charged the government with delinquency in its preparations for defense and predicted that England would be outclassed by Germany in a few months. The admissions of Mr. Asquith, the Premier, were construed by the English public as even more alarming, and something like a panic has seized all classes in England as if it were probable that almost any morning the spectacle might be present of a German fleet actually investing the coasts of England.

The astonishing feature of this situation is the fact that even the English religious papers are frankly conceding the necessity of a very much ampler naval equipment for England and are approving the government's policy of immediately building four and, if possible, eight more iron clads of the "Dreadnaught" type. Not since the jingo days preceding the Boer War has the militant spirit run as high.

This is one of the most pathetic spectacles of our times. It is well known that Germany is struggling under an enormous debt, and that the only arguments which have availed to increase her vast military and naval estimates have been those which point to England as a formidable rival, likely to menace German interests both in Europe and the far East. Under this spell of apprehension the German nation has been swept into consenting to an enormous burden of taxes for the support of its armaments.

Now comes England with its heavy debt, its multitude of unemployed workmen, and its decreasing revenue, and in this moment of fright by the spectre of German naval supremacy it votes a new and vast subsidy for naval equipment, which it could only need in the possible and supposedly remote event of war with the German Empire.

In the meantime both England and Germany profess to be Christian powers. In both of these lands the gospel of the Prince of Peace is preached in thousands of pulpits every week. In both the principles of the Hague Conference are endorsed. If war should break out between England and Germany, who would be responsible for it? Only those who have provoked the jingo type of patriotism and have assumed the chip-on-the-shoulder attitude in either nation.

It is sometimes said that preparation for war is the best means of maintaining peace. To a limited extent this is true. But the reading of history proves that a nation is far more eager to go to war when it is well equipped for the struggle. If England and Germany have put these great sums into their "Dreadnaughts," how are they to get value received for these huge engines of war except by putting their respective armaments to test? Upon the present basis of preparation or even a more limited one with no tendency to conflict, the two nations could look forward to a measure of industrial prosperity and the likelihood of war would be very remote. But with the huge increase of expenses for defense if not for aggression, the industries of the two peoples are taxed to their utmost to maintain the costly game and the spirit of both peoples is made more militant, aggressive, and quick to discern and resent insult.

The whole sorry business of increased armaments is one of the most pathetic and depressing of spectacles in an age like ours which has given promise of finding new and higher ways of settling international disputes. The lover of peace finds his only satisfaction in reflecting upon the fact that within a few months it is probable that aerial navigation will have become sufficiently perfected to offer a powerful counter force to any naval equipment that could be prepared. A few torpedoes dropped from an air ship upon a fleet could send to the bottom the laborious results of years of time and millions of treasure. The enginery of destruction in its rapid development is perhaps the best ally of peace. War is becoming so costly and the instruments of attack so deadly that the military spirit defeats itself by the very perfection of its tools. So once more science and ethics unite their powers to forbid the infamy and cruelty of war.

The present situation in Constantinople is vastly encouraging to those who have watched Turkish politics with a sense of depression and shame. For many years the Turkish government has been the blackest plague-spot in Europe. The policies pursued by the sultan and his advisors have been mediæval rather than modern, barbarous rather than civilized. Revolution and massacre have been the order of the day, and the chief sufferers have been the Armenian Christians of the interior. But now the Young Turkish party has come to its own. Once more in its long history Constantinople has fallen; but unlike the fall of 1453, which saw its transfer from Christian to Mohammedan hands, it has now fallen from one type of Mohammedan control into the hands of representatives of another and far more modern order. The young men who are now in the ascendancy are not Christians, to be sure, but they are those who ave received their education in such institutions as the Syrian rotestant College at Beirut, the Scottish Mission School at)amascus, the United Presbyterian School at Cairo, and Roberts ollege on the Bosphorus. In these institutions, while no direct eaching antagonistic to Mohammedanism has been permitted, there as been a spirit of Christian tolerance and liberty, and these young ien have learned the lesson that Turkey must keep pace with iodern life or remain under the reproach of being a barbarous mpire. It is the triumph of the Christian faith under the diplo- iatic and political limitations of Mohammedanism. The reign of anaticism cannot last. A new day has dawned in that wonderful ity whose influence spread both east and west over a wide empire. The latest news is that the Sultan, Abdul Hamid II, whom Mr. Gradstone called "The Great Assassin," has been deposed, and his rother placed upon the throne with the title of Mehmed V.

An interesting event which throws some light upon church olitics in England has recently occurred in Birmingham. Mr. owett, the famous Congregational preacher at Car's Lane Church n that city, celebrated the first anniversary of his new institute or social service last month, and invited Canon Henson of West- ninster to preach the sermon. The Canon accepted the invitation ut was presently advised by his superior, Bishop Gore, that at he request of the Vicar of St. Gabriel's parish in Birmingham, he vas compelled to inhibit Canon Henson from taking the service. The Bishop expressed his regret at the necessity for this eccles- astical duty. Canon Henson replied that there was no disorderly r sinister intention in his action, but merely the intent to ex- ress the friendly co-operation with non-conformists, which he elt to be appropriate to the occasion. Moreover, he said that if is going to Birmingham to preach for Mr. Jowett broke any eccles- astical law, he felt that such a law ought to be broken and he roposed to do it, adding that he would ignore any inhibition sent o him. The Bishop then made his inhibition in definite and final orm, but Canon Henson disregarded it and preached at the in- titute, at the same time sending the correspondence between imself and the Bishop to the London Times. The whole matter s both informing and amusing as a sign of the times. A bishop, f broad mind and warm sympathies, reluctantly yielding to a arrow-minded and jealous vicar in whose parish a brother clergy- nan comes to preach, sends with evident regret his message of lissuasion, only to be reminded that it is too late in the centuries o resort to the mere technicalities of ecclesiastical law for the urpose of stopping the growing sympathy between the churches.

Professor George A. Coe, recently professor of religious and moral ducation at Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois, has esigned to become professor of practical theology in Union Theo- ogical Seminary in New York City. Professor Coe is the President f the Religious Education Association and one of the foremost uthorities on religious pedagogy in America. His volumes on "Education in Religion and Morals," "The Spiritual Life," and "The Religion of a Mature Mind," comprise, with those of Star- uck, Granger, and the Annuals of the Religious Education Asso- iation, the foremost books now available on this theme. His work n New York will be exclusively in graduate courses. Professor Coe has been for the past five years perhaps the strongest man n the faculty of Northwestern University, and his departure is very serious loss both to that institution and to this city. But e will have gained something of academic freedom by the transfer nd will be able to render even greater service both to his own hurch, the Methodist, and to the universal church.

The presence of the National Peace Congress in Chicago this week makes especially pertinent our article by Secretary Phillips on the Lake Mohonk Conference. Next week we shall tell of the great Chicago meeting. Its dates are May 3, 4 and 5. The main sessions are being held in Orchestra Hall, though some sessions will be held in the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, the Chicago Woman's Club Rooms and the University of Chicago. A banquet is announced for Wednesday evening given by the Chicago Associa- tion of Commerce to delegates. A reception to delegates was held Monday evening in the foyer of Orchestra Hall. Some of the most distinguished political and educational leaders are present. Honor- able J. M. Dickinson, the new Secretary of War, is presiding over the sessions.

Gary, Indiana, a suburb of Chicago in April 1906, was a region of sand dunes, marshes, and ponds. Now it is a city of 12,000 inhabitants, with all the conveniences of a modern city, newspapers, schools, libraries, churches, and no saloons. The center of this amazing city is the great steel mill, owned and controlled by the United States Steel Corporation, which covers about a square mile of land, and gives employment to a large majority of the men of the town. It is built in the most approved methods, with every facility for ease and speed of manufacture and transportation of steel products. A large harbor has been built to accommodate the lake traffic and five railroads pass through Gary, making communication from all quarters easy. The town itself is rapidly growing, and has all the beauty that fine houses, well laid out and paved streets, rows of trees, and excellent care can give it. Over half the present population are men of working age, and as the mill alone will ultimately employ some 14,000 men, the prediction that Indianapolis must yield first place to her new rival would seem to be a matter of assurance should the family life of Gary increase with the male popualtion. The Disciples have recently organized a church in this growing city and at the last quarterly rally of the Chicago churches, the new congregation was received into fellowship.

In view of the all but universal ostracism which Rev. R. J. Campbell has suffered in evangelical circles in England, his personal reassurance can only be equaled by the public surprise at the vote of his congregation a short time since. The members and pewholders came together, at Mr. Campbell's request, to the number of 800. He told them frankly of the consistent snub he was experiencing from religious organizations; that the Free Church Council, the Congregational Union, the International Congregational Council passed him by; and that he wished his congregation to indicate whether his leadership was an occasion of embarrassment to them. A resolution of support and appreciation was passed with absolute unanimity. Solicitude for his health was earnestly expressed and he was urged to abandon his announced trip to America this summer to lecture on Socialism. He will probably accept his people's advice.

We have received as many as ten or a dozen articles in the past two months on the subject treated of in Mr. Elmore's contribution on page 8. All of them we have declined, some because they were inadequate, others because they were too cruelly true, and all of them because it is our purpose to keep controversial matter out of our columns as far as possible. Mr. Elmore's keen statement, however appeals so strongly to our editorial sense both of justice and of humor that we decided to let it see the light.

The public is sensitive and suspicious concerning the money paid evangelists in the large meetings now being held. It is generally understood that a certain evangelist made $50,000 last year in his meetings. The local committee in charge of the Chapman campaign in Boston, recognizing popular sensitiveness on this subject has made public a financial statement showing that Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander received $1,300 which they shared with five assistants. This is in addition to the annual salary paid Dr. Chapman by Mr. John H. Converse.

A message from Professor Ira M. Price, who is conducting the University of Chicago Travel Study Class through Egypt, Palestine, and Asia Minor, reports their journey and work very successful and pleasant. They started north from Jerusalem with the camp on April 6. Every one was in the best of spirits and health. They have probably reached Constantinople in time to see some of the most interesting developments in that city during the past few days.

Mr. Guy I. Hoover, recently pastor of the West Pullman Church in this city, has begun auspiciously his pastorate at Tipton, Indiana. With a new church building and an enthusiastic membership the field seems to offer opportunity for a most serviceable and rewarding work. We congratulate Brother Hoover upon his good beginnings in this fine field.

Mr. Edward A. Henry, a member of the American School for Oriental Research in Jerusalem during the past winter, is now on his way home after having spent several months in profitable study in the Holy City. He made also a journey of some duration to Egypt to examine the antiquities there.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

A LEGISLATURE THAT DID THINGS

Here are some of the things done by the Nebraska legislature during the winter's session. It certainly acted up to the spirit of the times. Exception is taken in that it failed to pass a county local option bill.

This is a record of only the chief things done.

Oregon plan of electing senators. Open primaries, allowing names to be written in on ballots. Forbidding political parties to nominate candidates for judge or any educational office and putting all candidates for such offices on ticket without party designation.

Weight of binding twine must be stamped on each package and also composition of material. Bakeries, groceries, dairies, and all places where food is prepared must be kept clean. Actual weight of packages of wheat and corn products must be stamped on package.

Guaranteed bank deposit law. Annual occupation tax on capital stock of all corporations doing business in the state—tax is small but enough to provide registry and inspection. Regulation of stock and bond issues by state commission to prevent fictitious issues and watered stock. Warehouse receipts made negotiable.

Providing for physical valuation of railroads and other public service companies. Maximum freight rate on carload lots of oil fixed by law. Allowing passes to be issued to the dependents of those employes who die in the service. Prescribing the number of men in a train crew. Requiring railroads to equip stations with telephones.

Penalizing intimidation of voters by threats of loss of employment. All campaign contribution must be published fifteen days before election.

Establishing a school of citizenship at the State University. Forbidding high school fraternities. A system of teachers' pensions provided. Legalizing an osteopathic board of examiners.

Making provision for official gathering of divorce statistics from courts granting same. Divorces not to become effective for one year after granted. The indeterminate sentence for certain felonies.

Daylight saloon bill closing saloons at 8 p. m., not to be opened before 7 a. m. Forbidding sale of liquor on railroad trains except on diners.

CANADIAN CARE FOR THE AGED

Canada has just passed a law that will provide against the day of need for the worthy poor or the day of misfortune and age for all. It is not a pension in the sense of England's old-age pension system nor is it workingman's insurance such as Germany makes obligatory. It is less paternalistic than either. It simply establishes a system of guaranteed annuities with the government operating the business.

If 25 cents per week is paid for twenty-five years, $47 per year will be paid the annuitant the remainder of his life; if the payments are kept up for forty years the sum annually received will be $200. A young man may begin at the age of twenty by paying $10 down, make payments of 25 cents each week, add a lump sum of $10 every five years, and when he is sixty he will receive an annuity of $151; then if his employer will add $10 each five years he will receive $253 each twelvemonth of the remainder of his life. Provision is made for payment of a lump sum in case of death at any time; e. g. under the last named conditions, if the annuitant died at the age of fifty his heirs would receive $1,215. One may also buy these annuities by paying down at any time a lump sum. In this way the savings bank account, also cared for by the government in Canada, may be laid up safely against the day of old age and made to provide an assured annual income after the annuitant is sixty years old. One may provide for as low as $50 per year and cannot receive more than $600, and the money cannot be drawn before the age of fifty-five.

Not only does this make savings absolutely safe and provide against old age but it is impossible to alienate the funds once invested. If one falls sick or loses employment or for any reason cannot keep up payments, they can be resumed at any time. Employers and fraternal and benevolent societies may also purchase these annuities for others.

It is feared that old age pensions will encourage thriftlessness. This plan will encourage thrift. The government simply provides administration and insures safety. Germany goes one step farther and compels both employer and employee to contribute, or pay tax, that the workingman may be provided for. Belgium provides both old age pensions and life insurance. Denmark provides an old-age pension for worthy poor; no one ever convicted of crime or who has received pauper relief can receive it. This has helped to relieve the poor relief funds and to deter from crime. Cottages are provided for the pensioners and there is no stigma attached to the recipiency. New Zealand, among other things, sells homes to workers whose income does not exceed $750 per annum, upon the payment of 8 per cent of the value each year for thirty-two years. The dwelling cannot cost over $2,000. Thus the ordinary rental of a cottage pays for a substantial home, built of brick and concrete. If he prefers the worker may rent instead by paying five per cent of cost and the state will keep up all repairs..

BANISHING SMOKE

Smoke costs the great cities of the nation $600,000,000 in actual loss of goods and cost of cleaning after it. This is the sober testimony of the experts. This takes no account of that greater loss to health and comfort that it occasions. There have been many smoke consumers invented but few have proven efficient or economical. Now Uncle Sam's experts announce the problem solved. They have found a scientific way of stoking. No apparatus is required more than a proper setting of the furnace. They think it will be impossible to work the method with all kinds of men as stokers. Mechanical stokers is the solution of this defeating personal element. That may look like a defeat for their method. They claim mechanical stokers are now so economical that even small plants can better afford them than the hand fireman.

It all consists in getting the gasses afire before they strike the tubes of the boiler or get out of the area of great heat.

The expert agents of the Geological Survey visited 200 plants that are running their boilers economically without smoke. They say that 50 per cent of the factories would save 10 per cent on fuel by adopting the method and that the others would save at least 5 per cent. Director Wilson is burning a sort of waste or refuse coal at the Pittsburg Experiment Station. It is delivered to him for 88 cents per ton and he burns it without smoke. He says:

"The investigation indicates that the clean, comfortable American city, with a normal amount of sunshine, is not far off. Smokeless cities only await a public conscience, quickened to the fact that this nuisance means uncleanliness, poverty, wretchedness, disease and death."

THE ANTI-OPIUM CRUSADE

These paragraphs have noted from time to time the progress of the effort to get the nations in alliance against the devastating opium traffic. The renaissance of China aroused the world-wide interest that took form in the Shanghai conference last winter. That conference came very nearly being a failure owing to the elusive attitude assumed by Great Britain. She was finally prevailed upon, however, to join in some recommendations, the most vital of which was that the nations join in prohibiting the importation of the drug from one country to another. But this is only a recommendation. Another conference must be called to arrange the treaty forms and there the wholesome recommendations may be unable to obtain recognition.

Dr. Hamilton Wright of the American Commission has made a report of their investigations which is of interest. It is found that 15.48% of the criminal population of the United States are addicted to the use of the drug. Among non-criminal classes the physicians lead in the percentage of habitual users, averaging 2.06%. Of the entire population less than one-fifth of one per cent use the drug. The Chinese population of the country numbers 118,000 and one-half of them smoke the deadly pipe. It is found that the habit has grown by 50% in Maine since she came under prohibition. This is not to the discredit of prohibition, but shows rather that it has prohibited liquor to such an extent that certain depraved appetites have been driven to opium. Manifestly the remedy is to make it impossible to obtain the drug in Maine.

Congress has passed severe repressive measures, but their effectiveness, especially among the Chinese, will depend very largely upon obtaining an international agreement. Opium is small of bulk and easily smuggled. The best way to prevent it is to prevent its being either exported or imported, or perhaps even to prohibit its being grown or manufactured outside of governmental supervision.

The Practical Side of the Peace Movement

Some Achievements of International Arbitration—The Coming Lake Mohonk Conference

By H. C. Phillips Secretary of the Conference

About a year ago fifty business men met a little New York town and gave to the ress a statement of peculiar interest. The en were delegates sent by business organ- ations to the Lake Mohonk Conference on nternational Arbitration, and the statement as this:

"The men representing business organiza- ons in various parts of our country recog- ze the fact that international arbitration s a substitute for war between nations is practical proposition; that practical ducation should be encouraged as the est means to hasten the day of a World's ourt of Justice; that the business men, eing vitally interested in this, the greatest ause of humanity, feel it their duty to as- ume a large share of the financial burden of his educational campaign. They appreciate urther that they should give time and seri- us thought to the problems confronting hose who are now engaged in the interna- onal arbitration movement."

large and increasing body of Americans that the peace movement contains an element promising early, practical results. It must be admitted that on one question—that of armaments—our people, like other peoples, are widely divided in opinion, and the present great agitation against further increase in the navy seems lost in the race for naval supremacy. Unfortunate as it is, the public is generally unmoved by both ethical and economic arguments against great armaments, and anything like general agreement appears to be far in the future.

Are Armaments Results or Causes?

But apart from this the peoples of the world are coming into close accord on the question of international arbitration. There is a strong feeling that armaments may be, after all, only results, not causes, and that through upright diplomacy, supplemented by arbitration as made possible by past and future Hague Conferences and Tribunals, there may eventually come about an international condition that will atrophy excessive decidedly hopeful. A network of more than seventy-five treaties of arbitration, including the two score negotiated by Mr. Root for the United States, bind twenty-five great nations to reserve all save their more vital differences from armed strife. On May 1 the Hague Tribunal meets to decide the Casa Blanca controversy between Germany and France, after which it is soon to take up the Newfoundland Fisheries case, by the sub-republics, despite current rumors, have not yet violated their agreement of 1907 to refer all their differences to the Court of their own creation and that the Court has actually mission of which this country and England terminate a century of dispute. Other cases are said to await it in pending claims of the United States against Venezuela arbitration of which, refused by Castro, has been granted by President Gomez. These three cases will not only renew public interest in the Tribunal, but will doubtless stimulate international activity in giving life to the proposed new Court of Arbitral Justice.

Self-Restraint of Nations.

Nor should we pass unnoticed such events as the convention creating a Joint High Commission to finally determine our Canadian boundary; the self-restraint shown by the world, particularly the United States, in not using justifiable force against the late Castro government in Venezuela; the three conventions among great European powers neutralizing Norway and agreeing to respect each others' territory on the North and Baltic Seas; the exchange of notes between Japan and the United States relating to the Far East; the fact that the Central American settled awo cases; and particularly is it well to consider how many years ago the Balkan crisis could have been thrust into world politics without a war.

The civilized world is at peace and there is no question that rulers and statesmen feel the pressure of a sentiment—a world conscience if we please—that makes it increasingly harder for any nation to break that peace by war while other means of settlement are at hand. The influence of the Hague Conferences is abroad: the opportunities they opened in the way of mediation, commissions of inquiry and arbitration (which may

Three Hundred Organizations Represented.

This was no hasty or ill-considered declaration, but an official utterance by men of high esponsibility. Besides the president of the ational Board of Trade, who presided, there ere present officers and delegates of three ther national bodies and of forty-six leading hambers of commerce and boards of trade in he largest cities of the country, representing, the words of the president, nearly three undred organizations.

These representative business men had erely put into words the conviction of a rmament by making it unnecessary.

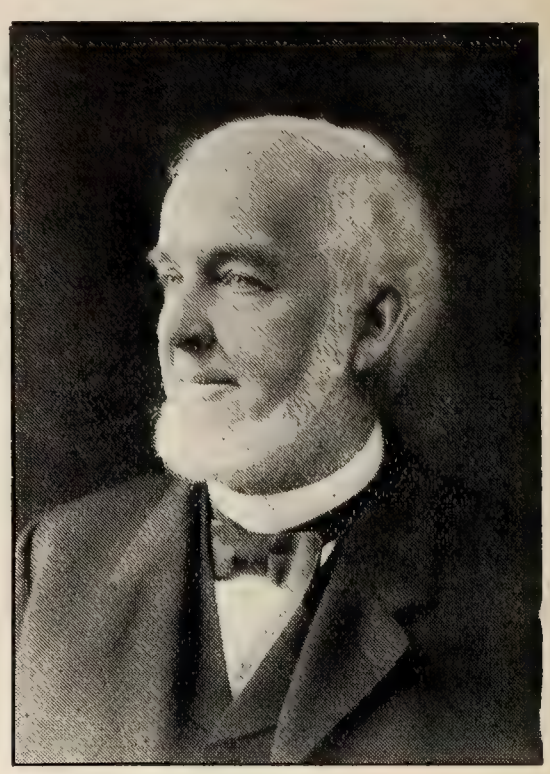
It is not impossible, but it is very unlikely, that war will ever again be waged over any but really vital issues. It remains to so strengthen public sentiment and to so improve the machinery of arbitration that many questions now considered "vital" may eventually be referred with confidence to peaceful adjudication. Along this line the more conservative peace societies are bending their energies; and the very fact that the great National Peace Congress about to meet in Chicago is to be presided over by the United States Secretary of War has in it not a tinge of humor but a striking proof of the practical trend of the movement.

Agencies Prior to Hague Conferences.



While the distinctive arbitration movement has come particularly into public notice since the first Hague Conference, two powerful agencies preceded that great gathering. Beginning in 1889, the Interparliamentary Union, that great body of the world's lawmakers now numbering more than 2,500, is believed to have had a considerable influence in the calling of the first Hague Conference; and it is certain that the Union was the inciting cause that led President Roosevelt to initiate steps for the second Hague Conference. The influence of the Interparliamentary Union for peace can hardly be overestimated. Yet, as its meetings are only occasionally held in this country, Americans are perhaps more familiar with the other agency, the Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration, founded in 1895 by Mr. Albert K. Smiley who still entertains as his personal guests at his picturesque summer home in southeastern New York those who attend the annual meetings. From a small beginning, this Conference has grown until its meetings call out some three hundred distinguished persons, Americans and foreigners, representative of all classes, of widely differing views on national policies and national armaments, but united in support of international arbitration. Nearly two hundred business organizations and about half the colleges of the country coöperate with the conference in promoting this object.

Next Annual Conference in May.

The fifteenth annual conference meets this year May 19-21, with President Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia University as chairman. The program includes as speakers, among others, Senor Don F. L. de la Bara, Mexican Ambassador; the Chinese Minister, Dr. Wu Ting Fang; the Bolivian and Costa Rican Ministers; the Dean of Worcester, England; Hon. Alfred Mosely of London, Chief Justice Maclaren of Ontario, Ex-Governor Montague of Virginia, Governor Ansel of South Carolina, Hon. Richard Bartholdt of Missouri, Hon. Frank Plumley of Vermont, President Faunce of Brown University, President Finley of New York City College, Bishop McVicker of Rhode Island, and Hon. William McCarroll of New York.

Other eminent men who will speak if their engagements permit are Hon. James Bryce, British Ambassador; Count von Bernstorff, German Ambassador; Mr. Nabuco, Brazilian Ambassador; Hon. William I. Buchanan of Buffalo, Hon. David R. Francis of St. Louis, and President Judson of the University of Chicago.

Among others who will attend are Dr. Andrew D. White, Hon. J. N. Gamboa of the Mexican Senate, Rev. V. A. Costabel, Italy; Judge Karl von Lewinski of Germany, Dr. Halvidan Koht of the Nobel Institute, U. S. Commissioner of Education Brown, Dr. Fran-

The Ancient Curse of Meroz

By R. E. Elmore

"Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of Jehovah,
Curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof,
Because they came not to the help of Jehovah,
To the help of Jehovah against the mighty."

Meroz was a little Hebrew town hidden in the mountain fastness, and out of the track of the hostile armies. Israel had been invaded by a mighty host. A great battle had been fought almost within bow-shot of the town of Meroz. Upon the result of this battle depended the safety or the pillage of the whole land of Israel, including Meroz. The Israelites were victorious, and the invading army was driven out of the country with great slaughter, but Meroz took no part in the battle.

After the battle, as was the ancient custom, a song was composed celebrating the victory. In the song, the different tribes and cities of Israel were mentioned. Some were excused for the small number of men sent, because of their distance from the scene of conflict. But when Meroz was reached—almost within hearing of the shouts of battle, and not a man in line—the fearful curse with which this article sets out was hurled at her.

Meroz and Our Missionary Campaign.

All this is typical. Every great conflict, military or moral, brings to light the men of Meroz—men sometimes brusquely dubbed cowards, skulkers, shirkers, deserters, renegades, traitors. The inaction of Meroz may be ascribed to indifference, envy, pique, prejudice, cowardice, or personal interest.

In the great centennial campaign for foreign missions now on, Meroz is again unenviably in the limelight. Every year many congregations fail absolutely to respond to the call of the world. The records are yet to be written of the Centenary year, but when the Pittsburg pæan of praise is sung, the ancient curse of Meroz will still mar the music of the ode of victory.

Meroz, this year of years, is not alone notable for the heresy of paralyzing indifference, but to this is added the pernicious activity of opposition. Guiding in the centennial mutiny against missions is one of the leading journals of the brotherhood. From the editorial rooms of this periodical, where principles and policies are formed, not an utterance has issued in behalf of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society's great centennial aim. The hurt is intensified by this paper's veiled protest against the leaders of our missionary enterprise.

Editorial Excerpts.

From the "protest" column running in this Christian journal for many weeks, we have taken the liberty to copy. An editorial preface explains the origin of the celebrated column, to wit:

> "On October 29, we mailed the first announcement of the Centennial Committee to a number of brethren, and asked for an expression. Some nineteen responded, and their protests will appear among those to be published. All others of the scores on hand are voluntary."

Another preface explains the true inwardness of the protests, viz:

> "We but allow our interested brethren—stockholders of our missionary enterprise—to speak what they feel."

Still another preface exhibits the honor of the editor, and the fairness of the editorial policy, thus:

> "These messages do not all speak as the Standard thinks; the folks are speaking their convictions, and we let them do so, because our missionary management and the Centennial Committee have need to know the affront that has been given lovers of the plea. We feel like exhorting the brethren to learn the facts in the case as far as possible, and speak in sober, considerate language well within the bounds of Christian courtesy, so as to do no man injustice" (this would appear less humorous and hypocritical if the periodical had taken any pains to state facts, or allow others to do so, in its own columns). "We wish once more to call attention to the fact that there seems to be a lack of agreement as to who is responsible for the appointment of Prof. Willett to appear at Pittsburg. It but shows how the people are thinking, and we let them speak as they think. It is not our business to unravel the muddle" (how "unravel" a "muddle"?)

Specimens of the "Protests."

In the subjoined "protests" themselves we ee where the talons show. "If the Boards avor sending a mutilated Gospel to other ountries, then I am done with them." "Unless the committee in charge have Prof. Willet's name cancelled, your humble servant as given his last dollar to missions through he Foreign Society." "The protests should e against the Vatican policy of the missionry boards. Willett may be honest and sinere. Certainly our missionary boards are ot." "Owing to the attitude of the general oards, we call off indefinitely, and will turn ur benefits into other channels." "We will ot help support our missionary societies so ong as they are contaminated by Willettsm." "Many of us have been watching for he last seven or eight years the tendency of ur missionary secretaries to assume that hey have been elected to office, and by this hey have been given certain vested rights over the brotherhood, so that they may a little further along cast down whom they may and set up whom they will." "If they support heresy, I am done with them" (The church represented by this voice gave for foreign missions in 1902-03, $11.55, in 1907-08 nothing.) "I can hardly work for any national board till Willett disclaimers are made" (In 1902-03, $00.00; in 1907-08, $00.00). "If they do not quit it, we know of no better way than to stop giving" (The church here represented gave for foreign missions, in 1902-03, $4.50, and in 1907-08 $0..00). "If any of our missionary societies endorse said Mr. Willett, in occupying a place on the Centennial" (notice the perspicuity) "they have ceased to be fidei defensi, and I will no longer help to support them" (This church gave for foreign missions in 1902-03, $3.44, in 1907-08 $0.00. The minister who wrote the above was not with the church, however, in 1902-03). "As long as such men as Willett are thrust to the front in our National Conventions, thousands of good loyal churches will refuse to take collections, or forward contributions to the societies" (In 1902-03, $00.00, in 1907-08, $00.00). "Why are those friendly to destructive infidel higher criticism so persistently kept at the head of our missionary societies? Is not a reorganization of our missionary activities imperative?" The church represented by the minister writing the above gave for foreign missions in 1902-03, $10.75, in his absence, and nothing in 1907-08, he being present). "I hope you will keep up the fight until missionary society leaders understand that their true motives and doings are known by the brotherhood." (1902-03, $1.61. 1907-08, blank).

Another editorial preface: "Our people are getting down to the root of the matter" (as witnesseth the following):

"The missionary element should have no place on the Centennial program." "When a man gets up head in our organized work, he is there to stay, and no power we can exercise will dislodge him." "I protest against the action of our President-Secretary-Board."

The Climax of Humor.

Some brethren "join heartily" in the protests and "eagerly digest" the contents "every week."

Editorial: "As to the missionary contribution suffering, it is inevitable so long as the society encourages such teachers" (Society singular.)

The editorial preface closing the instalments of protests concludes: "Whoever attempts the exploitation of its (destructive criticisms) representatives, does so at the peril of the work he represents."

"In fact, I endorse the Standard," writes one.

The climax of humor is reached in the following editorial deliverance: "One thing is sure, we will not sit by in silent acquiescence and see our missionary progress of years blighted and our offerings cut in halves by those who seem determined to thrust this unwelcome leadership on our leadership."

Maybe it is not fair to say that the tooters beating this retreat are cowards. Maybe they are sulkers. Maybe they love the cash too ardently. Maybe they have sucked a lemon. Maybe they are merely religious mules, whose influence is more potent in the heels than in the head or heart. Some are honest, but ignorant. Others are among our noble men of faith, honest of heart and high of intellect, but betrayed into a false issue. With some it is simply "Where the Standard speaks we speak; where the Standard is silent, we are silent." With others it is, "Rejoice in a racket always; and again I say, rejoice." With all—barring motive—it is opposition to the Lord's appeal in the prayer, "That they all may be one, that the world may believe."

Gipsy Smith, The Man, His Spirit and Message

An Interview With the Famous Evangelist in Which He Replies to His Critics

By Perry J. Rice

Gipsy Smith, the famous English missioner, s now in Minneapolis, repeating the experinces he has had in various American cities uring the past winter. The mission opened n Saturday evening, April 17. Vast audinces have attended the meetings, and aleady the spiritual uplift is felt in many ircles.

Having been apprised of the criticism that ad been published in The Christian Century egarding himself and his work in Denver, nd having been informed that he could ecure a copy of the paper through me, he nvited me to call to see him. At his invi- ation I gave him the paper containing the rticle in question, and he read it through in ilence. Then, looking up, he asked: "Who s this man Tyler? He was not with us in Denver; I did not meet him." I replied: Mr. Tyler is pastor of the South Broadway Christian Church in Denver, and a very genial nan. I am sure if you had come into close ouch with each other you would have become ast friends." "But," said he, "the ministers of Denver seemed especially appreciative of my work. They gave me a dinner at the close f the mission, and presented me this beautiul leather hand-bag. The ministers did this, ut I do not remember meeting Mr. Tyler."

Four Years Pastor of a Church.

Referring to the article in the Century I sked if the statements therein presented vith reference to his early life as a preacher vere substantially correct. "Yes, only I was longer than one or two years in the 'hired hall' of which Mr. Tyler speaks, and later I was for four years pastor of an independent church of 900 members."

"Do you regard the use of the term 'Gipsy' as a valuable advertising asset in your work, and do you use it for that purpose?" "No, I do not. When I began my work I was known as 'Rodney Smith, the Gipsy Boy.' The newspapers called me that, and later they shortened the phrase associating the word 'Gipsy' with my surname and called me 'Gipsy Smith.' In England I am only known by that name." He then showed me a number of letters he had recently received from England and all of them were addressed: "My Dear Gipsy." "I use it," said he, "simply because it is the name by which, with no purpose of my own to have it so, I have become generally known."

Dominant Motive in Preaching.

"In the preparation of your sermons," I asked, "what is the dominant motive?" "It is to enforce the fundamentals of the Christian life and to bring my hearers to an absolute surrender to Christ. Of course, in my work, I have to avoid, so far as possible, controverted subjects. I begin with the assumption that the people to whom I am to preach know quite well the purposes of Christ's ministry. The great need is to enforce the ethical significance of it all, and to lead people to obedience to Christ's commands."

Speaking of baptism on his own accord, he said: "I am myself an immersed believer. In my work I try to be perfectly fair with people who come to me. Only yesterday a woman came to me and asked, 'Must I be baptized?' I replied, 'You read your New Testament, do you not,' and she said she did. 'You remember, do you not, the account given of the marriage feast at Cana of Galilee, how, when the wine gave out and they were wondering what to do, Mary, the mother of Jesus, moved quietly about, saying, "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it."' That is my answer to your question."

I wonder if any Disciple could give a better answer.

Not Equipped As a Theologian.

Gipsy Smith does not pretend to be a theologian, nor a great biblical scholar, but it is certainly far from the truth to intimate that he does not know the scriptures. Day after day he submits himself to a test that few of us would care to undergo. In the afternoon meetings he is always preceded by some local minister who speaks from any text he may choose for ten or fifteen minutes. The missioner does not know what is to be the text until it is announced publicly, but as soon as the first speaker has finished, he takes up the theme and goes on with it. This method is not calculated to result in great sermons, but it does test a man's knowledge of the English Bible, and thus far, in every instance, Gipsy Smith has proven himself to be perfectly familiar with the whole situation surrounding the text, and often presents a much more lucid interpretation of it than the man who has studied it and preceded him, though always doing honor to what has been said by the local minister. Nor can it be fairly said that he is "incapable of serious thought." In the sermon on "Repentance," which I suppose he preaches in every mission, and which can scarcely be objected to in any of its parts from the standpoint of the scriptures, he gives utterance to the following sentence in a way that impresses one that he has carefully weighed its significance: "Calvary is no substitute for the life that you should live." I asked him why he laid such emphasis upon this statement and he replied: "I do it to offset the idea that has often gained acceptance, that since Christ has died for us, and we are no longer under law but under grace, we therefore, if we believe in him, can do as we please." It is evident that he sees some of the follies of at least one theory of the atonement.

Arraignment of Church Members.

"Do you ever feel that your sharp arraignment of church members is likely to prejudice people against the church and thus to weaken its influence?" "No, I do not. This is how it works. I preach to church members pointing out the sham and hypocrisy of much that is done and said by professing Christians, and thus establish in the minds of all an ideal. The unconverted person sees that I am interested in elevating the standard of Christian living, that there is beauty and charm in the real Christian life and it appeals to him. If I should point out his sin he would at once be placed on the defensive and would be slow to yield. What I say regarding the life of many professors of religion is true, and needs to be said, and at the same time it seems to awaken the conscience and the desire of the unconverted. The Master followed a similar course. No one ever spoke so sharply of the sins of so-called religious people as he did."

Many church people are moved under the ministry of this simple man of God to seek a deeper Christian experience, and a closer walk with Christ. In the inquiry room a few evenings since I was assigned to speak with a man who had come to be helped. Upon entering into conversation with him I found that he was a preacher, a pastor, who had come to the city to attend the meetings, and had been so moved by the appeal of the evangelist that he desired to humble himself and seek a closer fellowship with Christ. He was an intelligent, good-appearing man. I wonder if it is not true of many of us that we need the spiritual tonic that comes from the message of such a man as Gipsy Smith. Are we not all feeling that we have fallen upon times when the church needs to be humbled, and when Christian people need to be brought to their knees in penitence and prayer? Personally I am not disposed to criticize the man who, with gentleness, can lay bare the secret faults of the heart and expose them to view.

Manner Not Harsh, but Appealing.

But Gipsy Smith is no ~~orator~~ ranter. He does not seek to gain notoriety by invective. His voice, even when most severely exposing the evils of our lives, is plaintive and appealing. His language is not coarse or vulgar, but refined. His manner is gentle and courteous. Though his utterances sometimes pierce like an arrow, still one feels that it is a friend who has spoken to him. No one can listen to him long without being impressed with the feeling that he passionately longs to lead people to Christ, and to righteousness. He is not self-seeking: he is as humble as any man I ever met, and his manner is so simple as to put one at once at ease in his presence.

I asked: "Do you not regard church membership important?" "Yes, indeed," said he, "and I try to emphasize that throughout my missions, but I have got to a place where I do not stop to count. It is enough to know that the churches and preachers have received a new lease of life, that the air is filled with the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit, and that men and women everywhere are having their hearts turned toward God and the best things."

Does Not Have to Count.

Isn't it refreshing to hear an evangelist say: "I have got to a place where I do not stop to count!" We have often criticized evangelists for counting, but now it seems that the tables have turned and we find a defray local expenses when missions are held, the work is carried on. F. B. Meyer has recently been in South Africa, and is now in the orient. Of course his missions in such places are not self-supporting. The other two men, Rev. Talfree Parr, and Mr. W. R. Lane, are working in destitute places in England. The surplus from my meetings is indispensable to the carrying on of this work, but every dollar of it is sacredly used for evangelistic purposes. The Council is no 'Syndicate.' It is a voluntary organization of Christian men who hope to lift evangelism to its New Testament place and do a much needed work."

Plan of Support Admirable.

I do not know how the plan impresses

Evangelist and Mrs. Rodney Smith.

pastor, our good Brother Tyler, criticizing the evangelist because the pastors can't count as many as they would wish. How easy it is to fall into the trap we have set for others.

"What have you to say with reference to the representations of the Christian Commonwealth as quoted by Mr. Tyler regarding the financial aspect of your missions?"

"Why did not Mr. Tyler quote the British Weekly? The Christian Commonwealth has never been any too sympathetic to our work and its representations are therefore colored. I am working under the direction of the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches of England. It is composed of well known ministers representing the various Free Churches. At present four men are employed to do exangelistic work. F. B. Meyer is one of them and I am another. They pay me a modest salary, and out of the funds collected in my meetings, only one-half of which go to the Council, the other half being reserved by local committees to other people but to my mind it is beyond criticism. The altruism of it commends it to all thoughtful people. Certainly it relieves the evangelist of all public censure, and can not fail to have happy reflex advantages. Every offering in Gipsy Smith's meetings is a missionary offering. I could wish the services in all our churches had a similar "dollar mark" on them.

I have felt as keenly as any one the shallowness of much that passes for evangelism. I have very seriously questioned the permanent value of such methods as are often employed. I would that all our churches would depend much more upon the methods of teaching and of personal work, but if we must have evangelists, and it seems that we must, give me such a man as Gipsy Smith, who with evident simplicity of speech and manner, and a passion for the souls of men, pleads with people to arise from the life of sin and live with Christ, and I will not complain.

Seven Deadly Sins

By Thomas Penn Ullom

It was my privilege and joy to attend the "Sixth Annual Conference of Eastern College Men Concerning the Christian Ministry," called under the auspices of Union Theological Seminary, Yale Divinity School and Hartford Theological Seminary and held in Hosmer Hall, Hartford, Conn., April 2-4. Purpose: "To present to those college men who are now deciding upon their life work, definite and reliable information concerning the opportunities and work of the Christian Ministry in this country." This union movement originated at Yale, although for two years previous Union had held a similar conference. The opening sentence of Mr. John R. Mott's notable book, "The Future Leadership of the Church," is that, "to secure able men for the Christian ministry is an object of transcendent, urgent and world-wide concern." Many agree with him in this declaration and hail with delight any movement which tends to interest young men in this high and holy calling.

Among the speakers were such men as Rev. B. W. Bacon, D. D., of Yale, Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, D. D., of New York city, Rev. Chauncey B. Brewster, D. D., Bishop of Connecticut, Dr. William Douglas Mackenzie, president of Hartford Theological Seminary, Rev. J. W. Cochrane, secretary Presbyterian Board of Education, Rev. Harry E. Fosdick, pastor First Baptist Church, Montclair, N. J., Rev. Henry Sloane Coffin, D. D., of Union Seminary and Mr. Robert E. Speer, secretary Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.

Some of the subjects discussed were: "The Inspirations of the Pastorate," "The Preacher and Present Day Problems," "Intellectual Preparation for the Ministry," "The College Student and the Ministry," "The Call to the Ministry," "The Temptations of the Ministry," "The Minister and the Nation," "The Permanent Power of the Preacher," "The Public Influence of the Ministry."

All of the addresses were given with much power and fervor. The interest was intense throughout. I will only attempt to give a few sentences from the addresses of Charles Sloane Coffin on

"Seven Deadly Sins."

"The minister is not immune from temptations. I might speak of jealosy, professionalism, flippancy and many others but I will confine myself to what I shall call seven deadly sins.

"1. LAZINESS. Dr. Dodds has said that 'fifty per cent of failures in the Christian ministry are due to laziness.' All men are as lazy as they dare to be. We need to have on our study table that old volume, 'Baxter's Reformed Pastor.' The fact that we have God as our partner leads us to lie down on God, I fear. No one outlines the work for us and there is no one to whom we must report. We are too often busy with the things we like to do and leave the rest, no doubt just as essential, undone. We trust too much to organization and neglect the personal service which is so necessary. We must give ourselves to the work if we expect success.

"2. COWARDICE. There are distinctly two classes of people in our churches today. In fact there are too many 'class' churches and I do not believe in them for one moment. The rich and poor should worship God together in harmony, sympathy and love. It is not Christian for the rich to say we will build a chapel for the poor around the corner. This is a time of social readjustment and we ought to preach Isaiah, Hosea and the teachings of Christ.

"3. UNREALITY. I will not say insincerity. Let each minister ask himself, 'Am I absolutely genuine?' 'Am I the dedicated man I am urging these men to be that I may present them perfect in Christ?' 'Was that sermon born in my soul?' 'Is it part and parcel of my life?' 'Can I from my inmost being and experience declare in reference to the fundamentals in life: Thus saith your Father in Heaven.' Real preaching as Phillips Brooks said is, 'truth through personality.'

"4. CONCEIT. To get up and talk before people fosters self-conceit. It is easy for the minister to become proud and arrogant because of flattery, hand clapping and cheers. I was taken back very much some days ago, when visiting at a certain home in my parish the mother told me that her little boy the night before in concluding his evening prayer, prayed to be made like Dr. Coffin. This broke me up. The very idea of you or myself becoming the embodiment of the Christian life. Beware of conceit.

"5. LACK OF INTEREST IN PEOPLE. A man told a certain pastor that he felt he took an interest in his soul but he did not care two cents for him. The secret of Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall's success was that he had the power of making a man feel that he was the most interesting person in the world to him at that moment.

"6. SEPSIS. This is a medical term and it has reference to a depleted system. So many ministers lose the early enthusiasm that once burned in their souls and then they often become pessimists and cynics. We should not let the fire go out. When we cease to burn our usefulness is at an end.

"7. LACK OF SPIRITUAL CONTAGIOUSNESS. You will remember that Paul desired to go to Rome in order that he might impart some spiritual gift to them to the end that they might be established. His very presence was to be an uplift to them. The minister's tool is himself. He must live in vital union with his Lord. Wherever he goes he should leave an atmosphere as though the very windows above had opened and the breezes of heaven had come in. His one business is to bring about a point of contact between earth and heaven, between the individual and his personal Saviour. Through him, those all around, in his company, should feel the inspiration of a true man of God. In the homes, church and in all places that he visits his supreme duty is to make God and the Kingdom of God the great realities and the only things worth while."

The Hero of An Hour

The facts concerning Father Gapon, who led so many of the poor unfortunate working people of St. Petersburg to a bloody end on "Red Sunday," have slowly been gotten together. From the debris of the Russian revolutionary junta at Geneva has come the following. Father Gapon did not meet his end on that dreadful day along with so many of his following but escaped to Switzerland. He set himself to organize a movement for the unification of all the elements which aimed at the overthrow of the Czar's government. He summoned a congress, at which the most extreme sections, impressed by the renown of Gapon's name, took part. At the first sittings of this congress the unity movement went to pieces owing to differences over the program to be adopted. Gapon failed not so much because he underrated these differences as because he was unable to grasp what they signified.

He then swerved back to the Social Democrats and sought to reconcile those who held that their program should include wholesale assassination of the Czar's agents with the minority, who were for educational propaganda. In this also he failed.

Meanwhile the October general strike in Russia had forced the Czar to yield the constitutional manifesto and a form of amnesty. Keenly expectant as to the future of their movement many of the emigrant comrades, Gapon among them, returned to Russia.

Gapon first tried to revive the old workmen's union which he had organized and sent out on that fatal march the previous January. He was defeated in this attempt by the opposition of the Committee of Workmen's Delegates, the body which had successfully carried through the general strike. This was the crucial stage of Gapon's career. The new proletarian leaders in Russia would not let him share their leadership. There is no evidence up to this point that he had consciously betrayed any movement. His chief attributes so far had been his vanity and appetite for praise, his lack of knowledge of affairs and of mental power. His elimination from the new direction of the revolutionary movement soured him.

After his failure to establish himself among the heads of the revolution he entered Count Witte's government and received his means of subsistence from that quarter. He was enabled to go abroad with government money, paid him on the railroad platform as he left the country.

He went to Monte Carlo and for a brief space treated himself to all the gilded dissipations that were going; the rest of the money he spent in Paris. He had now fallen to the depth when he would perform any Judas service for money to help him along with his pleasures. Such a man was a deadly rival of the spy Azoff; moreover, his former status in the revolutionary movement would probably tempt the political police to pay him from the funds that Azoff looked on as his own. He was marked down for death, sentenced by Azoff, and strangled by Comrade Ratenberg in a hired cottage at Izorki, near St. Petersburg, the day after he reached the capital.

A simple shepherd leading his flock, that was how he began. When the crash came and he found that if he was to fight on for his beloved factory workers he must be a silent inconspicuous wheel in the revolutionary machine his weak character collapsed.

Sleepy Time

Las' night I stayed up pretty late;
I didn't go to bed till eight.
An' then I cried to sit up more—
Eight's awful soon for chaps most four!
I told mamma that I'd jes stay
Broad wide awake in bed till day!
But she jes laughed an' hugged me tight,
An' then she took away the light.

An' left it dark as it could be—Blacker'n Egypt! I couldn't see
My own foot kicked up in the air,
An' had to pinch to see 'twas there.
It's funny how you feel at night—
When muvver's gone and so's the light.
Your froat all chokes up big an' dry,
You hate to holler, worse to cry.

You blink—an' blink—an' b-l-i-n-k—an' then
You're up in muvver's arms again!
An' it's so bright it must be day,
But—where did las' night go away?
An' muvver laughs an' says: "It's clear
You didn't sleep a wink, my dear!"
'Course I did not! I always stay
Broad wide awake in bed till day.

Miss Julia's Change of Heart

BY HARRIET L. SMITH.

"I guess you're wasting your ammunition," said Miss Julia lightly. "You see, I don't take much stock in foreign missions. As far as I've observed," she added, pausing to bite a thread, "there's enough to be done at home."

The president of the missionary society leaned back in her chair, and untied her bonnet strings. She perceived that the interview was likely to be lengthy.

"There's plenty of need right about us, Sister Lightbody, that's sure. And we ought to do the best that we can for those that are near, without neglecting the ones that are further away and more needy still."

Miss Julia shook her head unconcerned. "I believe in taking care of your own household before you start out to look after your neighbors. When we've converted the heathen at home, it'll be time enough to cross the ocean to look out for the heathen over there."

"I don't think you're quite consistent, Sister Lightbody. Right in this little town of ours there's plenty who are needy, but when they had that dreadful fire at East Unity, you worked as hard as anybody packing up food and clothes to send to the poor things that had been burned out. If you'd been real consistent, now, you'd have refused to do a thing as long as there was a hungry man or a ragged child left in our town."

Miss Julia did not attempt to reply to her friend's logic. Instead, she approached the question from another standpoint. "As far as that goes, I don't imagine those poor simple heathen across the water have much of an idea of the meaning of Christianity. If they can get enough to eat, they're ready to call themselves anything. Caroline said in her last letter, that she didn't believe that there was any disinterested ones among the native Christians, not in China anyhow. They're all in it for what they can get, Caroline says." The president of the missionary society suppressed a smile. "Let's see," she said, "How long has Caroline been in China? Nearly six months, isn't it?" "No-o. Not quite three," said Miss Julia. "But of course she depends a good deal on what her brother says." "O, Dick's getting interested in missions. That's good news." "I don't suppose Dick cares any more about foreign missions than he ever did," acknowledged Miss Julia. "There's quite a number of English and Americans there engaged in business, just as he is, and he has a good time. Trust Dick for that. And he's making Caroline have a good time, too. She's enjoying every minute she writes me but she says she doesn't believe the Chinese, even the ones who call themselves converted, have any idea of what Christianity really means. She thinks that the change in 'em, if there is any change, is all on the surface, and down underneath they're as much heathen as they ever were."

Mildly the president of the missionary society suggested that perhaps the missionaries were better judges as to this, than a young woman who had been visiting the country for three months, and who was avowedly devoting herself to pleasure and to sight-seeing, rather than to the consideration of the missionary problem. But Miss Julia thought the missionaries prejudiced. "It's easy to believe what you want to believe," she declared triumphantly. And so the discussion waged till the shadows of evening began to gather, and the president of the missionary society hurried home to get supper.

The letter from Caroline which Miss Julia had quoted was the last for some time. For two days later terrible news stirred all Christendom from center to circumference. The Boxer rebellion had broken out. Hideous tales of massacre and carnage found their way into type under glaring headlines. In many an American home men and women waited for word from the absent, word that did not come.

Julia Lightbody aged visibly as the days crawled by. She insisted on reading the long columns in the papers in which ghastly rumors and horrible forebodings took the place of the news it was impossible to obtain. Troops were being hurried to the scene. Threats were freely uttered. And Miss Julia, pale and hollow-eyed, sat with Caroline's picture on the stand before her, and the newspaper in her shaking hands. At last, when hope had yielded the field to despair and the anguish of certainty was taking the place of the agony of foreboding, the long deferred tidings came. "Safe!" That was all. Miss Julia collapsed, and the doctor talked gravely of brain fever, and her acquaintance to a woman, agreed that they had expected something of the sort. But joy is the most efficacious of remedies, and the exhausted, nerve-racked woman soon began to mend.

But there were anxious homes into which the same reassuring tidings did not come, homes where every ghastly fear was realized. And the president of the missionary society, on the occasion of the monthly meeting, found herself facing a crisis in the ranks of her co-workers in the organization. It

THE WHAT IF SERIES: II. WHAT IF BABIES BECAME BAD BOYS AND GROUCHY GIRLS?

One spring morning mother Nature was sweeping the snow off the carpet of earth when she found a little green shoot that had just appeared above the soil. It had been a little roly-poly seed that got the shivers last November and crawled under a clod to keep warm. But when the sun came out in April it felt its blankets to be too heavy and began to perspire. One day a frisky breeze had happened along and cried down through a peep-hole, "Wake up and let's play." And the little seed had called out, "Just as soon as I get my spring clothes on I'm coming right up."

So it was that one day mother Nature found it with a new green coat on, playing tag with a frisky breeze. Straightway she fell in love with the little shoot and hugging it up to her bosom, cried, "You dear cute little thing, you!" Then she became a mother to the little shoot. Every few days it was given a shower bath and the winds were shifted so that the warm breeze fondled it. And the little shoot waxed and grew, while mother Nature looked proudly on.

But one day she became worried. Shoot was not shooting just right. His green color was becoming dull and lusterless, and queer ugly little things were breaking out all over him. However, she just comforted herself and said, "Shoot is just sowing his wild oats. He will come out all right in the end." At last there came a warm night, like the nights when bad boys steal watermelons and put tick-tacks on windows, and of course Shoot was into meanness, too. In fact, Shoot went clear to the bad. When mother Nature came to his bedside to wake him for the day, the queer little buds had bursted and instead of becoming flowers they had become—burrs. Then mother Nature's heart was broken and she bent her head and wept. For listen; Shoot was —a weed.

Yes, that's true. Shoot couldn't help being a weed. But you and I can. Remember, we are I's, not It's. All the more shame then, if mothers mourn and fathers frown because babies become bad boys and grouchy girls.

seemed to some of them that the time had come for shaking off the dust of their feet against the land which had made martyrs of its well-wishers.

"When I think of that sweet little woman who talked to us less than two years ago and was so happy and enthusiastic over her plans for work—when I think of her dying that way," one of them declared, brushing the tears from her streaming eyes, "I declare I don't feel as if I ever wanted anything more to do with sending missionaries to China. I'm sorry if its wrong, but I can't help feeling that way."

The troubled president was about to answer her, when the door opened and Julia Lightbody entered the room. She came down the aisle hastily, like one who has news to tell. Those weeks of anguished waiting had whitened the hair about her temples and etched deep lines in her face, and a pitying hush fell upon them all. Miss Julia did not sit down. Instead she walked to the front of the room and stood before the president. "There's something I want to tell you all," she said. "I've hurried as fast as I could, for fear I'd lose courage. I'm not used to talking before a crowd, as you know very well, and it isn't easy for me to own up when I've been wrong, but if the Lord will give me strength and you're willing to listen, there's something I'm going to say." "Why, of course, Sister Lightbody," said the president, and Miss Julia faced about.

"I guess it's no secret to the most of you," Miss Julia began unexpectedly, "that I've never taken much stock in foreign missions. I've excused myself by pretending it was because there was so much to be done at home, but down in my heart I knew all the time there was another reason. And when the news of this dreadful rebellion first came, and I was well-nigh distracted, wondering whether my sister's children were alive or dead, there was another thing that kept running through my head. 'You thought that a heathen religion was good enough for Chinese,' I told myself. 'You didn't think it was worth while to tell them about a religion of love and kindness and doing unto others as you would be done by. And now those you love best in the world have been murdered by a mob that might have been Christians if you'd done your duty.' 'You see I sort of made myself entirely responsible," explained Miss Julia. "Perhaps that was a little unreasonable, owing to my being in such a state of mind. But I don't know as it is a bit more unreasonable than pretending that you're not responsible at all.

"I got a letter from Caroline today, my first letter since the news of the outbreak came. I read it through more than once before I understood a thing it said. Every word was saying 'She's alive, she's alive' and I couldn't hear anything more.

"At last I got to the point where I could understand that she was writing me of her rescue. It seems that when the rioting broke out, Richard was in another part of the city, and he couldn't get to her. He was frantic, poor boy, but he realized that he couldn't go ten steps without being cut down, so he had to stay quiet hoping that the disorder wouldn't be in the quarter of the city where Caroline was, and raving like a madman when he thought of what she might be enduring at that minute.

"God knows what her fate would have been if it hadn't been for a Chinese convert who took her through the street to the missionaries in disguise. He brought her some Chinese clothes to put on over her own, but even at that, he was taking a terrible risk. If the people on the street hadn't been too excited to notice much, they'd have seen that Caroline wasn't a Chinese woman, and then it's more than likely that both of 'em would have been murdered on the spot. It seemed a lifetime, Caroline says, before they reached the mission building, and when one of the women ran forward and caught her in her arms, Caroline fainted away.

"When she came to she asked about the man who had brought her. She hadn't even had a chance to thank him, you see. They told her he had gone out to attend to some things it was necessary to have done, and which it wasn't safe for a white man to attempt. They said he would be back in an hour or two. But he never came. Afterward they learned why. Somebody had seen him taking Caroline through the street and guessed the truth. They accused him of helping one of the foreigners to escape and he wouldn't deny it. That was his idea of being a Christian, to tell the truth even if it cost him his life. So they killed him," said Miss Julia, turning very white.

There was a long pause, during which no one moved. "I've marked a verse in my Bible for that man," Miss Julia continued at last. "And it is this, 'Of whom the world was not worthy.' Somebody's prayers and sacrifices made a Christian out of that poor heathen whom I didn't think worth teaching. I don't know how much this society has done, but I'll venture to say that if all you've given and all you've done made one such Christian as that, you ought to go down on your knees and thank the Lord for his goodness, the same as I thanked him that there were others more clear-sighted and unselfish and Christian than I was. For if there hadn't been, my girl would have died at the hands of the mob, and that is as much as I should ever have known."

Miss Julia made a movement as if to sit down, then checked herself.

"There's one thing more. You've all heard me say I didn't believe in foreign missions. You've all heard my selfish, senseless reasons. But my eyes have been opened. If you're not ashamed to have me, I want to be one of you. I want to do what I can to help in making Christians like the one I told you about, Christians of whom the world is not worthy." The president attempted to answer, but her usual fluency had deserted her. She looked about her silently but they understood. In a moment all were on their knees.

Woman's Sphere

—Miss Flora Wilson, daughter of Secretary of Agriculture Wilson, made her American debut to the public as a singer at a concert she gave in the ballroom of the Plaza, New York. It is probable that next season will see her a member of the Metropolitan Opera company.

—Elizabeth Chesser, writing of the women in prison in England, says that skilled workers are seldom among them. It is generally the woman without a trade or education that gets into trouble and it does not seem right, she says, that a girl arrested for a first offense should be obliged to associate with hardened criminals. The nobility of labor and the grandeur of the work are the things that an ideal system of prison training will endeavor to teach.

—The appointment of the Baroness Elizabeth Rosen, daughter of the Russian ambassador to the United States, as maid of honor to the empress of Russia has been gazetted.

—Lady Frances Balfour, Lady Stachey, Miss Cicely Hamilton, Miss Lownes and Mrs. Richard Grant compose the editorial committee of the new monthly, the Englishwoman, which has just been started in London. Its main object will be the promotion of equal suffrage, but it will publish articles and stories on many other subjects, including art, theater, literature, music and the more recent discoveries in the field of science.

—Mrs. George Cornwallis West, formerly Lady Randolph Churchill, well known in New York society many years ago as Jennie Jerome, is soon to visit that city, for the first time in many years, as a lecturer under the auspices of the League for Political Education.

—It is reported from London that the scenes of Mrs. Humphrey Ward's next novel will be laid in Canada, and that it is to appear serially in the Cornhill Magazine.

—Mrs. Jefferson Davis, wife of United States Senator Davis, has recently died at Little Rock, Ark. She was Miss Ina McKenzie before her marriage to Senator Davis.

—The "Mother of the Texas Republic," Mrs. Fanny Van Zandt, has just died at Fort Worth in her ninety-fifth year. She was the widow of the late Isaac Van Zandt, who negotiated and brought about the treaty annexing Texas to the United States. Mrs. Van Zandt took a prominent part in the affairs of the republic when Sam Houston was president. She leaves 103 descendants.

—Society women of Washington, D. C., supervised the cleaning of the streets of the capital city in most thorough style last week. Through the efforts of the Twentieth Century club the interest of one woman in each city block was enlisted to act as chairman for that block, and she in turn endeavored to interest all the other housewives in the block. In this way each woman attending to her own premises produced in the aggregate a clean city.

Persons of Interest

—Algernon Charles Swinburne, who has just died at the age of seventy-two, was the last of the distinguished line of Victoria poets. He wrote with equal facility in English, French and Italian. Swinburne defended Dante Gabriel Rossetti in the pamphlet "Under the Microscope." His "Poems and Ballads" made him much talked about.

—William Allen White, best known as the editor of the Emporia Gazette and now one of the editors of the American Magazine, has ventured into the novel field. His book is to be published this month under the title, "A Certain Rich Man."

—James R. Garfield, former secretary of the interior, has returned to Cleveland, after several years of public service. Mr. Garfield will engage in the practice of law.

—General Sir O'Moore Creagh, who has been definitely selected to follow Lord Kitchener in the supreme command in India towards the close of the present year, has served for the past two years or so as Military Secretary at the India Office, where his knowledge of the Dependency and its military problems has been well-nigh invaluable to Lord Morley and the permanent officials. He is an officer of the Indian Army, with which he has served for nearly forty years. Like many of our other leading generals, General Creagh is an Irishman and hails from Clare.

—Dr. Daniel K. Pearsons of Chicago, capitalist and philanthropist, who has been seriously ill in California reached the age of eighty years April 14. Born in Vermont and a practitioner of medicine fifteen years, he abandoned his profession for business in 1860 and amassed a fortune in real estate transactions. He has been the "angel" of more than two score colleges and hospitals.

—The members of President Taft's cabinet are great horsemen. Mr. Taft himself as well as Secretaries MacVeagh, Meyer, and Ballinger are very fond of horseback riding. Secretary Dickinson is the owner of the famous Belle Meade stock farm in Tennessee. Secretaries Wilson and Nagel are fond of driving horses.

—Former Vice President C. W. Fairbanks, accompanied by his wife and daughter, arrived in Honolulu April 23 and will remain until May 11 on their way to Japan.

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XIV.

The Unexpected.

The sun beat down on the prairie, which was already losing its flush of green, but it was cool where Maud Barrington and her aunt stood in the shadow of the bluff by Silverdale Grange. The birches, tasselled now with whispering foliage, divided the homestead from the waste which would lie white and desolate under the parching heat, and that afternoon it seem to the girl that the wall of green shut out more than the driving dust and sun-glare from the Grange, for where the trees were thinner she could see moving specks of men and horses athwart the skyline.

They had toiled in the sun-baked furrow since the first flush of crimson streaked the prairie's rim, and the chill of dusk would fall upon the grasses before their work was done. Those men who bore the burden and heat of the day were, the girl knew, helots now. but there was in them the silent vigor and something of the somberness of the land of rock and forest they came from, and a time would come when others would work for them. Winning slowly, holding grimly, they were moving on, while secure in its patrician tranquility Silverdale stood still, and Maud Barrington smiled curiously as she glanced down at the long white robe that clung very daintily about her and then towards her companions in the tennis field. Her apparel had cost many dollars in Montreal, and there was a joyous irresponsibility in the faces of those she watched.

It is a little unequal, isn't it, aunt?" she said. "One feels inclined to wonder what we have done that we should have no exemption from the charge laid upon the first tiller of the soil that we, and the men who are plodding through the dust there, are descended from."

Miss Barrington laughed a little as she glanced with a nod of comprehension at the distant toilers, and more gravely towards the net. Merry voices came up to her through the shadows of the trees as English lad and English maiden, lissom and picturesque in many-hued jackets and light dresses, flitted across the little square of velvet green. The men had followed the harrow and seeder a while that morning. Some of them, indeed, had for a few hours driven a team, and then left the rest to the hired hands, for the stress and sweat of effort that was to turn the wilderness into a granary was not for such as they.

"Don't you think it is all made up to those others?" she asked.

"In one sense—yes," said the girl. "Of course, one can see that all effort must have its idealistic aspect, and there may be men who find their compensation in the thrill of the fight, and the knowledge of work well done when they rest at night. Still, I fancy most of them only toil to eat, and their views are not revealed to us. We are, you see, women—and we live at Silverdale."

Her aunt smiled again. "How long is it since the plow crossed the Red River, and what is Manitoba now? How did those mile furrows come there, and who drove the road that takes the wheat out through the granite of the superior shore? It was more than their appetites that impelled those men, my dear. Still, it is scarcely wise to expect too much when one meets them, for though one could feel it is presumptious to forgive its deficiencies, the Berserk type of manhood is not conspicuous for its refinement."

For no apparent reason Maud Barrington evaded her aunt's gaze. "You," she said dryly, "have forgiven one of that type a good deal already, but, at least, we have never seen him when the fit was upon him."

Miss Barrington laughed. "Still, I have no doubt that, sooner or later, you will enjoy the spectacle."

Just then, a light wagon came up behind them, and when one of the hired men helped them in they swept out of the cool shade into the dust and glare of the prairie, and when some little time later, with the thud of hoofs and rattle of wheels softened by the bleaching sod, they rolled down a rise, there was spread out before them evidence of man's activity.

Acre by acre, gleaming chocolate brown against the gray and green of the prairie, the wheat loam rolled away, back to the ridge, over it, and on again. It was such a breadth of sowing as had but once, when wheat was dear, been seen at Silverdale, but still across the foreground, advancing in echelon, came lines of dusty teams, and there was a meaning in the furrows they left behind them, for they were not plowing where the wheat had been. Each wave of lustrous clods that rolled from the gleaming shares was so much rent from the virgin prairie, and a promise of what would come when man had fulfilled his mission and the wilderness would blossom. There was a wealth of food stored, little by little during ages past counting, in every yard of the crackling sod to await the time when the toiler with the sweat of the primeval curse upon his forehead should unseal it with the plow. It was also borne in upon Maud Barrington that the man who directed those energies was altogether without discernment, or one who saw further than his fellows and had an excellent courage, when he flung his substance into the furrows while wheat was going down. Then as the hired man pulled up the wagon she saw him.

A great plow with triple shares had stopped at the end of the furrow, and the leading horses were apparently at variance with the man who, while he gave of his own strength to the uttermost, was asking too much from them. Young and indifferently broken, tortured by swarming insects, and galled by the strain of the collar, they had lain back their ears, and the wickedness of the bronco strain shone in their eyes. One rose almost upright amid a clatter of harness, its mate squealed savagely, and the man who loosed one hand from the head-stall, flung out an arm. Then he and the pair whirled round together amid the trampled clods in a blurred medley of spume-flecked bodies, soil-stained jean, flung-up hoofs, and an arm that swung and smote again. Miss Barrington grew a trifle pale as she watched, but a little glow crept into her niece's eyes.

The struggle, however, ended suddenly, and hailing a man who plodded behind another team, Winston picked us his broad hat, which was trampled into shapelessness, and turned towards the wagon. There was dust and spume upon him, a rent in the blue shirt, and the knuckles of one hand dripped red, but he laughed as he said, "I did not know we had an audience, but this, you see, is necessary."

"Is it?" asked Miss Barrington, who glanced at the plowing. "When wheat is going down?"

Winston nodded. "Yes," he said. "I mean, to me; and the price of wheat is only one part of the question."

Miss Barrington stretched out her hand, though her niece said nothing at all. "Of course, but I want you to help us down. Maud has an account you have not sent in to ask you for."

Winston first turned the two men who now stood by the idle machine. "You'll have to drive those beasts of mine as best you can, Tom, and Jake will take your team. Get them off again now. This piece of breaking has to be put through before we loose again."

Then he handed his vistors down, and Maud Barrington fancied as he walked with them to the house that the fashion in which the damaged hat hung down over his eyes would have rendered most other men ludricous. He left them a space in his bare sitting-room, which suggestd only grim utility, and Miss Barrington smiled when her niece glanced at her.

"And this is how Lance, the profligate, lives!" said she.

Maud Barrington shook her head. "No," she said. "Can you believe that this man was ever a prodigal?"

Her aunt was a trifle less astonished than she would once have been, but before she could answer, Winston, who had made a trifling change in his clothing, came in.

"I can give you some green tea, though I am afraid it might be a good deal better than it is, and our cookery is not all you have been used to," he said. "You see, we have only time to think of one thing until the sowing is through."

Miss Barrington's eyes twinkled. "And then?"

"Then," said Winston, with a little laugh, "there will be prairie hay to cut, and after that the harvest coming on."

"In the meanwhile, it was business that brought me here, and I have a check with me," said Maud Barrington. "Please let us get it over first of all."

Winston sat down at a table and scribbled on a strip of paper. "That," he said gravely, "is what you owe me for the plowing."

There was a little flush in his face as he took the check the girl filled in, and both felt somewhat grateful for the entrance of a man in blue jean with the tea. It was of very indifferent quality, and he had sprinkled a good deal on the tray, but Winston felt a curious thrill as he watched the girl pour it out at the head of the bare table. Her white dress gleamed in the light of a dusty window, and the shadowy cedar boarding behind her forced up each line of the shapely figure. Again the maddening temptation took hold of him, and he wondered whether he had betrayed too much when he felt the elder lady's eyes upon him. There was a tremor in his brown fingers as he took the cup held out to him, but his voice was steady.

"You can scarcely fancy how pleasant this is," he said. "For eight years, in fact ever since I left England, no woman has ever done any of these graceful little offices for me."

Miss Barrington glanced at her niece, and both of them knew that, if the lawyer had traced Courthorne's past correctly, this could not be true. Still, there was no disbelief in the elder lady's eyes, and the girl's faith remained unshaken.

"Eight years," she said, with a little smile, "is a very long while."

"Yes," said Winston, "horribly long, and one year at Silverdale is worth them all—that is, a year like this one, which is going to be remembered by all who have sown wheat on the prairie, and that leads up to something. When I have plowed all my own holding, I shall not be content, and I want to make another bargain. Give me the use of your unbroken land, and I will find horses, seed, and men, while we will share what it yields when the harvest is in."

The girl was astonished. This, she knew, was splendid audacity, for the man had already staked very heavily on the crop he had sown, and while the daring of it stirred her she sat silent a moment.

"I could lose nothing, but you will have to bring out a host of men, and have risked so much," she said. "Nobody but you and me and three or four others in all the province is plowing more than half his holdings."

The suggestion of comradeship set Winston's blood tingling, but it was with a little laugh he turned over the pile of papers on the table, and then took them up in turn.

"'Very little plowing has been done in the tracts of Minnesota previously alluded to. Farmers find wheat cannot be grown at present prices, and there is apparently no prospect of a rise,'" he read. "'The Dakota wheat-growers are mostly fallowing. They can't quite figure how they would get eighty cents for the dollar's worth of seeding this year. Milling very quiet in Winnipeg. No inquiries from Europe coming in, and Manitoba dealers, generally, find little demand for harrows or seeders this year. Reports from Assiniboia seem to show that the one hope this season will be mixed farming and the neglect of cereals.'"

"There is only one inference," he said. "When the demand comes, there will be nothing to meet it with."

"When it comes," said Maud Barrington quietly. "But you who believe it will stand alone."

"Almost," said Winston. "Still, there are a few much cleverer men who feel as I do. I can't give you all my reasons, or read you the sheaf of papers from the Pacific slope, London, New York, Australia, but while men lose hope, and little by little the stocks run down, the world must be fed. Just as sure as the harvest follows the sowing, it will wake up suddenly to the fact that it is hungry. They are buying cotton and scattering their money in other nation's bonds in the old country now, for they and the rest of Europe forget their necessities at times, but is it impossible to picture them finding their granaries empty and clamoring for bread?"

It was a crucial test of faith, and the man knew it, as the woman did. He stood alone, with the opinions of the multitude against him, but there was, Maud Barrington felt, a great if undefinable difference between his quiet resolution and the gambler's recklessness. Once more the boldness of his venture stirred her, and this time there was a little flash in her eyes as she bore witness to her perfect confidence.

"You shall have the land, every acre of it, to do what you like with, and I will ask no questions whether you win or lose," she said.

Then Miss Barrington glanced at him in turn. "Lance, I have a thousand dollars I want you to turn into wheat for me."

Winston's fingers trembled, and a darker hue crept into his tan. "Madam," he said, "I can take no money from you."

"You must," said the little, white-haired lady. "For your mother's sake, Lance. It is a brave thing you are doing, and you are the son of one who was my dearest friend."

Winston turned his head away, and both women wondered when he looked round again. His face seemed a trifle drawn, and his voice was strained.

"I hope," he said slowly, "it will in some degree make amends for others I have done. In the meanwhile, there are reasons why your confidence humiliates me."

Miss Barrington rose and her niece after her. "Still, I believe it is warranted, and you will remember there are two women who have trusted you, hoping for your success. And now, I fancy we have kept you too long."

Winston stood holding the door open a moment, with his head bent, and then suddenly straightened himself.

"I can at least be honest with you in this venture," he said with a curious quietness.

Nothing further was said, but when his guests drove away Winston sat still a while and then went back very grim in face to his plowing. He had passed other unpleasant moments of that kind since he came to Silverdale, and long afterwards the memory of them brought a flush to his face. The excuses he had made seemed worthless when he strove to view what he had done, and was doing, through those women's eyes.

It was dusk when he returned to the homestead, worn out in body but more tranquil in mind, and stopped a moment in the doorway to look back on the darkening sweep of the plowing. He felt with no misgivings that his time of triumph would come, and in the meanwhile the handling of this great farm with all the aids that money could buy him was a keen joy to him; but each time he met Maud Barrington's eyes he realized the more surely that the hour of his success must also see accomplished an act of abnegation, which he wondered with a growing fear whether he coud find the strength for. Then as he went in a man who cooked for his hired assistants came to meet him.

"There's a stranger inside waiting for you," he said.

The room was almost dark when Winston entered it, and stood still a moment staring at a man who sat quietly watching him. His appearance was curiously familiar, but Winston could not see his face until he moved forward another step or two. Tnen he stopped once more, and the two saying nothing looked at one another. It was Winston who spoke first, and his voice was very even.

"What do you want here?" he asked.

The other man laughed. "Isn't that a curious question when the place is mine? You don't seem overjoyed to see me come to life again."

Winston sat down. "We need not go into that. I asked you what you want."

"Well," said Courthorne dryly, "it is not a great deal. Only the means to live in a manner more befitting a gentleman than I have been able to do lately."

"You have not been prospering?" and Winston favored his companion with a slow scrutiny.

"No," and Courthorne laughed again. "You see, I could pick up a tolerable good living as Lance Courthorne, but there is very little to be made at my business when you commence in new fields as an unknown man."

"Well," said Winston coldly, "I don't know that it wouldn't be better to face my trial than stay here at your mercy. So far as my inclinations go, I would sooner fight than have any further dealings with a man like you."

Courthorne shook his head. "I fixed up the thing too well, and you would be convicted. Still, we'll not go into that, and you will not find me unreasonable. A life at Silverdale would not suit me, and you know by this time that it would be difficult to sell the place, while I don't know where I could find a tenant who would farm it better than you. That being so, it wouldn't be good policy to bleed you too severely. Still, I want a thousand dollars in the meanwhile. It's mine, you see."

Winston sat still a minute. He was sensible of a fierce distrust and hatred of the man before him, but he felt he must at least see the consummation of his sowing.

"Then you shall have it on condition that you go away, and stay away, until harvest is over. After that, I will send for you and shall have more to tell you. If in the meantime you come back here, or hint that I am Winston, I will surrender to the police, or decide our differences in another fashion."

Courthorne nodded. "That is direct," he said. "One knows where he is when he deals with a man who talks as you do. Now, are you not curious as to the way I cheated both the river and the police?"

"No," said Winston grimly, "not in the least. We will talk business together when it is necessary, but I can only decline to discuss anything else with you."

Courthorne laughed. "There's nothing to be gained by pretending to misunderstand you, but it wouldn't pay me to be resentful when I'm graciously willing to let you work for me. Still, I have been inclined to wonder how you were getting on with my estimable relatives and connections. One of them has, I hear, unbent a trifle towards you, but I would like to warn you not to presume on any small courtesy shown you by the younger Miss Barrington."

Winston stood up and set his back to the door. "You heard my terms, but if you mention that lady again in connection with me, it would suit me equally well to make good all I owe you very differently."

Courthorne did not appear in any way disconcerted, but, before he could answer, a man outside opened the door.

"Here's Sergeant Stimson and one of his troopers wanting you," he said.

Winston looked at Courthorne, but the latter smiled. "The visit has nothing to do with me. It is probably accidental, but I fancy Stimson knows me, and it wouldn't be advisable for him to see us both together. Now, I wonder whether you could make it fifteen hundred dollars."

"No," said Winston. "Stay if it pleases you."

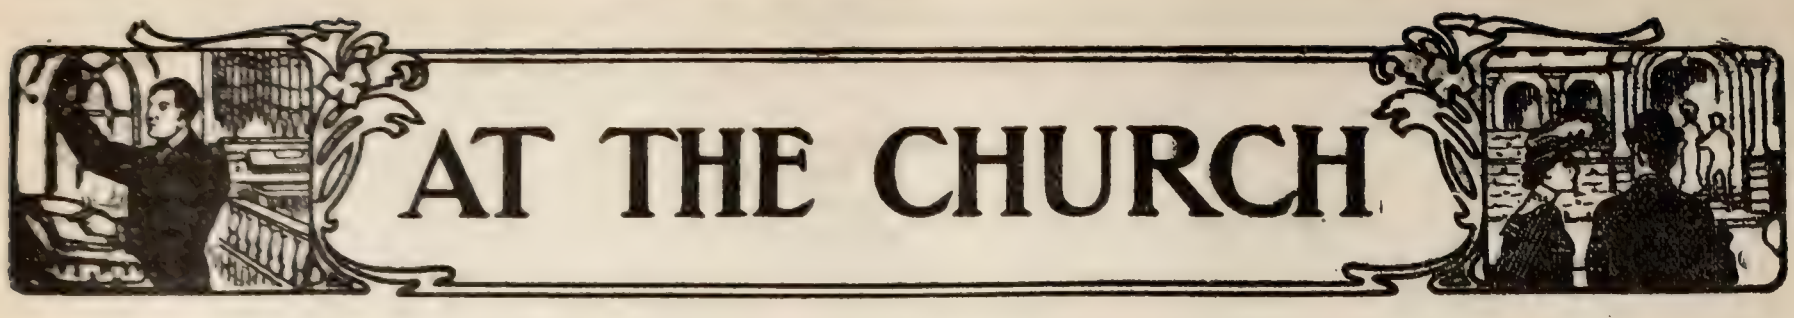
Courthorne shook his head. "I don't know that it would. You don't do it badly, Winston."

He went out by another door, almost as the grizzled sergeant came in and stood still, looking at the master of the homestead.

"I haven't seen you since I came here, Mr. Courthorne, and now you remind me of another man I once had dealings with," he said.

Winston laughed a little. "I scarcely fancy that is very civil, Sergeant."

"Well," said the prairie-rider, "there is a difference, when I look at you more closely. Let me see, I met you once or twice back there in Alberta?"



He appeared to be reflecting, but Winston was on his guard. "More frequently, I fancy, but you had nothing definite against me, and the times have changed. I would like to point that out to you civilly. Your chiefs are also on good terms with us at Silverdale, you see."

The sergeant laughed. "Well, sir, I meant no offense, and called round to requisition a horse. One of the Whitesod boys has been deciding a quarrel with a neighbor with an ax, and while I fancy they want me at once, my beast got his foot in a badger-hole."

"Tell Tom in the stables to let you have your choice," said Winston.

The sergeant went out, and when the beat of hoofs sank into the silence of the prairie,

Cities of Galatia*

The church had been planted at Antioch by the preaching of Paul and Barnabas. When the two missionaries were beset by hostile crowds they left the city with that characteristic gesture of an oriental, shaking off the dust as a token of reproach and witness against them. They then made their way to Iconium, the modern Koniah, a distance of eighty miles southwestward. This was an important place and probably a Roman colony with imperial privileges. Here they sought the synagogue first of all in order that they might reach the Jewish population, and made this the base of their evangelism in that city. It was not the only place, however, in which they preached, as is evident from the fact that not only Jews but Greeks also believed, and these latter would hardly be reached in the synagogue. They remained in this city for a considerable time and the progress of the faith was rapid. Converts were won to the gospel by the work of the missionaries and miracles were wrought by them in demonstration of their authority as witnesses for Christ.

Flight from Iconium.

But the prejudice of the people was moved by the argument of those Jews who were not minded to accept the teaching of the apostles. A division occurred and gradually violence was resorted to. It was the same story which was so frequently repeated in the apostolic days. A mob is easily assembled and roused to outrage and violence in an eastern city. The missionaries could only betake themselves to flight in order to preserve their lives, and they left Iconium after the accomplishment of the work for which they had come,—the establishment of a group of believers in Jesus.

Their next field of operation was to the south of Iconium. Whether they went directly to the cities of Lystra and Derbe or worked in the region of which these cities were the chief is not quite clear from the account. But at least the two towns were scenes of apostolic effort, for there they preached the gospel. In one of them there happened an event which was deemed by Luke worthy of record in the narrative of Paul's apostolic ministry.

The Visit of the Gods.

In the city of Lystra there was a temple of Jupiter, the Roman father-god. At this temple people were accustomed to assemble with offerings on stated occasions in honor of the gods, of which Jupiter was the chief. If was an ancient tradition in that region that on one occasion two of their deities had visited the people in the guise of men and had been neglected or mistreated by all save one old man and his wife, Philemon and Baucis. These two old people had entertained the strangers and had received, as a reward, the gift of immortality, while all the rest of the people had been turned into wolves. It was thus that legend accounted for the name of the district, Lycaonia (wolf country). Perhaps some remembrance of this story was in the mind of the people when Paul and Barnabas came to their city and performed the work of healing.

The Lame Man Healed.

At the gate of Lystra there sat a cripple, who perhaps chose that advantageous place to beg. In that same gate Paul stopped to speak to the people who assembled there for purposes of trade and counsel. Paul's attention was attracted by the lame man who seemed unusually interested in what he said and perhaps showed signs of conviction under the preaching of the apostle. To him Paul spoke with command, "Stand up on your feet." The cripple obeyed the command and instantly leaped up, demonstrating the power of God which the apostle had employed. Such an event was enough to rouse the multitude to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. They were sure now that the gods had come to them again.

The Speech of Lycaonia.

In the speech of their native province they shouted that Jupiter and Mercury had visited them. Barnabas, who was perhaps the taller and more impressive of the two missionaries, they thought to be Jupiter, and Paul, the readier and more eager speaker, they thought was Mercury, the interpreter and messenger of the gods. Apparently their language was not understood by Paul and Barnabas who would have been quick to see the meaning and purpose of their shouting. Using the Greek speech, which was everywhere a common dialect of the age since the wars of Alexander, the apostles did not learn the drift of the popular clamor until a procession was formed and sacrificial beasts, actually draped with garlands for the altar, were driven up to the temple and the work of sacrifice in honor of the supposed gods was begun.

The Sacrifice Refused.

When they really understood what the people were saying in their native dialect and comprehended the proposed sacrilege, the apostles were aroused to the keenest apprehension and with every manifestation of horror and grief cast themselves among the people with rent garments, and begged them to desist from these heathenish acts. It was perhaps their best opportunity to impress the crowd with the difference between Christianity and heathenism. Instead of many gods there was One; instead of these vain offerings to images, God wished acts of goodness and kindness to all men. He had never left himself without witness, because all his acts of providence were marked by love. He had not always corrected men in days gone by, although he had given frequent opportunity for them to know his will. But he could not endure such base imitations of true worship as the killing of innocent animals and the mockeries of heathen worship. By such arguments, though with difficulty they restrained the people from their first intent.

The Assault on Paul.

It is easy to believe that the multitude of Lystrians who had thus been disappointed in their worship of the gods were in no favorable mood when Paul and Barnabas finally convinced them that they were but ordinary men. Something of resentment perhaps lingered in their hearts. At any rate, it was not difficult for Jewish emissaries from Antioch and Iconium, the towns where the apostles had just preached, to persuade the multitude that the men were dangerous and should be silenced. That the Jews were the leaders in the plan is clear both from the reference to those who were foremost and also because of their method of treating Paul. Stoning was a strictly Jewish custom. Gathering the rocks and rubbish from the street they hurled them at the apostle until he fell down apparently dead. His body, supposedly lifeless, was then dragged out of the city. Perhaps in such treatment Paul was bearing witness in his own body to the sufferings of Christ and to those deeds of outrage in which he himself had been the leader against the disciples of Jesus in Jerusalem.

Paul's Recovery and Departure.

Already there was a little circle of disciples in the city. Some time had apparently passed since the apostles had come to that place and believers had been won. These now gathered about the body of Paul whom they mourned as dead. But to their astonishment he recovered consciousness and arose and presently went back with them into the city. He did not long remain, however, but on the following day, feeling it best to go elsewhere and leave the disciples to work out for a time their program of Christian service, he took Barnabas and went on his way. He must have suffered for days from the bruises of that awful ordeal and no doubt bore the marks for life.

The Work in Derbe.

The next scene of their operations was in Derbe, which was probably some sixteen miles southeast from Lystra. These sites are not identified with positive certainty, but the work of Professor Ramsey in Asia Minor has done much to clear up the dark places in Luke's narrative. In the entire region of these two cities they preached, probably visiting the villages and small towns as well as the larger cities. In Derbe there seems to have been no disturbance; at least none is mentioned. Perhaps the Jews thought Paul was dead, and Barnabas, the more quiet of the two, need not be further troubled. At least no attempt was made upon his life.

The Churches Revisited.

When the two missionaries had finished their work in this region, they thought it time to return to the church in Antioch of Syria and make report of their work. But with extraordinary bravery they retraced their steps through the very cities in which they had been so mistreated. They did not wish to leave the new churches without further exhortation. Probably they confined their efforts to quiet meetings with the brethren, in which the practices and customs of the new faith were explained still further. Nor did they forget to assure the disciples that they need not be surprised if they were called upon to suffer for the name of Jesus; through just such trials must the kingdom of God be entered and through such must it come to its strength and power in each of the churches. Elders or shepherds were chosen, perhaps by the churches, upon the advice of the apostles, and perhaps by the apostles themselves. The elders were the aged and revered men of the groups, who were made spiritual leaders after the analogy of the synagogue. Christianity easily adopted the social and religious customs already in vogue in the countries to which it went, and the synagogue was the easiest pattern to follow in Jewish communities. With prayer and fasting these men were solemnly set apart to their task as teachers and overseers of the church.

The Return to Syria.

From Antioch they made their way southward over the route by which they had come up from the seacoast a few months before. Now they stopped at Perga, which had been in their original plan on their arrival from Cyprus. Then they went down to Attalia, the seaport of Perga, and from that port they sailed directly to Antioch without retracing their journey through Cyprus. They went back to Antioch probably to report the success of their labors thus far, and perhaps also because they thought they might be needed again in the work of that city. We are not to undersand that they had been given a route or a program by the Antioch church. They had rather gone as seemed to them wise, journeying from place to place as circumstances indicated a favorable issue for their work. These circumstances they interpreted as indications of the divine Spirit. All of their work they felt thus to be directed by the Holy Spirit. They had no personal ends to gratify, but only the work of Christ to accomplish.

The Apostles.

This then completes the first formal missionary journey chronicled in the New Testament as undertaken among the Gentiles. It will be seen that in this narrative Paul and Barnabas are both called "apostles" in that free sense which includes not only the Twelve but those who by any special calling or service became notable as ambassadors of Jesus. There was no doubt a sense in which the Twelve were held by the early church as preëminently the apostles, but Paul was also reckoned as entitled to the name, and both he and Luke use it in the still wider sense which would embrace Barnabas, Timothy, and others of his associates.

Winston called Courthorne in. "I have offered you no refreshment, but the best in the house is at your service," he said.

Courthorne looked at him curiously, and for the first time Winston noticed that the life he had led was telling upon his companion.

"As your guest?" he asked.

"Yes," said Winston. "I am tenant here, and that I may owe you nothing, purpose paying you a second thousand dollars when the crop is in, as well as bank-rate interest on the value of the stock and machines and the money I have used, as shown in the documents handed me by Colonel Barrington. With wheat at its present price nobody would give you more for the land. In return, I demand the unconditional use of the farm until within three months from the harvest. I have the elevator warrants for whatever wheat I raise, which will belong to me. If you do not agree, or remain here after sunrise tomorrow, I shall ride over to the outpost and make a declaration."

"Well," said Courthorne slowly, "you can consider it a deal."

PRAYER MEETING

By Silas Jones

GOD'S INHERITANCE IN US.

Topic, May 12. Eph. 1:15; 2:10.

What manner of people are these Christians? How well do they represent to the world their Father in heaven? It is easy enough to point out errors in their thinking and flaws in their character. Your radical in the church and outside of it denounces Christian people as traitors to the cause of human rights, but it is not necessary to take the radical at his own estimate of himself. He usually has a pet scheme that has to be greatly modified before it will work or he is a visionary whom we do well to ignore. Some who say they have the welfare of the church at heart are very much disturbed when they meet with professing Christians whose knowledge and zeal and courage are not equal to the knowledge, zeal and courage of the ablest and best men in the church. We forget that the church is a school and that it has and ought to have in its membership every grade of intellectual and moral culture. This fact does not exempt it from criticism but if we keep in mind the character of the institution our criticism will be something more than fault-finding.

A Progressive People.

God's people believe in him. They are therefore progressive. They are never satisfied with the good; they demand the best. Stoicism was better than Epicureanism but Paul determined to give the world something that was superior to Stoicism. It may be that Mohammedanism is to be chosen in preference to the superstitions of pagan Africa, but the missionary will not leave the field to Mohammedanism. He will continue his labors until the African is a Christian. When the church ceases its missionary activity it loses what is distinctively Christian in its belief and practice. It must grow or die. Admiration for the philosophy of India and the ethics of China will not keep alive a church that has no zeal for conquest. The barbarism that still lingers among peoples in some measure christianized is also an object of attack. Progress has for its goal the religion of love that casts out fear. The wisdom of this world may pronounce the vision of the Christian foolishness, as it did in the days of Paul, but faith cannot live down to the level of the worldly wise. Its great achievements have always seemed impossible to the prudent and they always will, for faith is creative and prudence is not.

An Enlightened People.

"Having the eyes of your heart enlightened, that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints, and what the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe." The glorious hope of the Christian calls for the exercise of all the powers of the mind. Opposition to education is opposition to Christianity. The misguided zeal of churchmen who undertook to keep scientific investigation under ecclesiastical authority was an encouragement to unbelief, not to faith. Much of the opposition encountered by the church in Europe and America had its origin in resistance to attempts of the church to suppress free inquiry. On the other hand, an enlightened church will not allow materialistic science to speak the last word concerning religion and morals. Dogmatism is not the peculiar prerogative of churchmen. It is characteristic of man as man. The ipse dixit of economists and sociologists ought to have no more terror than that of the theologian. But it is not enough that the disciple of our Lord respond to the accusation of the enemies of the church with a counter accusation. He must inquire into the fullness and richness of the Christian hope. They speak well for the Father in heaven who know what his children may become and have obtained a goodly part of their inheritance. Have we not all seen weak churches suddenly become strong when a preacher of rich experience took the place of one who by his inferior mental and spiritual equipment made the gospel weak and foolish? If one man reveals the truth of the gospel so mightily, a company of people enlightened in the things of the spirit will give testimony that few can set aside.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

By Richard W. Gentry

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS SERIES: IV. THE HOUSE OF THE INTERPRETER.

Topic, May 9. Eccl. 12:9-14; Jas. 1:19-25.

The "House of the Interpreter" makes pretty difficult reading, doesn't it? We enjoy our "Bunyan" very much, but sometimes we get almost a surfeit of allegory from him. Christian has many adventures in the house of the Interpreter before he comes even to the "pleasant palace" where further things are seen. And in nearly every thing that the Interpreter shows him he finds a symbol of a Christian truth. Hence we shall have to confine ourselves to the experiences of Christian in the first room. The conversation there centers about a man "whose eyes were lifted up to heaven, who had the best of books in his hands, and was 'pleading with men.'" Can we modernize these three phrases and can they mean anything to us? Do they contain something so vital that we, you and I, can find in them guides into the Kingdom?

Eyes Up.

The order that rings out from the captain to his cohort is, "Eyes to the front!" So the order that should ring out from the Christian guide to his cohorts is, "Eyes up! Get a vision! See something besides that which is immediately before thy face!" And the one who would enter the Kingdom must obey this command. Find something besides this imperfect, backsliding, sinful world. Find in it the seed of the Kingdom of God. Look over toward the hill-tops and see the red. Discover that we are in the morning of a better day. Has not your history shown you a man's immense progress? Are not your school studies causing you to see what is going to come in the future? The world moves—up. Eyes up and say, "Father, I thank Thee that Thou art guiding the world."

The Best of Books.

The Bible still remains the best of books. You wouldn't be so prone to run off at dish-washing time if you read the Bible more. You wouldn't stay out till midnight talking moonshine to some young girl with the folks wondering where you were, if you read the Bible more. You wouldn't class "Dad" as a back-number because he pronounced "Psalms" with a short "a" if you read those same Psalms with their deep humility. Say, Latin and "running scales" and "geometry" and frat pins aren't all of it. I think you better get busy and read the Bible some, don't you?

Pleading With Men.

Isn't that beautiful? What wonderful emotions well up in our souls when we hear splendid music. The noblest strings in our natures ought to vibrate when we read these words. Serving men; saving men; guide-posts to the Kingdom; you don't have to be a preacher or a missionary to serve and save men. No one who does not lay his life before the altar of God and say, "Here am I, Oh Lord, send me," is fit to enter into the kingdom of God.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

THE KINDERGARTEN CHILD.

I. THE LITTLE SENSATIONALIST. The kindergarten age of the Sunday-school extends from three to six years. These are the years of SENSE PERCEPTION. Through the "eye, ear and nose gates" the little one is busy storing up sensations for future reference. Things and their qualities are its chief interest. Thought, as meant by the adult, has not yet appeared: such as there is, in scenic and pantomimic. The child thinks by pictures and types, not relations. This determines one important element of kindergarten work, namely, that it should be wholly concrete. Truth should be pictured, acted, and made tangible. Abstraction should be rigidly excluded. The object-lesson should be regularly, though judiciously, used. The lesson material and hymns should be such as to call up vivid images.

II. THE YOUNG NATURALIST. One chief characteristic of young childhood is CURIOSITY. The child is a born explorer, and no Columbus ever ventured on more daring voyages of discovery. Prof. James distinguishes between the abstract curiosity of later years and the sensational curiosity of childhood. The child is bent on discovering new sensations and forming new and more interesting groups out of the old. On this account he has been called "the little scientist," though it must be borne in mind that it is particular images, not general laws, that interest him. Where he can he travels alone, where the way is doubtful, he asks it. THE BATTERY OF QUESTIONS, so nerve-racking to over-worked mothers and teachers, is not to be suppressed. "Why does the wind blow? Where does the sea swim to? Can fishes breathe with their mouths under water?"—so nature leads the child into an understanding of the world it lives in. Tearing sawdust out of the doll, or sampling the taste of cinders is not original sin. There seems a vast difference between the little boy who asks, "How is it when we put our hand into the water we don't make a hole in it?" and the scientist puzzling over some problem in hydrostatics. Yet both are examples of the same instinct of discovery. The teacher, therefore, should not discourage the children from asking questions, because these are nature's cues to tell where interest lies. Answer them when you can; when you can't, frankly say so.

III. NATURE'S KINDERGARTEN. Play is the child's work-shop. It is nature's kindergarten where knowledge is gained by experiment and skill by practice. Look at the infant playing with the ball. How serious and tireless it is. It is doing more than having a good time: it is discovering something about balls. All normal children are inveterate players. They will sit for hours with a favorite toy. The crude scribblings or combinations of building blocks are full of meaning to the little architect or artist. Here is nature's great hint about child training. They should be allowed to play themselves into knowledge. Their little hands and feet should be kept busy acting out truth.

IV. FAIRYLAND. The child is a great magician. It lives in two different worlds—not alternately, like the poet, but in both at once. It invents things, persons, places, situations. It plays with imaginary playmates and speaks of them as though they were part of its real life. The fact is that the DISTINCTION BETWEEN FACT and FANCY has not yet been drawn. When the little child comes to its mother with some impossible tale of the things it has seen or heard, it is not "fibbing"; it is simply unable to distinguish between the play of fancy and the concrete realities of life. These fairy tales are merely the first workings of that faculty which makes all science, poetry and art—namely, constructive imaginations. They should not therefore be unduly repressed. If thwarted now, they will break out in illegitimate ways later on, to the horror of parents and teachers, who wonder how after all their precepts and punishments, they have managed to rear a "story teller." Let the child's fancy work. The myth-making faculty is natural to religion.

V. OTHER MENTAL ASSETS. (1) THE MEMORY of the kindergarten child is not as strong as it will be a few years later. It is largely associational and haphazard, depending on habit rather than reason. Hence, oft repetition is the great rule of kindergarten teaching. Too many new things should not be attempted and stories should be told over again in the same language.

(2) INTEREST AND ATTENTION are keen but capricious. The child attends to half a dozen things in a few minutes. Restlessness, due to the shifting of attention, is quite characteristic. The exercises and lessons, therefore, should be above all things varied.

(3) The faculty of IMITATION is strongly developed. It is by imitation that the young child acquires most of the social habits that later on will have become second nature. Moral and religious truths are best taught in this way. Parents and teachers should be models for their children.

(4) The range of experience and VOCABULARY of the kindergarten child is very small. Twenty-five hundred words is the limit of the latter at six years of age. The teacher should exercise the greatest care to avoid ideas and words belonging to a later stage of development. Bible stories should be told in bible words. Adult ideas in religion are quite beyond the child's range of experience.

(5) The child is very SUGGESTIBLE. In this stage sugges ion is a sort of substitute for will power. Advantage will be taken of this by the wise teacher in order to suggest in every legitimate way "the things that are lovely and of good report."

(6) The RHYTHMICAL FACULTY is strongly developed, as the wide-spread use of nursery rhymes would indicate. Singing begins as early as the third year. The kindergarten exercises should utilize this interest by providing frequent songs, marches, and rhythmical movements of hands and arms.

(7) The child is PARADOXICAL. He is apt to be a rebel against law and restraint, but will on no occasion enforce rules and show himself quite a stickler for propriety. Among his egotistic tendencies there are gleams of unselfishness. If he is prone to tell stories, he has yet a rudimentary conscience against untruth. The business of the teacher will be to take advantage of all the latter "promises of humanity."

LITERATURE: Mark's, "The Teaching and the Child"; Drawbridge's, "The Training of The Twig"; Harrison's, "A Study in Child Nature"; Richmond's, "The Mind of The Child."

QUESTIONS: (1) What is meant by calling the kindergarten child a "little sensationalist"? (2) What hint does this give for teaching? (3) What relation does the curiosity of the child bear to teaching? (4) What attitude should the teacher adopt towards the "battery of questions"? and why? (5) Of what use is the "play instinct" in the education of the young child? (6) What part does imagination play in the life of the child? Give examples. (7) Are the "inventions" of the child to be classed as falsehoods? (8) Name some of the other mental assets of the kindergarten child. (9) Characterize its memory. (10) Characterize its interest and attention. (11) Of what use is the child's faculty of imitation in education? (12) How extensive is the vocabulary of the child at six years? (13) How can you take advantage of the suggestibility of the child? (14) To what use should its rhythmical faculty be put? (15) What is meant by saying that the child is paradoxical?

OUR CHURCH MEN

By John R. Ewers

A Visit to Uhrichsville, Ohio

On Monday evening, April the twenty-sixth I addressed the Men's Club of the First Christian Church, in Uhrichsville, Ohio. This thriving little city of 10,000, is situated on the Panhandle Railroad midway between Pittsburg and Columbus. The church is representative of many of our best wide-awake churches throughout the union. In thirty-three years it has grown from sixteen to seven hundred members. Most of this growth has been due to the toil of the last two pastors, Pliny Allison, now of Dunham Ave., Cleveland, who did grand, substantial work for several years, and the present efficient minister, Charles Darsie, who is now in his fifth year, and who has brought out all the latent factors in the congregation. On almost any evening and for any worthy occasion five or six hundred people can be gotten out. At the meeting held last winter without any sensation, the audiences averaged six hundred. Therefore I had the satisfaction of speaking to a great crowd for the men were allowed to bring the ladies on this night. One of the very best Men's Clubs in our entire Brotherhood is here. The nominal membership is seventy, the real membership is about two hundred and seventy. At several of the meetings this winter between two and three hundred men have been present and when the "wet" and "dry" battle was on, as many as six hundred men attended.

The whole church is highly organized. The Sunday-school has an attendance of more than four hundred, with eleven organized adult classes. A new Sunday-school addition has recently been built with separate class rooms. There are some great men's classes. Men do the organizing. While the women's groups flourish, it is distinctly a Men's church. Working men from the Pennsylvania shops, merchants from the stores, professional men from the schools and offices toil happily and intensely side by side in delightful fellowship. The men run the church.

An old colored preacher speaking of the women said, "Brevren, de wimmin' am de back-bone of de church and am rapidly comin' to de front." This is not true in Uhrichsville. The men are the back-bone of that church and they stay where they belong. From the preacher to the last man they are a husky, healthy, happy lot. Darsie reads fifty books every years, calls on all his flock once a year, at least, takes long eight mile walks over the hills, makes his own garden, preaches two original sermons every Sunday, publishes a paper, pushes missions and Sunday-school work, is a leading and much respected citizen, and governs well his household. He is a Roosevelt Republican with five delightful children. His wife is a college woman and a more happy and well regulated home-life one would travel far to behold.

The special object of my visit was the dedication of the new reading room which the Men's Club has provided. A town having large railroad shops presents opportunities for institutional work which the men of this congregation have grasped. A large dwelling house just south of the church has been purchased and remodelled for reading rooms, club rooms, dining room and study rooms for special Bible classes. Two large front rooms are connected by an arch, well furnished and provided with tables and easy chairs. A book case full of attractive titles and racks filled with the current magazines and papers, makes the place very homelike and agreeable, especially when the two old-fashioned fireplaces glow with warm coals. Many a young man dwelling in a bleak boarding house will now spend his evenings here. Fortunately he cannot spend them in a saloon for there are none in the county. That there are none is due in large measure to this same progressive Men's Club. The initial meeting of the campaign, called by our men was held in the First Christian Church. Darsie is a great singer. He got together five hundred men and how he did make them sing! All over the county they went singing, "Glory, Glory Hallelujah, the Last Saloon Must Go." They made hundreds of votes. Chrichsville itself went dry by eleven hundred majority. I say this is a representative church. Some way or other the Disciples have a nack of doing the thing that needs to be done. Our fellows deliver the goods. We arrive.

I write of this Men's Club at length for it is a vigorous, successful aggregation. Their work is diversified. Thus they meet one time for a good fellowship affair. Then they eat, drink and are merry. Again they tackle some problem in civic righteousness and win a notable victory. At another time they listen to a lecture that stimulates their thinking. Yet again they buy a house, not hesitating to go in debt for it, in order to establish institutional features. Every club is peculiar. This is the way this one works. Most of these men are deeply interested in the Sunday-school. You might almost say that the common center of their work is there. On Sunday they meet in great men's classes and thus a certain continuity is afforded to their efforts. All the time the church and her welfare is uppermost in their minds. It was a great pleasure for me to meet these men—and the women who inspire them.

Chicago

Disciples of the City Meet in Quarterly Convocation to Hear National and City Secretaries

By Orvis F. Jordan

The Disciples of many cities are wealthier than in Chicago. They are more numerous in at least two cities of the United States—Des Moines and Lexington. Chicago, however, has more separate congregations than in any other city. Should all of these thrive and make normal growth, it is only a matter of a few years until the greatest group of Disciples in the United States will be in Chicago. The only reason we seem weak in Chicago is that we compare ourselves with the other religious bodies of the community and that we undertake sometimes more than we are able to carry through with the meager support given city missions.

One of the evidences of the unparalleled unity and strength of the Disciples of Christ is their quarterly rallies. No other great city has been able to have this common meeting with any measure of success. At the rally held on April 25, Secretary Wright of the American Christian Missionary Society made mention of a similar effort that was made in Cincinnati recently. After speaking facetiously of the efforts of Cincinnati to keep the brotherhood orthodox, he referred to an attempt at a city rally there recently which resulted in an attendance of forty-six brethren. He complimented Chicago upon a unity and an esprit de corps which he regarded as nothing short of marvelous.

Rally of Four Hundred Disciples.

The rally held on April 25, convened in the First Methodist Church in the loop district. This is necessary for the Disciples have no building within four miles of this district. A union meeting in any of our churches becomes by the necessities of transportation a meeting of the South Side, the West Side or the North Side. Disciples came from all parts of the great metropolis. Two brethren came from the new suburb of Gary, over thirty miles. Nearly four hundred brethren came from all over Cook County, none of them belonging to churches nearer than four miles. The largest delegation came from the Jackson Boulevard Church. Perhaps they remembered that Parker Stockdale had been present at the last rally and on the following day had been taken to the hospital. Only one church was without a delegation, and that church had no pastor and was far removed from the center of things.

The music for the rally was furnished by the West End Church. This church is still receiving aid from the society and is making commendable growth under the ministry of C. M. Kreidler. This amateur choir has been singing together only four months but rendered some of the best music with great credit to themselves and with real religious effect in the rally.

Home Missionary Secretary Present.

The chief address of the rally was made by Secretary W. J. Wright of Cincinnati. He referred to the work of the past administration in planning the conservation of the national resources. The work of saving waste material was the task which the nation has set for itself. This, we were told, was very much the work of the church. There was much waste going in the religious field. Men were being wasted in vice and misery. Shelley's statement that hell was a city very much like London could be changed to read, Hell is a city very much like Chicago, declared the speaker. It is not simply the weak and unfit that fall in city temptations but the resourceful and kind-hearted are often victims as well. Christ's program was and is "to seek and to save the lost."

The speaker also said that this program of conserving religious forces had given point and urgency to the now popular doctrine of Christian union. The work of the Disciples the past hundred years has undoubtedly had something to do with the rising tide of sentiment in favor of a reunited church. This spirit of co-operation is of the highest value in the work of redeeming the city.

Urgency of City Evangelization.

The great message of the hour was the urgency of the task of redeeming the city. It was shown that the cities were growing far out of proportion to the natural increase of population in the country. The Disciples are still a rural people and have contributed but little to the work of redeeming the city. Only about seven per cent of their strength is in the cities which is less than one-fifth what it should be to have proportionate representation in the great cities.

The secretary referred with feeling to his humilation as a Disciple when he was called upon by Chas. Stelzle of the Presbyterian Home board to tabulate our work among the foreigners. The fact is that the Disciples have no missionary work among the foreigners of America worth the name. They have been busy saving the native Americans, and have forgotten that the great tide of immigration was rapidly changing America so that it is now almost proper to speak of America as a Catholic rather than a Protestant country.

Secretary Wright expressed the deepest interest in the redemption of Chicago. He promised that his influence as secretary would ever be on the side of helping this great metropolis into a larger measure of religious life. He made a number of suggestions for the conducting of the missionary operations of the city and desired that the work should be done on an ever larger scale.

Money for Buildings as Well as for Preachers.

The writer as secretary of the Chicago Society spoke briefly on the Chicago problem, mentioning the many open doors of opportunity about the city. He insisted that the Disciples were not up-to-date in their methods in that they put all of their money in men while the other religious bodies put money in buildings and equipment, the Presbyterians putting three times as much money into buildings as into men. He showed that the other religious bodies made suburban churches self-supporting much more rapidly and that therefore a method that seemed expensive was really cheap in the end. He joined Secretary Wright in expressing humiliation at the poor reports made the interdenominational organizations of work among the foreigners. His proposed remedy for our weakness in the city was to abandon the methods of work that are successful in village churches as unadapted to city life and to develop a new kind of church activity adapted to the city.

At the close of the rally, the churches reported their delegations and the amount pledged to city missions. Twelve congregations were ready with pledges which aggregated a total of twelve hundred dollars. These twelve were Armour Avenue, Douglas Park, Englewood, Evanston, Harvey, Hyde Park, Irving Park, Jackson Boulevard, Maywood, Sheffield Avenue, South Chicago and West End. Eleven other churches promised to take an offering but were not ready to respond to the appeal of the society for a definite pledge. A number will make pledges before the month is out. There is every reason to hope that Chicago will raise an unusually large sum this year for her own redemption.

Our rally has left behind the enthusiasm and idealism which is necessary in a great task. It serves a useful function in our city life. We have a task that should nerve us to do our best, and a message that we should ever be proud to deliver.

CHICAGO CHURCH NOTES.

Roscoe R. Hill ministers for the church at Elgin while continuing his studies at the University of Chicago.

There was one addition at Maywood recently. Reports indicate commendable activity in all departments of the work.

The church at Austin secured a lot for a new building some time ago. They have not yet disposed of the old lot, but when this is accomplished, they will probably proceed with a building enterprise.

Pastor Mullins of the Oak Park Church has been having a serious illness which was at first thought to be a tubercular trouble but is now diagnosed differently. He was able to preach last Sunday seated.

The Sheffield Avenue Church reports the best meeting in three years, held by Charles Bloom of Newman, April 11-21. There were eleven additions, eight by primary obedience. Geo. H. Brown spoke at the rally on April 8.

The pastor of the Monroe Street Church has been giving Wednesday evening lectures on the great leaders of our religious movement. This is part of a program to make the church realize its part in the Centennial movement.

The Hyde Park church has installed a fine library on religious, social and philosophical subjects. The list printed in a recent Messenger has been preserved by many of our ministers as a valuable guide in their reading. The library has nearly 200 volumes of the choicest literature.

The household of Dr. H. L. Willett has been greatly afflicted for several weeks in the serious illness of both his mother and wife. Mother Willett continues critically ill. Mrs. Willett is making slow but encouraging improvement. The family has the sincere sympathy of the Chicago household of faith and of thousands throughout the brotherhood.

Richard Gentry has been installed as assistant pastor at the Hyde Park Church. He will give his time especially to the promotion of the work of the Sunday school. The securing of a paid assistant to take care of the Sunday school is an event of much significance in our city life. It is a recognition of the central place of the Sunday school in the program of the church.

At a church dinner at the Hyde Park Church recently, some of its distinguished members spoke on their special work. Mr. Clifford Roe, Assistant State's Attorney, spoke on the work of the Municipal Court. Alexander M. Wilson, superintendent of the Chicago Bureau of Charities, told of the work of this great organization. The next dinner will be held on May 12.

The Evanston Church spent the morning hour on April 25 discussing their new building project. The congregation voted unanimously to erect a new building this summer. It is hoped the work may begin early in June. The rear section of the ultimate large building will be erected. It will care for more people than the present building and be located accessible to the North Shore, thus enlarging the scope of activity of the church.

Obituary Notice

The following resolution was passed by the board of the Seventh Street Christian Church, Richmond, Va., H. D. C. Maclachlan, pastor, at their meeting of April 22:

"Whereas, in the Providence of God we have had taken from us our beloved brother, N. A. Stall, who has been associated with us for many years on the Official Board of our church, we wish to express our deep sense of the loss sustained by our church and Official Board. Having been so intimately associated with Brother Stall, we have had exceptional opportunities of observing his fidelity to the Master's work. Although unassuming in character, he was minutely faithful to every trust imposed upon him. We wish to testify to our admiration for him as a true Christian gentleman, and to his family in this their hour of bereavement extend our most sincere sympathy, commending them to the loving care of Him who is the Father of the fatherless and the Husband of the widow."

PURVES.—Isabella Renton was born at St. John, N. B., January 11, 1844; was married to Geo. T. Purves October 25, 1865; and died April 8, 1909, at Tucson, Arizona, where her husband is pastor of the Christian Church. She was baptized at St. John in October, 1865, and lived a blameless Christian life. She leaves her husband, one son and three daughters to mourn their loss. She was buried at Tucson, the beautiful funeral services being conducted by the City Ministerial Association.

He Called Me Friend

By Thomas Curtis Clark.

He called me friend; words lightly given—
Yet at their music song flooded my throat;
Deep in my heart trembled its note,
Then through my lips took its flight straight to heaven,
Where it shall bide time without end.
When I was sorrowful, he called me friend.

He called me friend. Lo, there was borne
Into my heart of hearts, by sorrow torn,
Balm for its wounds! I saw anew;
Weeds became roses, light touched with the dew!
Gladness and peace his way attend—
When I was sorrowful, he called me friend.

St. Louis.

Moline (Ill.) Dedication

The First Christian Church at Moline, Ill., was dedicated last Sunday, April 18. Rev. O. W. Lawrence, of Decatur, had charge of the services. He preached at the morning service and presided throughout the day. Rev. S. M. Perkins of Davenport, preached at the afternoon service and Rev. W. B. Clemmer of Rock Island, crowned the day with an evangelistic service at night at the close of which four splendid people came into the fellowship of the church. The church was organized here three years ago by Rev. Lawrence, then of Rock Island, and that splendid church has helped support the work ever since. I was called as pastor as soon as the work was organized and with more than the usual amount of hard times the work is fairly well established now. The building dedicated is located in the heart of one of the best residence districts and has the best lot in the city for a church building. The property cost with lot $5,400 and the building will seat about three hundred. There were fourteen charter members in the original number. There are now sixty-five.

Following or rather continuing after dedication the church is in a meeting with Rev. Mr. Clemmer doing the preaching. There have been additions at each service, eleven since Sunday. This is a great city with a population of 30,000, one-half of whom are Swedes and Norwegians. The primitive gospel is getting a hold upon the foreign people and they are among the best members we have. They are easily Americanized and the second generation are about as fully American as the native born.

ROBERT E. HENRY, Minister.

WITH THE WORKERS

Attendance at Second Church Sunday-school, Warren, Ohio, April 25, was 407; offering $7.69.

The Hiram College Glee Club gave an entertainment at the First Church, Warren, Ohio, April 28.

R. S. Robertson, pastor of the chrurch at Milan, Mo., is in a short meeting with the church at Humphres.

A. J. Bradshaw, who is now at Cameron, Texas, is available for work as pastor. He would like some Oklahoma church.

Attendance at Sunday-school, First Church, Warren, Ohio, April 18, was 508; offering $9.89. There were ninety men present.

Walter C. Winchester recently gave a lecture on "India" at the Lyons Street Church, Grand Rapids, of which E. B. Barnes is the pastor.

E. F. Metcalf, minister of the Christian Church, Alexander, S. D., led the fight in a recent campaign in which the town was voted "dry." This is successful preaching.

Rev. John Encell, well beloved by the members of the Lenox Avenue Church, New York, has returned to that city, and on April 18 preached for the Lenox Avenue Church, where W. A. Harp is now pastor.

John Ray Ewers, pastor of the First Church Youngstown, Ohio, gave his lecture, "Lion Heart," before the Men's Club of the church at Urichsville, Ohio, April 26. The ladies were invited and Mr. Ewers addressed about 500 persons.

H. O. Pritchard, Bethany, Neb., is preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons during May and June, in the chapel of Cotner University, on the general topic, "Modern Industrial, Social and Moral Reform." During April his topic was "Exodus and Industrial Reform." In May it will be, "Leviticus and Social Reform," and in June, "Deuteronomy and Moral Reform."

The East Orange Church, New Jersey, recently presented their pastor, who has been working very hard with seminary work and a building campaign for the church to direct, with a round trip ticket to New Orleans, with the invitation to take a short vacation, and allow the church to supply the pulpit while he was away. The pastor, L. N. D. Wells, did so and has returned to his work with renewed strength and determination to push it with vigor.

At Delta, Col., since A. L. Glover began his work with the church last August, a new house costing $3,500 has been built, and seventy persons have been received into the fellowship of the church. Fifty-two of these came and were received during a four weeks' meeting with the help of Victor Dorris, who also had charge of the dedicatory service, at which time all money needed to free the church from debt was raised.

The church at Columbia, Mo., announces a celebration of its seventh anniversary to be held May 6-9, Thursday to Sunday evening. The program consists of, Address, "History of the Christian Church in Missouri," J. H. Garrison; address, "The Church and School," Prof. C. M. Sharpe, Columbia; address, "Inspiration of the Centennial Year," R. G. Frank, Liberty, Mo.; address, Dr. J. H. Foy, St. Louis, Mo.; Sunday morning address, "Looking Forward," M. A. Hart, pastor; Sunday evening address, T. P. Haley.

A. L. Ward, pastor of the church at Boulder, Col., has been giving a series of Sunday morning sermons under the general heading, "Some Important Considerations of Religion." Special topics: "The Primacy of Christ," "The Fatherhood of God," "The Brotherhood of Man," "Suffering and Sorrow," "The Tragedy of Sin," "The Message of Salvation." He has at the same time been giving a series of Sunday evening sermons on "The Wonderful Man of Galilee." This increasing tendency on the part of the ministry of our church to preach series of sermons has the advantage of a systematic and connected educative influence, and will be found by most preachers a saver of time and conducive to systematic study.

J. F. Green, who came from Rochester, N. Y., has begun work with the church at Mariette, Ohio.

Dr. S. M. Cook has resigned as pastor of the church at Wellsville, Ohio, after a service of many years.

Judge A. R. Webber, Elyria, Ohio, is to address the Brotherhood of the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, some weeks hence.

C. E. Aldridge, an alumnus of Berkley Seminary, Cal., and for three years pastor of the church at Pacific Grove, has resigned to take effect June 1. The Pacific Christian commends his work.

The church at San Jose, Cal., is being led in an evangelistic campaign by Victor Dorris, evangelist, and Prof. Gates, singer. The meeting is attracting a widespread interest in the city, and there were forty additions at the close of the first week.

The Christian Union, April 22, devotes a large part of its space to present cuts of the buildings of Drake University and the University Place Church. Wonderful advance has been made in the growth of these institutions in the last few years.

The new church at Hamlin, Texas, was dedicated April 18. The building cost $3,290, and was dedicated free of debt, A. J. Bush, of Wichita Falls, had charge of the service. William Pearn is the pastor who has led the church in this successful enterprise.

P. H. Welshimer, E. J. Meacham, Herbert Moninger and Marion Stevenson are to speak on the work of the Sunday-school at the Ohio State convention which meets at Elyria, May 24-27. Some of the speakers for the church program are, F. D. Power, P. C. Macfarlane, J. G. Slayter, W. B. Taylor.

Books You Need

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing among the Disciples of Christ. You need every one of this splendid list.

OUR CENTENNIAL BOOK.
"Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union."—Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic for this our Centennial year. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Boston W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Retail price, $1.00. No one should allow the Centennial to pass without possessing this book.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind., a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possibly only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth. 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these churches are given their present form."

Every Disciple of Christ will be interested in getting from his own pen the teachings of Professor Willett. No fair man will consent to judge him on the basis of newspaper reports. These books should be in every one's possession just now.

ERRETT GATES' ILLUMINATING WORK.
"The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples."

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 35c. Paper binding, 25c.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, PA.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, MASS.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes:

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

JUDGE SCOFIELD'S FASCINATING TALE.
"Altar Stairs."

WITH THE WORKERS

Ira E. Carney becomes pastor of the church at Eldora, Iowa.

A new church was dedicated at Winchester, Ky., May 2. J. H. McNeil is the pastor.

The church at Lake Port, Cal., has been having a good meeting under the leadership of E. W. Darst.

The Vine Street Church, Nashville, Tenn., has engaged the Brooks Brothers for a meeting next October.

J. A. Burns, who graduates from Drake University in June has accepted a call to the church at Gravity, Ia.

F. O. Fannon, formerly pastor of the First Church, St. Louis, Mo., has been over in Illinois lecturing at Mt. Vernon.

A new house of worship was dedicated at Bucklin, Kan., April 25. George E. Lyons of Topeka, was master of ceremonies.

The new $40,000 building of the First Church, South Bend is being rapidly pushed forward. George W. Hemry is minister.

The South Street Church, Springfield, under the leadership of F. L. Moffett, is planning to erect a new building in the near future.

J. N. Crutcher has accepted a call to the church at Lyons, Kan. Evangelist Joel Brown is leading the forces in a meeting at Gallatin, Mo.

The Forest Avenue Church, Buffalo, N. Y., loses its pastor, B. H. Hayden who has accepted a call to the church at London, Ontario.

The foundation is being laid for a $20,000 church building at Muskogee, Okla., where Melvin C. Putnam, late of Bedford, Ind., is the pastor.

The work in Boulder, Colo., is growing and is rapidly becoming one of the great churches of the state. Large audiences greet the pastor, A. L. Ward, at every service.

A friend of the children of our missionaries who resides in Iowa has recently contributed $500 toward the founding of the Wharton Memorial Home at Hiram, Ohio.

Last Sunday morning Loweil MacPherson was with the River Street Church of Christ, Troy, N. Y., and raised in cash and pledges $211 for Keuka College. This will be increased. Easter Sunday this church raised $439 on the organ fund. Cecil J. Armstrong is the pastor.

The Milan, Mo., Church is building up in all lines. A series of sermons were delivered preparatory for the great Easter service on Christ's last words and deeds. The entire membership came to the pastor's home on the evening of April 8, giving him an old-fashioned "pound party."

The Des Moines, Iowa, ministers reported the following accessions to the churches at their meeting Monday, April 24. Finis Idleman (Central) two confessions, three by letter; H. E. Van Horn (Capital Hill) one by letter; J. McD. Horne (Highland Park) one confession.

The first annual banquet of the Christian Citizens' Council of Nebraska was held at the First Church, Lincoln, April 14. L. R. Smith, president of the Lincoln Brotherhood, acted as toastmaster. Addresses were made by C. H. Challis, Ulysses; P. C. Macfarlane, Messrs. Aylesworth, Pritchard, William, McLucas, of Fairbury, and ex-Senator Sackett.

J. McD. Horn, who has been pastor of the Grant Park Church, Des Moines, for the past two years, has accepted a call to the Highland Park Church of that city. This is looked upon as one of the strategic fields of the state because of the large number of students in the community.

Tipton, Ind., reports a forward movement in the Sunday-school. The average attendance for April was 346; average collection, $10.59. Three classes averaged over twenty-five per Sunday. Prof. Charles Patterson's class (young men) fifty-six; Mr. William Wanderford's class (young ladies) forty-seven; Mr. W. C. Carter's class (women) thirty-four. G. I. Hoover is the pastor, recently removing there from West Pullman, Ill.

On April 18, A. L. Ward of Boulder, Colo., and J. F. Findley of Fort Collins, exchanged pulpits.

James H. Maley recently closed a year's work with the church at Colorado Springs, Colo. They have not secured his successor.

The work in Colorado is growing rapidly. The state officials are pushing things on the western slope. There are great opportunities.

The church at New Philadelphia has called Asa McDaniel, recently of Dayton, O., to become their pastor. The Century bespeaks for the church a successful work.

The convention of the Northern District of Colorado will hold its convention at Loveland, June 9 and 10. This is one of the strong districts of the state.

F. M. Dowling has resigned from the pastorate of the First Church, Pasadena, Cal. We regret to note that the resignation was caused by a nervous breakdown. He plans spending a year on the farm recuperating.

At Washington, Ill., E. H. Reed who has been pastor of the Christian Church is giving splendid satisfaction. The church, by a unanimous vote, re-employed him for another year, giving him the privilege of holding a meeting.

Russell F. Thrapp, Jacksonville, Ill., Jesse P. McKnight, Los Angeles, Cal., J. W. Hablit, Atlanta, Ill., and A. A. Sleyman, Bloomington, Ill., will sail on July 3, for Europe and the Orient. They will spend a month in Syria and Palestine, passing through the country on horseback. They will also visit Egypt.

M. S. Peckham, pastor of the First Church, Indiana Harbor, Ind., gave a lecture, "All About Cuba," April 16, at the Auditorium in that place under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid Society of that church. This is his third lecture on Cuba since his return from there, and appreciation has been expressed each time by those who attended.

C. C. Crawford, formerly of Elmira, N. Y., has accepted a call to the Columbia Ave. Church in Rochester, N. Y., and entered upon his work there April 18. Mr. Crawford went to Elmira nearly thirteen years ago, a few months after the organization of the church in that city. Under his ministry the church has grown from a mere handful, meeting in a small room on the third flat, to a strong church with a property worth about $30,000. He goes to Rochester under the direction of the N. Y. State Missionary Society, which is helping to support the work in that difficult field.

Mrs. Rawson, wife of Rev. M. B. Rawson, for many years pastor of the Christian Church at Wayland, Mich., passed away April 5, after an indisposition of several months. Mrs. Rawson was a woman of beautiful character who lived the Christian life in a simple, genuine fashion which won all who knew her not only to admiration for herself but to genuine appreciation of the Christian faith. For many years the family of Mr. and Mrs. Rawson was the main support of the church at Wayland, where they have continued to live since his active work as a preacher closed. The community and a considerable circle of friends will greatly miss Mrs. Rawson.

Two more good friends have entered the fellowship with the National Benevolent Association in its care of the widow and the orphan in their affliction by giving $500 each on the annuity plan. In sending in these offerings they expressed themselves as desirous of having fellowship in the Centennial joy of our great Brotherhood. These gifts were a part of their Centennial thank offering. The Association has received between $15,000 and $16,000 in annuities since the beginning of the year. It ought to have several thousand more before we assemble at Pittsburg. It pays five per cent to those who are under fifty and six per cent to those who are over fifty. This plan furnishes a good opportunity for those who can not spare their money while they live to invest it in one of the holiest ministries of the church and at the same time enjoy the benefit from it until they are ready to go hence.

Rochester Irwin writes encouragingly of the progress of the work at Long Point, Ill.

The church at Iowa Falls, Ia., has extended a call to A. J. Garrick to become their pastor.

Harry E. Tucker, minister at Platte City, Mo., reports two confessions recently. He preached the Odd Fellows' memorial sermon in the church April 25 to a large congregation.

Allen T. Shaw reports four added to the church at Pontiac, Ill., where he ministers. The Children's Easter offering was $13. The District convention will be entertained by the Pontiac church May 26-28.

N. S. Robertson is in a meeting at Humphreys, Mo., with two additions to date. He reports his regular work at Milan, Mo., as growing constantly and the church in a hopeful spirit. Mr. Robertson commends the excellent work done in that part of Missouri by the students of Christian University, Canton.

M. S. Peckham has resigned at Indiana Harbor, Ind., to accept a call to Sumter, S. C., under the American Christian Missionary Society. The members and friends of the church at the Harbor gave a farewell reception to Mr. and Mrs. Peckham just before they left. They expressed their appreciation of their services, and their regret at their leaving, and presented them with a substantial farewell present.

Ray M. Beauchamp, pastor at Twin Falls, Idaho, reports 210 calls made in the past year, 8 funerals and 10 weddings. He conducts a Teacher-Training class of 30 members. A good Sunday-school of over 100 members and a C. E. of 45 support the church in all good things. Sixty-nine persons have been added by baptism to the membership of the church and sixty-five by letter and statement. These figures have much significance when the pioneer character of the field is considered. W. L. McCullough, of Washington, begins a meeting there soon.

AUNTIES

They Belong to the Whole Neighborhood

That dear old neighbor we knew as "Aunty" and who lived down the street was no relation, of course, except that her tender old heart made her "Aunty" to all the young people. And how she did love the young mothers!

One who remembers her says:

"We could always depend on 'Aunty' for good sound advice. She was particularly well informed on food and what to use for certain troubles.

"After having taught in the public schools for years my health became bad and I suffered frequently from indigestion. After my marriage I had indigestion so badly that it became chronic.

"Owing to my condition my little baby did not get proper nourishment and was a very delicate child. I had about decided to put her on artificial food altogether when the advice of dear old 'Aunty' put baby and me on the right road.

"She insisted upon my trying Grape-Nuts food, declaring that it would help me and give baby more nourishment, so to please her I did, trying it for breakfast. The result was so marked and so quick that I ate it for luncheon, too, and I must say the change has been wonderful. I have good health now and baby is a strong active child.

"My mother says that Grape-Nuts helps her more and keeps her more cheerful and happy than anything else she has ever done. Truly pure, scientific food has great power." "There's a Reason."

WITH THE WORKERS

A number of schools have shown remarkable gains in the Easter offering for benevolences. Coffeyville, Kan., Ellis Purlee minister, has multiplied its best previous offering by four. Sedalia, Mo., Brother Kokendoffer, minister and W. W. Herold, superintendent, started out to raise $100 and raised $200. Marion, Ill., J. H. Stampaugh minister, reported $64.10, a marked increase over last year. Minier, Ill., jumped from $3 to $20. Center, Mo., from $3.35 to $18.20. Council Grove, Kan., H. M. Gillmore minister, from $8.50 to $50. Centralia, Mo., from $125 to $200, twice a life line. Colfax, Ill., J. B. Arnold minister, from $35 to $66. J. H. Jayne minister, $16 to $34. D. N. Gillett, Oxford, Ind., reports a fine gain over previous years.

Northern Indiana Ministerial Institute

The Ministerial Institute for Northern Indiana meets this year with the church at Huntington, May 10-12. It is believed that a program of far more than ordinary interest and merit is in process of preparation. Such men as George W. Hemry, L. M. Sniff, E. F. Daugherty, and George H. Clark will present carefully prepared papers. The following subjects, among others, will be treated: The Problems of Coöperative Work in Indiana, The Emmanuel Movement, The Church and the Social Program, and Modernism. Ample time will be allowed for discussion. The Institute opens Monday evening, and continues through Tuesday and Wednesday. It will be a great treat to gather in the splendid new edifice of the Huntington congregation. It is probable that a plan employed by our brethren on the Pacific coast will be used, viz., the pooling of the expense of travel, etc., so that all the members of the Institute will share alike. You will have a message from E. W. Cole, Huntington's minister, with respect to local entertainment.

We desire to have a large attendance of all the men of the Northern district. Be sure to come. Huntington is admirably located, and the program ought to be a rich recompense for all who attend. Get other men enthused and bring them with you. Come for the first session and stay until the close. Come prepared to take part in the discussions. This is about our sole opportunity to participate in free and general discussion over the themes that interest us as ministers. Write and tell us that we may expect you. Address E. W. Cole.

Telegrams

Frankfort, Ky., May 2—Sellers and St. John closed three weeks' meeting tonight. 112 added beside sixty-one at state prison. Greatest meeting in history of church. Knoxville, Tenn., next. C. R. Hudson, minister.

Hopkinsville, Ky., April 26—Church packed again and again to hear Herbert Yeuell. Men's meeting at union tabernacle one of the greatest since the days of Sam Jones. Community aroused. Continuing.—H. D. Smith.

North Yakima, Wash., May 2—Fifty-seven added today, thirty-three tonight, 425 in thirteen days' invitations. Bro. Rose royal yoke-fellow. New record for evangelism in the northwest. Rockwell and wife and Mrs. Scoville my assistants.—Chas. Reign Scoville.

Bloomfield, Iowa, April 28—The Bloomfield Church becomes Living Link in the Foreign Field. One thousand per cent increase over the offering last year. Pastor and people greatly rejoiced. Seven additions, outside the Bruce Brown meeting, not reported. F. D. Ferrall, pastor.

Red Oak, Iowa, May 2—Thompson, the Egyptian opened upon the ramparts of sin here tonight with Kirkpatrick as singer. House packed to the door at every service. The gospel is being preached with great power and souls are responding at every call and the church is waking up. To God be all the glory.—Geo. H. Nichol.

Kalispell, Mont., May 2—Beautiful fifteen thousand dollar church edifice dedicated today. Brethren and citizens responded liberally. Eight thousand dollars called for and subscribed, the amount sufficient to meet all obligations. The handsomest church building in Northwestern Montana. Thus far sixty-three additions. Continue another week. Professor Burditt, chorister, Mrs. Brandt director large sunbeam chorus. Harold Griffis successful pastor.—John L. Brandt.

The Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, which has for years been one of the most liberal supporters of our benevolent work, passed all previous records this year. The latest report indicates that the offering is just a little short of $600.

The program of the second National Teacher Training and Adult Bible Class Institute at Bethany Park, Ind., is completed. It is very fine and will soon be announced. Bible-school workers should plan to go and receive great inspiration and help such as was given last year.

O. F. Jordan, secretary of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society, is moving from 1002 Asbury avenue to 1022 Sherman avenue, Evanston, There will be a corresponding telephone change. Correspondents will please take notice.

Our hearts are touched by a letter from Rev. and Mrs. W. F. Richardson of Kansas City, telling of the taking away of their son Clement, aged 27 years. The letter which comes just as we go to press will be printed next week. Meanwhile Mr. and Mrs. Richardson may be sure of the sympathy of a great host throughout the brotherhood who will grieve to read the sad news.

The reports from the Easter offerings for benevolences up to the present time are encouraging. The returns for the first seven days after Easter this year show a gain of nearly $500 over the first seven days of last year. A number of new life lines have been gained. It is too early to report at the present time. The First Church of Omaha, of which J. N. Kersey is minister, has come into line.

One hundred and ten men of the Christian churches of Cincinnati and vicinity banqueted at the Monroe Hotel Friday evening, April 30. Dean Rogers of the Cincinnati Law School was toastmaster and President Crossfield of Lexington made a stirring address on "Man's Work in the Church." A committee was appointed to arrange for another such meeting in the future and it is evident that some permanent men's organization will result from this banquet.

ALL ABOUT BELLS.

How They Are Made and What Material Enters Into Their Composition.

The Cincinnati Bell Foundry, Cincinnati, Ohio, manufacturers of the famous Blymyer Bells—known everywhere as the most musical and resonant bells made, and easily recognized by their sweetness of tone,—have for free distribution a beautiful, illustrated booklet, in which is told how bells are made, the metal used and a lot of other interesting information regarding the history of bells. This booklet will be of particular interest to those who buy bells for churches or schools.

What is known as "bell-metal," an alloy of copper and tin, has been used in all bell making for at least 500 years. Both these metals being expensive, the cost of bells has, therefore, been high. In the booklet referred to above is described a new and better "bell-metal" than the alloy of tin and copper. While to a certain extent the composition of this metal is a trade secret, it is shown that an extra quality of fine steel is used, which greatly lessens the expense of making a bell, at the same time adding to its tone and usefulness.

"Blymyer" Bells are made in peals and singles, and are adapted to all uses. Anyone interested in the purchase of a bell should get full particulars about the "Blymyer" Bells before deciding, and to do this, they should by all means send for the booklet mentioned above. Simply address The Cincinnati Bell Foundry Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Centennial Bulletin

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

The President of the United States and the Centennial.

Thursday, April 22, a delegation composed of United States Senator George T. Oliver of Pennsylvania, Representatives Champ Clark of Missouri and Edgar D. Crumpacker of Indiana, F. D. Power and George A. Miller of Washington, D. C., and the Centennial secretary were cordially received by President Taft. When the party was lined up before him he promptly exclaimed, "What but the church could have united you men!" "Yes, Mr. President, and we represent a church which proposes to unite all men," was the immediate response. Senator Oliver as spokesman for the party said that we represented the fifth largest Protestant body of the United States, and the only one of the leading bodies that originated on this continent, that we were expecting at least 20,000 of our representative members to attend the celebration in Pittsburg, and that the city united with each church in extending him a cordial invitation to spend one of the days of the meeting with us.

The president said that he was not a stranger to the strength of our movement in Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana and Illinois, and that he would gladly accept our invitation if plans that are already under way should not take him out of this part of the country at that time. By this we understand that he refers to the proposed Alaska trip, and feel quite sure that if undertaken it will not last long enough to conflict with the Centennial.

A copy of the de luxe edition of the Declaration and Address was presented to him, with the statement, that this contained our declaration of independence and the appeal for unity.

Now we want to make the Centennial so attractive that neither the president of the United States, nor any one else who has an excuse for attending, can afford to be anywhere else on earth at that time.

Declaration Day, September 26, 1909.

The seething brain of Herbert Moninger has produced another idea of the first magnitude, which will be taken up and carried on to glorious realization under the auspices of the National and State Bible-school Associations. Look out for communications on the subject from Marion Stevenson, National Bible-school superintendent.

In brief the proposal is that September 26 shall be a universal Bible-school rally day in all the Churches of Christ, with the aim set at an aggregate attendance of two millions. At the morning church service every preacher is asked to speak on Thomas Campbell's immortal watchword, "Where the Bible speaks we speak, where the Bible is silent, we are silent." In the evening he is asked to deliver a sermon on "A Generation of Bible Students." There is every ground for believing that the stupendous aim "Two million in Christian Bible-schools September 26" can be reached. The realization of this will tell mightily in the advancement of the cause in every department.

Two Centennial Preachers.

The brethren in all parts of the country are taking the Centennial as a chance to tell everybody the inspiring facts of the Restoration Movement. Two samples of successful agitation are given.

Walter Scott Priest of the Broad Street Church of Christ, Columbus, Ohio, gave a reporter of the Columbus Dispatch enough Centennial matter to fill a column in that paper. Then he made arrangements with them to devote their entire magazine section to the Centennial some Sunday in July or August (if they will publish a Sunday paper he thinks it best to have it filled with the best reading matter). For this he will make free use of pictures illustrating the history of the Restoration Movement, and the growth of the church in Columbus.

He expects to have a special train to Pittsburg from Columbus, 192 miles.

Two young men from the Broad Street Church are studying for the ministry, one in Lexington and one in Hiram. Another is beginning to preach.

The Columbus churches have united in making the city a living link in foreign missions, home missions and state missions.

S. Boyd White of Moberly, Mo., has just finished a series of Sunday evening sermons on "The Church of Christ," as follows:

Origin and Authority of the Church.
Purpose and Organization.
Principles and Practices.
Spirit and Service.
The Twentieth Century Church.

The Centennial is kept prominently before the minds of the people both from the pulpit and through the bulletin. Complete use is being made of the Centennial roll book, and every department of the church has its own Centennial aim. In the Bible-school this is "An attendance of one thousand before the Centennial."

The church has become a living link for heathen missions this year, and is making corresponding advance for other interests.

There are three or four young men whom Brother White considers hopeful Timothys.

The above series of sermons is being followed by another course on the "Reformation of the Ninteenth Century." After that will come several on the "Fathers of the Restoration Movement," which in turn will be followed by a series of morning services on the various Centennial aims.

Centennial College Banquets.

President Hill M. Bell of Drake University, was in the city this week arranging for the Centennial Banquet of his great institution. He was delighted with the facilities placed at his disposal, and made a contract for 400 plates.

One of the most important questions that will come up before the Centennial committee at its meeting in Pittsburg May 10, will be the arrangement of hours for the Centennial college banquets, so that there will be the least possible conflict between these functions and the sessions of the convention.

This, That and the Other.

The mail coming to Centennial headquarters grows daily in volume and interest. Charles Reign Scoville promises to forward at once the program for the day of New Testament evangelism, Tuesday, October 19. Herbert Moninger sent in the superb bill of fare for the three Teacher Training sections of Bible-school day, Monday afternoon, October 18. If he has not given it out, we will hold it in the hope that next week, or the following, the morning and evening sections of the same day can be published and the Evangelistic Prospectus at the same time.

Not content with writing much, and always to the point, W. C. Pearce, International superintendent of Adult Class Work, spent Monday in Pittsburg organizing his local lieutenants for the Adult Class sections in the Centennial. E. O. Excell was with him to get first-hand knowledge of the situation from the singers' viewpoint.

The spirit of our preachers' response to invitations to preach Centennial Lord's Day lifts one's highest conceptions of the occasion's greatness. These are going to be such sermons as no other time, no other place and no other men could produce.

The Centennial roll books are going out by counties and states. To make sure that not even one of our "Scattered Disciples" is missed we have asked the state secretaries to suggest the names of special Centennial secretaries in every county and district. Without waiting for such appointment let the brethren of every community take up the matter themselves. For instance, E. F. Daugherty has ordered roll books for every church in Wabash county, Ind., giving the size of the book to be sent to each. W. A. Fite did the same for Callaway county, Mo., H. F. Barstow for the state of Wisconsin, Frank E. Jones for Southern Idaho, etc., etc.

Did you notice W. C. Pearce's last quarterly report showing that in three months our number of organized adult classes had doubled, from 800 to 1600? We now lead all religious bodies both in the number of classes and in aggregate membership—and we are just getting started!

Let us send the banner, "All the church and as many more in the Bible-school." It is printed in black and red on muslin twenty-eight inches wide and 125 inches long. It costs us three-tenths of a cent more than the fifty cents we charge, but we are anxious to lose thirty dollars this way.

We have taken no little pride, and justly, in the Americanism of the plea both in origin and spirit. We have rightly insisted that the better statement is to say, "America is a Christian continent, both in the origin of its settlements and in the genius of its laws and customs." The first Lord's Day of May gave us all a chance to show the reality of our faith. It is a proud distinction that we enjoy. It is a grave responsibility that we share.

The slow and painful beginnings of a hundred years ago are in marked contrast with instantaneous responses that most of our present day home missionaries meet. There are still hostile sectarians and locked houses and warned congregations, but they are merely survivals. Both in numbers and in power they are daily wanting. Are we as steadily waxing in zeal and consecration?

Each of the Centennial speakers and preachers is being asked for half a dozen of the photographs that he wishes to go down in history." (We wish they would all accept this instead of a formal request by letter.) By our Centennial offering for American Missions this entire American movement for pure and powerful Christianity is giving its real likeness to the world! Make it God-like, brethren!

W. R. Warren,
Centennial Secretary.

—Harvey W. Scott of Portland, Ore., is to be the American ambassador to Mexico, to succeed David E. Thompson of Nebraska, who will leave the diplomatic service. The change will not take place for several months, however. Mr. Scott is seventy-one years old. He is editor of the Portland Oregonian, and is one of the best known journalists of the West.

OLD SOAKERS
Get Saturated With Caffeine.

When a person has used coffee for a number of years and gradually declined in health, it is time the coffee should be left off in order to see whether or not that has been the cause of the trouble.

A lady in Huntsville, Ala., says she used coffee for about 40 years, and for the past 20 years was troubled with stomach trouble.

"I have been treated by many physicians but all in vain. Everything failed to perfect a cure. I was prostrated for some time, and came near dying. When I recovered sufficiently to partake of food and drink I tried coffee again and it soured on my stomach.

"I finally concluded coffee was the cause of my troubles and stopped using it. I tried tea and then milk in its place, but neither agreed with me; then I commenced using Postum. I had it properly made and it was very pleasing to the taste.

"I have now used it four months, and my health is so greatly improved that I can eat almost anything I want and can sleep well, whereas, before, I suffered for years with insomnia.

"I have found the cause of my troubles and a way to get rid of them. You can depend upon it, I appreciate Postum."

"There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Mrs. W. T. Moore's Resignation at Christian College

For nearly two years, Mrs. Moore's health has been so precarious that it has been doubtful whether she could continue her work at Christian College. She has tried two different Sanitariums, and though benefited, it finally became evident that she would be compelled to resign the Presidency of Christian College. This she has done, and final arrangements were consummated April 27, by which she rents her half life ownership of the college grounds, buildings, furnishings and equipment, to the Board of Trustees of the same. Heretofore, the Trustees have had only a nominal relation to the management of the College, and it was felt by Mrs. Moore that a much more real relation would bring the Board into active sympathy and helpfulness in a greater degree than had been the case in the past history of the College. She therefore proposed, on certain conditions, to make over her interests to the Trustees.

Mrs. L. W. St. Clair, who has been a business co-partner with Mrs. Moore for ten years, comes back to the institution, and at the close of the present collegiate year will become its President, with the Board of Trustees associated in half ownership.

While Mrs. Moore regrets very much the necessity of giving up her work at Christian College, she nevertheless rejoices in the fact that she leaves the College in a much better condition than it has ever been in its history. For the last six years, while she has been alone in the work, being responsible for both the business management and the Academic direction, the number of student boarders in the dormitory has averaged considerably more than at any other time since the College was founded. Furthermore, the amount of money she has put into permanent improvements, liquidation of debts, equipment, etc., etc., during the last six years has been almost marvelous, the sum amounting in round numbers to about $70,000. When it is remembered that during these six years she has had the disadvantage of two presidential years and a very severe financial crisis, it is little wonder that she has broken down under the labors which all this splendid work has entailed upon her.

In taking leave of the College, Mrs. Moore expresses her hearty desire that it may continue to be a great success in the future. She has put twelve of the best years of her life into building it up to its present almost unrivaled position. Mrs. St. Clair has already had eight years of experience in the administration of the College, four years before Mrs. Moore was elected President, and then after Mrs. Moore had served two years alone, Mrs. St. Clair became associated with her as co-principal for four years until Mrs. St. Clair went to Kentucky, leaving Mrs. Moore alone in the management of the College for the last six years.

During the four years when Mrs. Moore and Mrs. St. Clair worked together, Mrs. St. Clair nobly assisted in the administration of the school and in the erection of new buildings, giving her share of means, as well as of labor, for that purpose. Mrs. St. Clair is, therefore, no stranger to the College, and with the hearty coöperation of the Trustees, who are now equally interested with her in the management of the College, and in its financial success, there is no reason why the future of the College should not be brighter than in the years already past, especially as it is now nearly out of debt, and thoroughly equipped with splendid buildings, beautiful grounds, and everything needful for the work before it.

Mrs. Moore has not only given these twelve years, as well as a goodly fortune, to the work of building up the College, but she has also sacrificed her health in performing the strenuous duties resulting from doing the double work of attending to the business, and at the same time superintending all of the affairs of so large an institution. But, however this may be, she rejoices that her efforts have not been in vain to save the College and to make it what it is.

The Christian Century

Vol. XXVI. CHICAGO, ILL., MAY 13, 1909. No. 20

Has God Spoken to Man?

It is the steadfast conviction of the Christian church that in the Holy Scriptures God's life is revealed to man as in no other utterance of literature or history. The uniqueness of the Bible places it far beyond comparison with any other writing. All the arguments which have been formulated by theology to prove its inspiration fall far short of the simple impression which the Book makes upon its readers. Above all other documents it rises, not so much by what it claims for itself, nor by reason of its departure from the usual manner of writings in antiquity. It has the same general characteristics which are found in other ancient documents. It uses the language, the thought, the figures, the imagery, the conceptions of the age or ages out of which it came. It shares the human limitations of its writers in many varying forms.

And yet there breathes through it a unity of purpose, a sense of divine things, which no other book possesses, and it, therefore, vindicates for itself daily at the bar of public opinion and of private inquiry the title of the Holy Scriptures, the Word of God. Yet this remarkable collection of books claims this name not in virtue of the fact that in it God speaks in direct terms, nor even that Jesus, our final and authoritative interpreter of God, ever wrote a portion of it. In fact the only place at which divine activity in connection with actual written records is asserted is in the story of the Ten Commandments. But even there the varying character of the narratives makes it uncertain as to whether primitive belief credited the actual writing to Moses or to God; and the customs of primitive nations furnish abundant proof that laws were customarily described as having been received on tablets of stone, written by the divine hand.

The Bible student comes to see with increasing clearness the fact that the Scriptures are less the Word of God to man in the sense that the documents are the chief concern of God, than that the Bible is the record of the religious experiences of those who have known God most intimately and have spoken most authoritatively in his name. This authority grew out of their own high sense of the divine will, and the results of their lives prove that in this perception of things they were not mistaken. Many a record has claimed to be inspired of deity without evincing such qualities as would fortify the claim. The sacred books of the world abound in such assertions. The Bible is perhaps the most modest of all the holy books of the nations in its claims for itself. Yet its impressiveness and urgency remain superior to every other document.

How then did God speak to his people in olden time? Did the prophets hear the voice of God as one man hears another? Did Moses converse with deity in the mountain as friends meet and talk by the way? Have we the record of the actual words uttered in human speech by the heavenly Father, and reproduced in the narratives of the prophets, priests, and sages in the annals of Israel's history? It is needless to say that the satisfaction which many sincere and confident Christians derive from the reading of the Bible rests upon the belief that the words of the Old Testament are to be taken quite literally, and that whenever a prophet begins his utterances with, "Thus saith the Lord," or whenever the statement is made that "the Lord said to Moses," to Samuel, or to others, it is to be understood that the very words of deity are used.

Yet the objections to this view are insuperable. They grow first out of the failure to understand primitive modes of thought and expression. There was probably no other way in which the prophet, whose soul was aflame with a passion to utter the truth which the divine Spirit communicated to him in his hours of meditation upon his age, his people, and his religious duties, could convey to his hearers the meaning of things as he interpreted the mind of God. To have omitted from his speech that element of authority which came from the assertion that he was putting forth the truths he had received direct from Jehovah would have been to vitiate his work and leave it without sanction in the minds of his hearers.

Nor was he conscious of any departure from the absolute truth in such an utterance. To him God had spoken in the recesses of his own heart with an authority which no outward oracle could have equaled. But again it is perfectly clear that the messages which the prophets proclaimed and which they believed implicitly to be the will of God were of varied value and not always either final or fully trustworthy. In cases where the prophets of one generation spoke one message as the will and word of God and their successors in the next generation denounced that former message as mischievous and false, it is impossible to suppose that in either case we have more than the prophet's own highest conception of the divine mind for his time, the result of his own experience and his devotion to the program of righteousness. Of such phenomena the Old Testament contains many examples, and skepticism has made the most of them in its effort to belittle the book. But such negative arguments fall to the ground when one abandons the theory of verbal inspiration, which fails so absolutely to explain the simple facts of Old Testament narratives.

That God spoke to his people in the lives of holy men of the past rather than in words heard by the outward ear is a view which not only meets every test of the Scriptures but satisfies the mind as no other theory can do. This does not mean that those who have been accustomed to other conceptions, such as the verbal theory of Scripture implies, may not find their customary views of greater value to them than any which attempt to explain all the facts as biblical scholars today find them. No one who has reached a final and satisfactory view of the Bible even on so treacherous and unstable a ground as that of verbal inspiration should be asked to abandon it as long as it yields him a standing ground of even fancied security.

The real problem becomes urgent in the experience of those who look more deeply into the facts and who have discovered that beyond the frontiers of mere verbal inspiration there lies a whole region of meaning in the Bible for them. Modern scholarship has no controversy with theories that have failed to meet the test of facts. Those who still adhere to such theories may well be left in the serene possession of an unchallenged faith. But the questioning and alert mind of our generation needs more substantial bases for its faith in Holy Scripture, and such bases are found in the utterances of the great men of Israel's history. These utterances themselves came out of the experiences of their own lives, in which God was apprehended in such convincing ways that they were left in no doubt of his presence or of his purposes, and went forth to declare in their own language but with absolute urgency and authority, the will of the Highest for their generation. Such men adequately prepared the way for the coming of Jesus, and the results of their lives and teaching are the vindication of their activity. We are concerned not with the method which they employed but with the facts which they revealed.

Conscious, therefore, that the Bible is not a mere rescript of messages spoken from the sky in the ears of men, but is the record of human lives conscious of the presence of the Infinite and struggling through human limitations to a truer knowledge of holy things, the student traces the story of God's education of the race through all of its windings and variations up to that supreme moment when Jesus spoke as never man had spoken. And in this onward progress from low to higher levels of duty, from dim to clearer visions of truth, lies the authority of the Word of God for all men. It is not the authority of mere assertion, nor of ecclesiastical institutions, nor of dogmatic propositions. It is the authority of the one Life in all history for which definite and constant preparation was made, a life whose facts are the most wonderful and compelling in history, a life whose touch outreaches all nations to the end of time. Such an authority is supreme. Such a life has imperial and compelling values for every open-minded and reverent spirit.

DICTATOR DIAZ

President Diaz has "consented" to serve as President of Mexico for another term. If he lives through it his "reign" will be among the longest of living rulers. Diaz has been praised much as the Father of Mexico. He has made her modern, given her international standing, developed vast resources, cleared her roads and mountains of banditti, created a commerce, granted religious toleration, laid railroads and made her name fair among the nations. All this he has done and he has done it with the iron hand of a Spanish dictator. He can have no successful opposition as a candidate for president because those who oppose him soon either leave the country or find it safer to become his supporters. There are no elections in Mexico. The form is generally gone through with, as in some other Spanish republics, but the military conduct them, the ruling officials count the votes, and the result is always practically unanimous.

Diaz is a sort of benevolent dictator. Were Castro a man of Diaz's caliber he would be acclaimed as is Diaz because he would use his power as has Diaz, discerning the signs of the times and placating the power of foreign money and being a benevolent rather than a petty tyrant.

Diaz has developed Mexico at the top. Her shame is her people. The masses are in dense ignorance and are little better than serfs. Vast holdings are in the hands of the few and the favored. Wages are far below the standards of civilization and illiteracy beggars belief for a nation with the fair reputation of our southern neighbor. Immense tribute is paid for the foreign capital that has developed Mexico; not only the tribute of large dividends but the tribute of millions of days of grinding animal toil where men do the tasks of beasts and live but a grade above the barbarous.

Diaz is a fitting representative of the old theory that a "benevolent despot" is the ideal type of ruler and furnishes the model government. His is the administration of "big business." It has given Mexico property, but who has ever boasted of the men it has given her. The world crosses paths with Mexico on the highways of investment and from that viewpoint all seems splendid. At the multitudinous crossroads where her millions dwell, travelers and missionaries today are discovering to the world the real state of Mexican civilization.

ONE OF UNCLE SAM'S BANK ACCOUNTS

Victor Murdock, the courageous young Kansas congressman, has been poking around Uncle Sam's treasury and finds that our Uncle had some spare cash back in the late thirties and so loaned it to the states under the name of "deposits." Wall street did not have a City Bank in those days and our Uncle was rather primitive in his ways anyhow, so he "deposited" the surplus with the states "until called for." Twenty-six states received proportionate amounts amounting to a little over $28,000,000. There was to be no interest and the states were to keep it "until otherwise directed by congress." Congress seems to have forgotten all about it, and the states likewise, and now young Mr. Murdock is in a fair way to raise some trouble for the sake of our depleted national treasury. He asks that it be "otherwise directed by congress."

JUDGE CLELAND'S INDICTMENT OF JUSTICE

Judge Cleland has made a reputation that bids fair to rival that of Judge Ben Lindsey. He is the famous "parole judge" and the orthodoxy of his fellow judges has managed to deprive him of his bench of mercy. They have defeated him for a time and like all the traditionalists think they have put him out of the way, but the far reaching effect of their zeal will be but to give publicity to his methods and make mandatory by law what he was doing by personal initiative. In a recent address the judge made some striking indictments of the orthodox manner of administering justice to the masses in the courts of first resort in a great city. Where justice is ground out in machine-like manner because the accused has no neighborly publicity as he has in a smaller place where all know all the neighborhood affairs. He had the facts in hand and most of them were so recent as to defy contradiction or to be explained away.

He showed that last year in the city of Chicago, 8,326 men and women were locked up in the house of correction, "with the scum of the earth," because they were too poor to pay their fines. In 1,173 cases the fine was but $1.00 and in 2,750 cases it was $5.00 or less. The day before the Illinois Central Railroad had been fined $700 for seven violations of the law, and of course paid it without difficulty out of the $57,000,000 of profits it laid up last year. A few days previously a mother of seven children was locked up for picking up decayed fruit in South Water street. The judge said "The crowning injustice of our law is done the poor—God help them." Out of 1,231 prisoners the judge paroled while at the Maxwell Street Station, 1,134 quit drinking, found work, and escaped further criminality. Had he not paroled them they would have gone to the Bridewell as these others and been disgraced and discouraged and made worse by their associations. Yet the judge must do it no more because the traditions and orthodoxy of judicial procedure forbid. Let the mint, anise and cummin of the judicial creed be tithed, though the weightier things of justice and righteousness be neglected.

TOLL FOR THE PEOPLE

Chicago has had many troubles over its street car system. Yerkes made millions out of it and left one of the worst systems in the world. The people voted for city ownership but the powers-that-be thwarted their will and the companies are now operating under a compromise by which they are rehabilitating the lines and giving the city 55 per cent of the profits after taking 5 per cent for interest on the investment. The city's share on this arrangement was $864,290 for the last year. This gives the public some idea of the enormous toll they pay to the usual street car corporation. The people are exacting a toll of nearly a million a year now from the public corporation to whom they grant the privilege of charging five cents for a ride. In accounting it was found that the companies kept a double set of books, one of which was secret. A system of rebates was found by which the material for rehabilitating was discounted to the companies. The question is as to whether the city gets its 55 per cent of these rebates. The company finally offered to let the accountants examine the secret accounts on any specific item but not to give full access to them. Full publicity will not be denied by frank honesty.

WILL THE TURK BE FREE?

One of the most remarkable revolutions of history is going on in the Land of the Crescent. The extreme individualism and the fatalism of the Turk, combined with the orientalism of his character, was supposed to make him immune to progress until he was taken in charge by some western power and forced along the way. Today we see him winning his own way to freedom but we may well ask the question, "Will he be free?"

Artillery Officer, The Young Turks.

There has been a Young Turk party for some years with headquarters in Paris and members in every European capital. They were educated men who held to the forms at least of Mohammedanism, but caught the spirit of the Christian world. At home there were many who silently lived under the old regime, but secretly confided in the Young Turks and even acted as agents for them. Gradually there grew up a marvelous masonry among them. No one knew who more than four others were, but all acted under a common direction. Their ignorance of persons and their enlightenment in principles and policies made them immune from fatal home conspiracies and effective as soldiers of the silent cause. Their numbers grew to thirty thousand and there was scarcely a hamlet in Turkish Europe that did not claim as members of it the three or four ablest and most progressive leaders in it. The empire was honeycombed with sedition in the name of liberty.

It was a marvelous organization and explains the quiet with which the revolution progressed to the gates of Constantinople. The old Sultan, immured within the fatal assurances of his harem and spies, was nonplussed when an army of revolution could march to the doors of his palace without a hand being raised in all the land to stay their progress.

But Abdul the Damned had lived for thirty years by the power of intrigue and the fear of his cruel deperation, visited with sure vengeance upon the one here and there who dared to assert a contrary opinion. He could not conceive that terror was yet out of the hearts of his people and he bowed with many a grimace of graceful pretension and signed the constitution which he had once overthrown. He then appealed to the smoldering fires of fanatical tradition in the hearts of those nearest him and no doubt firmly thought his day was won. He say the army about the palace once more obey his will and sure of his old time tyranny planned to rid the country of his enemies and to do it with such barbarity that all sympathizers would once and forever cower into abject compliance. But he had not reckoned with his host.

The spirit of the Young Turks had saturated the army. It required men of some education to make the army the Sultan must have to face the probable contingencies his place in Europe has placed him in. And education meant sympathy with progress. The Young Turks had the army leaders with them. Thus the crafty mediæval despot must now await his fate and his own blindness hastened his day.

It may well be seriously doubted that the present high ideals of the Young Turks can be put into operation. Turkey is a conglomerate of peoples and religions and the masses of them are yet full of primitive passion and religious and racial hate. It will need a strong hand and a universal school and police system. They have already shown their wisdom by employing foreign experts to teach them the arts of organization and industry. Englishmen have been retained to reorganize the customs, the navy, and a scheme of irrigation. The army is under the efficient tutoring of Germans and a large number of young men will be sent to foreign universities.

There will doubtless be excesses in the name of liberty. Old racial and religious hatred will take vengeance here and there through the attempts to relax militarism. The traditional faith will cry for supremacy and death to the Giaour. Ambitious men will abuse new found power. But Turkey is firmly caught in the spirit of the age and she will overcome all handicaps, even that of her fatalistic religion, and will be free. To be both free and Mohammedan may be impossible unless the religion of Islam is modified and grafts in the civilizing factors of Christianity.

The Disciples of Christ were honored by the selection of Rev. A. W. Fortune, of the Walnut Hills Christian Church, Cincinnati, as a member of the Interdenominational Commission which visited a number of the leading cities of the country in the campaign for home missions. Reports from the cities where the Commission held its meetings indicate that Mr. Fortune's work was very greatly appreciated.

E. B. Barnes, of Grand Rapids, Mich., calls the attention of Mr. P. C. Macfarlane to the fact that Mr. J. A. Macdonald, editor of the Toronto Globe, was formerly a Presbyterian minister and preached for several years in Toronto before entering upon a journalistic career. This fact, Mr. Barnes says, explains the remarkable grasp of church affairs evinced by the brainy editor in his address in Toronto at which Mr. Macfarlane marveled.

The retirement of President James B. Angell from his position at the head of the University of Michigan is an incident of more than usual importance. For nearly forty years he has been the creating and inspiring factor in the development of one of the greatest of our state universities. Yet there has never been any of the spectacular in President Angell's work. With a quietness that almost seemed subtle, with a geniality that seemed to include in his friendship every student in the university, he has slowly built up that institution which is really his creation. Few men have done more for popular education in this generation than he.

We have been following the literature on the Men's Movement quite closely recently and we find ourselves growing tired of the tone of voice in which many writers address us just because we happen to be men. The "hurrah boys" kind of literature and of speech addressed to Christian men about the grave and weighty matters of the moral life is not, in our opinion, going to interest them for the long run. The affectation of swagger manners and the language of "sports" will not permanently enlist men. After all's said, what men like in their leaders is downright earnestness expressed in pure speech no less devoid of vulgarism than of prudishness.

On Wednesday evening of last week occurred the tragic death of Professor Hugh M. Scott of the Chicago Theological Seminary, who, in the driving storm which prevailed through the evening, was caught between two electric cars on one of the down town streets and crushed. Professor Scott had been for many years in charge of the department of church history at the Seminary. He was held in universal esteem and was in constant demand as a preacher. His education was of the broadest, having been completed by courses of study in Edinburgh and Berlin. He was closely identified with the city mission work of the Congregational church and was an active promoter of all good causes in the city. His death will be profoundly felt not only at the Seminary but in the wide circle in which he was honored.

The Survey for May contains an exceedingly interesting article on "The Irregularity of Employment of Women Factory Workers," by Louise C. Odenerantz. It shows by detailed statement and by illustrations how precarious are those forms of employment upon which many women depend for living, including the weary following up of advertisements, the waiting in lines of applicants for an opportunity to apply for the position, and the brief duration of many such jobs when actually secured. Other articles in this same number deal with the Pittsburg Playgrounds, the work of the Pure Food Commission in Indianapolis, and The Industrial Survey of the Month, by Professor Graham Taylor.

Mrs. Mary Agnew, who has for several years been the efficient and devoted President of the Chicago Christian Woman's Board of Missions, has left the city to make her home in the far West. Mrs. Agnew will be greatly missed by the auxiliaries of this city. She was a faithful and consecrated worker in the interest of this great missionary enterprise. With unfailing devotion she attended the meetings and looked after the interests of the work. The best wishes of Chicago Disciples will go with her to her new South Dakota home. It may be taken for granted that if there is a church within reaching distance of the Agnew home, she will be an active and valued member.

The Convention of the churches of the Second District of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society will be held in Memorial Church of Christ in this city May 20 and 21. The Second District includes Chicago and the immediate region. The first day will be devoted to the sessions of the C. W. B. M. and luncheon will be served by the Woman's Society of Memorial Church. The second day will be given to the program of the District Society which is practically identical with the Chicago Christian Missionary Society. An interesting list of speakers has been prepared and a notable feature of the evening program will be the use of stereopticon views relating to social conditions in Chicago.

The Auditorium theatre in this city was filled to its capacity a week ago to listen to the debate regarding the success of prohibition, by President Dickie, of Albion College, Michigan, and Mayor Rose of Milwaukee. President Dickie is widely known as a leader in the prohibition movement, and it was a notable fact that on the very evening of the debate the city of Albion, where he lives, permanently closed the doors of all its saloons, largely as the result of his efforts and those of his colleagues at the college. The liquor interests were heavily represented in the audience, as every effort had been made to secure a noisy element on that side. The speeches were strong and the educational value of the occasion was very great. Mayor Rose used to the utmost the narrow margin of reasonable argument in favor of personal liberty, and his appeals to prejudice and sectarianism made up the remainder of his contention on behalf of the saloon.

Notes of the Peace Congress

The Second National Peace Congress was held in this city last week. It was a very notable gathering in the number of delegates present and the character of the program rendered. The weather was ideal and the sessions were well attended, several of them being duplicated in Orchestra Hall and the Fine Arts Building.

* * *

The main auditorium of the Congress was Orchestra Hall, which was tastefully draped with flags and with the coats of arms of the various nations which have taken leading parts in peace negotiations during recent years. The symbol of the Congress, a huge circular shield with the inscription "Peace and Justice, Chicago, 1909" circling a field on which a dove with olive branch was quartered with a pair of balances, occupied the center of the rear of the stage, and prominently displayed about the hall were the names of Bright, Bloch, Ladd, Kant, Sumner, Penn, Channing, Grotius, Victor Hugo, and Nobel, whose names are familiar to workers in the cause of conciliation.

* * *

The week began with services directly related to the theme of the Congress in a number of churches. Many of the prominent delegates occupied Chicago pulpits and emphasized the work of the Congress and the general cause of peace. On Sunday evening a mass meeting was held in Orchestra Hall under the auspices of the Sunday Evening Club at which addresses were made by Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Dr. E. G. Hirsch, and President Schurman of Cornell.

* * *

The sessions of the Congress began on Monday afternoon, after a morning spent in the registration of the incoming delegates. The first session was devoted largely to greetings from the state and city and to reports regarding the present position of the peace movement, the final address of the afternoon being given by Dean W. P. Rogers of the Cincinnati Law School on the "Dawn of Universal Peace." Later still in the afternoon a reception was tendered to visiting delegates in the foyer of Orchestra Hall.

* * *

At the Monday evening meeting held in Orchestra Hall, perhaps the most notable address was that of President Jordan of Leland Stanford University, who spoke on the "Biology of War" and pointed out the deteriorating effects upon nations caused by the loss of their best blood through the havoc of the battlefield. The fact that the inferior men of a nation remain at home and become the fathers of the coming generation accounts for much in the history of Rome, Greece, Italy, Spain, and perhaps nations nearer home. At the same hour in the Fine Arts Building Professor Graham Taylor delivered an address on "Victims of War and Industry."

* * *

The depressing effects of war upon business was the chief theme at the Tuesday morning session. And at the same hour a committee on resolutions held an open session. Tuesday afternoon Professor Hull, of Swarthmore College, spoke upon the "Advance Registered by the Two Hague Conferences." Professor Hull has written perhaps the best account now available of these notable gatherings. At the same hour the Chicago Woman's Club held a session at which addresses were delivered by a large number of representative women from different organizations interested in the peace movement. This session was closed by an address on "The Five Dangerous Fallacies," by Mrs. Ames Mead, of Boston. At the same hour the intercollegiate oratorical contest was held at Mandel Hall at the University of Chicago with a theme of university and college interest in the peace movement and an address on the Cosmopolitan Clubs was delivered.

* * *

Tuesday evening was devoted to the next steps in peace making, and Mr. Edwin D. Mead, of Boston, spoke on the "Arrest of Competitive Arming in Fidelity to the Hague Movement," and J. L. Jones spoke on "Armaments as Irritants." In the Fine Arts Building, Mr. Holt, of the Independent, spoke on "The Federation of the World." Wednesday morning was given over to ten minute addresses from leading representatives of peace organizations through the country. And in the afternoon the closing session of the Congress was the occasion for the introduction of Count von Bernstorff, Minister from Germany; Wu Ting Fang, Minister from China; Honorable Richard A. Ballinger, Secretary of the Interior, and a number of consular and diplomatic representatives of foreign governments.

The First National Peace Congress, held in the United States, met in New York in 1907. This is the second. International Peace Congresses have been held since 1843 in different cities of Europe and America, the one in connection with the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago in 1893 being one of the most notable. Of course the central feature of the world's effort for peace is the series of Hague Conferences, of which the first met on May 18, 1899, with official representatives of twenty-six nations present. The second met in 1907 with the representatives of forty-four nations present. The Third Hague Conference is planned for 1915.

On Wednesday evening a magnificent banquet was given by the Chicago Association of Commerce to the visitors at the Congress. Addresses were delivered by the Secretary of the Interior, several members of Congress, and other notable visitors. The Convention was admirably planned. The various committees did their work with promptness and precision and in all respects the gathering was most effective and impressive.

One of the interesting features connected with the movement for disarmament, conciliation, and arbitration is the Nobel Peace Prize, which has been conferred annually since 1901 upon some person or persons prominent in the work of international conciliation. The only American to receive this prize was Theodore Roosevelt, the recipient in 1906.

A number of auxiliary gatherings were held in Chicago during the progress of the Peace Congress to which some of the visitors were invited, such as the luncheon of the Outlook Conference on Monday where addresses were made by Mr. Mead, Professor Hull, Dr. Crapsy, and others.

The press of this city gave large space to the Congress, and the associated press did admirable work in diffusing knowledge of its sessions throughout the country. Chicago pulpits and those of many other cities devoted the services of the Sunday following the Congress to a consideration of the great theme of international peace and to a summary of the impressions made by the great gathering.

Positive Good in a Successful Revival

Further Study of the Typical Meeting Held in Illinois' Capital

The reports of the great revival in Springfield, Ill., printed in recent issues of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY have elicited a variety of responses from the readers of this paper. Some have taken keen delight and uncritical satisfaction in the reports. Others have expressed surprise, not to say chagrin, that their favorite paper could regard a Billy Sunday meeting with sufficient toleration to justify an extended and graphic write-up. Still others have expressed the view (which we ourselves hold), that such a phenomenon in our modern church life and in the spiritual history of a typical city demands a fair reporting as a basis for further analysis and ultimate evaluation.

Now that the meeting is over and the churches with their host of reinforcements are devoting themselves again to the steady tasks of Christian culture and service, it is well for us to examine and see what are the positive good effects produced by the great revival.

Of course the obvious good in the meeting is the fact that about five thousand people were "converted," of whom close to twenty-five hundred have joined the churches. With many this bare fact will suffice as a basis of estimating the meeting. Their standard of value in evangelism is numbers. The meeting in Springfield with five thousand conversions is a more successful meeting than that in Anderson, Indiana, with twelve hundred conversions, and less successful than that in Melbourne, Australia, with ten thousand conversions.

To our mind this way of measuring the significance of religious work is superficial and false. In Christian work quantity is significant only where quality is assured. We call to mind an evangelistic meeting in which five thousand persons were alleged to be converted. It does not seem presumptuous for us to say that that meeting acted to retard the Kingdom of God rather than to advance it. Another meeting we recall, one in whose leadership we had a subordinate part, in which two hundred persons came forward, organizing themselves immediately into a church. In our heart we have no doubt that that meeting brought pain to the heart of God and his angels instead of the joy with which heaven hears of every sinner who repents.

What qualitative facts lie back of the numerical returns in the Springfield revival? To this test of quality all Christian work must at last submit. "The fire shall try every man's work, of what sort it is." We shall undertake at this writing to point out the positive values with which our mind was struck in a study of the Springfield meetings.

Most impressive to us was the beauty and singular power of a united church.

The absurdities of sectarianism were temporarily cast aside. Twenty churches forgot their petty differences and stood together on their mighty agreements. Twenty pastors stood shoulder to shoulder in battle against the common enemy under the command of Christ. It was beautiful indeed to see these Christian brethren dwelling together in unity. And it must have given every man of them an oft repeated suggestion of the possible power of a united church which should stay united all the year round. No doubt the consummation for which our hearts devoutly pray, after the manner of our Lord, was brought nearer by the fellowship of those six weeks.

The Springfield churches were awakened to a consciousness of undreamed-of power in the community's life.

Churches get into the habit of tolerating low standards of morality in their community. A certain amount of talking against flagrant evils is expected to be done in the course of the year, but nobody expects the evil thing to be put away. A nice balance of power is maintained between sin and righteousness in the community. In order to maintain this balance the pulpit must occasionally fulminate against flourishing vices, but these vices are so entrenched, so knitted in with political and business interests, as to defy the sporadic attacks of the church. In fact the church comes to be a mere symbol of protest, a sign that evil is flourishing without the consent of that class of citizens represented in the churches, rather than an aggressive militant force constantly extending the borders of its dominion.

Such a meeting as that in Springfield brings into the realm of possibility a higher righteousness for individuals and the city. New and purer standards are set up. The church feels its power as an engine for civic righteousness and it can hardly settle back into the old toleration with the consent of its conscience.

A revival like that in Springfield compels men ordinarily removed from church influence to entertain the possibility of becoming Christians.

Every community contains men and women who, psychologically considered, are virtual heathens. They may be among the most respectable folk. They walk up and down past the churches. They even go into the churches and hear sermons. But the inherent claim of the gospel has never gripped them. The plea of Christ has never stuck to their smooth-rubbed souls. The church they take for granted. It is a good thing in the community, but that they have any obligation to sustain it never occurs to them.

What Mr. Sunday's meeting in Springfield did was to create such an atmosphere in the whole city as that hardly any man could escape reckoning with the call of Christ and the church to him personally. As a result the churches are reënforced with the presence and help of many men and women whose present attitude would not have been predicted by their best friends. There is enormous achievement in getting religion into the atmosphere of a community. Pentacosts come that way.

One feature of the Springfield revival that impressed us as extraordinarily well conceived and executed was the placing of religion in close juxtaposition with people's every day work.

Factory meetings were held every day. In big stores and laundries and shops, wherever men and women were gathered together, Mr. Sunday's assistants went and spoke at the noon or other convenient hour about Christ. Large sections of seats were reserved often in the big tabernacle, for various labor unions. People were not only invited to come and hear, but men and women who had heard went forth to tell the good news. The good effect of this method of taking the gospel to the people was seen in the conversion of groups of associates who work in the same room, or at the same desk, or in the same factory. No doubt as the Christian life is carried on this companionship of toil and of religious experience will be a constant stimulus to the highest ideals.

Finally, we could not but be impressed with the fact that Mr. Sunday's work was an aid in releasing religion from the thrall and bigotry of dogma.

If you asked the evangelist direct questions on doctrine you would find that he is a dogmatist, and one of the old school type. But in his actual preaching Mr. Sunday's dominant note was the ethical. We do not think for a moment that his crude theological conceptions were adopted by his converts. Probably three-fourths of the pastors in the meeting would regard his teaching on dogmatic questions as impossible. But neither they nor the people were made conscious of this aspect of the sermon. Mr. Sunday is not a teacher but a preacher of righteousness and of faith.

The effect of such a ministry under union auspices for six weeks is to release religion from dogma. It shows the possibility of union upon the great vital fundamentals of our religion in which all Christian churches agree. No minister could now proclaim his distinctive sectarian dogmas without an apologetic tone. The insignificance of creedal considerations has been made manifest in the presence of the saving grace of Christ and the practical problems of personal and community righteousness.

It is our purpose to suggest next week certain possibilities of harm resulting from such a revival.

The Coming Christian Unity

An Editorial in The Congregationalist That Will Quicken the Pulse of Every Disciple

Whenever a public service is held in which several Christian denominations take part, the coming union of all into one body is sure to be spoken of. It is sure also to call forth a fervent response. The strong and widespread desire for union may be taken as a prophecy of its coming. Recently at the celebration of the centenary of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York, this was the main theme. Dr. Mellvaine, formerly pastor of that church, later for several years pastor of Union Congregational Church, Providence, now rector of Calvary Episcopal Church in Pittsburg, honored in all these denominations, evoked devout enthusiasm when he declared that the union of the church is coming.

How is it coming and what will it be? It is nearly always anticipated as one organization based on one declaration of belief. The main efforts to bring in Christian unity are in the direction of adjusting differences of ecclesiastical government and of formulating a single creed that all Christians may be willing to sign. We do not see any real progress toward union along either of these paths. In our country the attempt of Congregationalists, United Brethren and Methodist Protestants demonstrated the fact of the essential unity of those concerned in it and quickened the sense of Christian brotherhood. It was a glad and inspiring experience of the betrothal till we came to the final act of accepting the written basis of agreement and the management of the household. Then the engagement was broken. A similar process is going on among churches in Canada and another in Australia. We are confident that they will ultimately come to have a like result.

The unity that is everywhere talked about is unity of government, bringing all the churches under the control of one body. That is the ideal of the Roman Church. That is the unity that is not coming. The trend of society is away from it. The assertion of the divine right of kings, of the peculiar divine knowledge and power of priests commands unity through subjection, provokes revolution. The social religious movement of today is toward the primitive Hebrew ideal of a kingdom of priests whose leaders say, with Moses, would that all the people were prophets. The time is wasted that is spent in planning a yoke under which all the churches can be persuaded to put their necks.

The basis for unity is sought in a common creed, and this is looked for diligently among things new and things old. It will not be found in either collection. The newer creeds may be excellent, but they have not stood the test of time. Some are wholly evolved out of current religious thinking, and the more one is absorbed in the present phases of Christian experience the better he is pleased with them. Some, like the one proposed by our Canadian brethren, are curious attempts to recite past experience in the present tense. Our Australian brethren would ignore the Christian experience of fifteen centuries and go back for their creed to the Council of Nicea. None of these efforts to find a common statement of belief can succeed. Unity of belief comes only when one person does all the thinking and all others are subject to him. The tendency of our time is toward independence of thought in religious matters.

The only Christian unity that is coming, so far as we can see, is that which depends on a common attitude toward Jesus Christ of believers in him. That was the unity of primitive Christians. Every writer of the New Testament has the same attitude toward Christ, but each has his own Christology. Paul's conception of Christ is not that of Peter or John. His idea of the resurrection of Christ is not that of Matthew or Luke. But they are all one in their loyalty to Jesus Christ as their Saviour and Lord. The churches which different apostles founded differed widely in doctrine, and had, we think, different ideas of the person and work of Christ. A comparison of Paul's letters to the Corinthians with the accounts in the Acts of the church in Jerusalem seems convincing evidence of such differences. But Gentile churches sent contributions of money to their Jewish brethren and these in turn gave counsels to the churches in Asia. They were one in their attitude to Christ and their purpose to establish his Kingdom among the nations.

Dr. James Denney's "Jesus and the Gospel," recently reviewed in these columns, is one of the ablest theological productions of this generation. It presents the highest conception of Christ ever held by his disciples. It is sanely conservative in its interpretation of the New Testament. The reader comes with surprise to Dr. Denney's concluding suggestion that the symbol of the unity of the Christian Church should be expressed in this single phrase, "I believe in God through Jesus Christ his only Son, our Lord and Saviour." Yet the careful reading of this profound study of the New Testament leads naturally to this conclusion. Church government and creeds vary in different times and countries and according to inherited ideas and degrees of education. Loyal devotion to Jesus Christ is everywhere the same among his disciples.

It may be, therefore, that Christian unity is nearer than we have supposed; and some new and adequate expression of it that will impress the world may be at hand.—The Congregationalist (Boston).

Correspondence on the Religious Life

By George A. Campbell

Money and the Church

The Correspondent: "Why do our churches make such slow progress in the cities? They grow rapidly in smaller places; but it takes decades to measure much substantial advancement in the first-rate cities."

I will mention but one outstanding cause. We lack the money necessary to growth. The small church is a burden to its members. Many avoid it because they fear its financial demands. The faithful grow weary in giving a superabundance of their time and energy to money matters. The average church board in the city does not consider spiritual matters; but gives its attention in all its meetings year after year, to bills, bills, bills. Expenses are much higher in the city than in the country or town. To have any considerable prestige there must be a large investment in a lot and building. The preacher cannot live on seven or eight hundred dollars. Fifteen hundred is scarcely a living income for a minister in a large city.

An annual budget of $4,000 is very small for a city church; and yet it is very burdensome for the members of the small church.

Fewer Churches and Better Ones.

What is the remedy? The struggling churches must be greatly decreased. We must build fewer churches—but better ones. And constituencies must be enlarged. And again, the present evil of the non-paying small church will be curtailed by rational coöperation between the different denominations.

Protestantism in the cities must show reasonable working unity or succumb. When we cease to stand so tenaciously for some divisive tenets, and more loyally for man and Christ, a new day shall have dawned for Christianity. There is a loyalty that is of God; and there is a loyalty that is of the devil. Sectarianism with all its evil is the result of the latter kind of loyalty. The new day is about at hand. It is coming even here in Chicago.

Progress of the New Day in Chicago.

Perhaps it is coming here before it comes in more likely places. Weigh well the significance of this happening: A Baptist and a Congregational church were crowding each other so that both were in a semi-dying condition. There was room but for one. The clearance house committee of the various denominational boards asked a committee of three Presbyterians to look into the situation and advise which should withdraw from the field.

Surely this action must have been pleasing to our common Christ. He said, "He who is not against me is for me." We do not quote these words frequently.

Financial Burden of Struggling Church.

The struggling church far too greatly burdens its members with money matters. The first duty of a man is to support himself and his family. He who does not do this is worse than a non-church member, a non-believer even, who does support his family.

A man's first duty is not to pay the preacher and the janitor of the church, but to feed and clothe his own wife and babies. We can never make progress in the city with insignificant church buildings, complaining janitors, and thread-bare preachers. And what is more important, we cannot be a factor of any consequence in the great human problems, social questions, and religious unrest of our time.

Isaiah and the Peace Congress

The Correspondent: Isaiah had his dreams of peace as well as the distinguished gentlemen who are meeting in Chicago this week. Doubtless he called peace conferences of his people. Over two milleniums ago he wrote such beautiful words as these: "And they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pluning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." Was this a vain dream? War, as we know it, scarcely existed in Isaiah's time. He knew only petty warfare. Napoleon appeared two thousand years after this expressed hope of the great prophet. The most deadly weapons are modern. Isaiah never dreamed of the awfulness of modern warfare. The airship is but of last year. Is peace still a vain hope? Has the peace conference meeting now in Chicago any better ground for its hopes than had Isaiah? We are more humane with our prisoners than were the ancients; but does not this very kindness help prolong warfare? Is not the peace of the world grievously threatened at this very moment? Are not Germany and England making all possible speed in preparation for war? Germany is building four Dreadnoughts a year. England, therefore, is rushing to build eight at once. War between England and Germany with their vast resources might be the greatest war this world ever knew. Therefore I ask, "Have we any more reason to hope for peace than did Isaiah?"

The New Humanity.

I think we have. We still have passions and prejudices that will doubtless lead to some wars in the future; but, nevertheless, a spirit of peace and humanity pervades our world such as Isaiah never knew, yes, even such as Isaiah's successors as Paul, Calvin, Wesley and Campbell never knew. We have come to the age of man. The king is no longer above man. The mob no longer has the power it once did because man today is intelligent. The king absolute and the mob frenzied are the two dangers to peace. Goldwin Smith says England's four wars in his lifetime were each caused by two or three ambitious men exciting the mob spirit. A new humanity inhabits the world. A spirit of brotherhood is world wide. The uttermost parts of the earth are now next door to us. The dangerous stranger has ceased to be because he is no longer a stranger. Books, science, churches, fraternal orders, labor societies, etc., are binding nation to nation and man to man the world over.

Religion and Brotherhood.

The religion that makes for brotherhood is covering the whole world. The bigot is giving place to the Christian. The retiring Sultan when informed that he had been dethroned said: "The will of Allah be done." He was a tyrant, bigot, pharisee. The king could do no wrong. He has passed; and with him is passing the religion that makes for war.

The new Sultan when informed that he had been made the monarch of his people said: "The will of the people be done." That sentence makes for peace. I believe we have vastly more ground for hope than did Isaiah. A new spirit is upon us, the Spirit of God, I verily believe. Is war expensive? Then this new spirit asks: How does the expenditure serve man? Is war religious? How then does the religion that leads to war serve man? Is war for patriotic reasons, then how does war patriotism serve man? When the age asks great questions it cannot give foolish answers, at least not for long.

Our Church Men

By John R. Ewers

Men and the Ministry

Hear me. I have somewhat to say concerning the ministry. We must have men. Professor Giddings, of Columbia, recently told a friend of mine that the brightest and best young men were not entering the ministry, that the opportunities of business were so alluring that they were devoting their energies to the financial world. Some of us do not like to hear that. It makes us feel decidedly second rate. It makes us question whether we are not soft mystics, rather than world builders. Some of us, I think, know that it requires some nerve and consecration to remain ministers, and we believe that he who effectually molds the spirits of men works with nobler stuff than he who molds but iron and clay.

Why Entrance to Ministry is Barred.

Two things have in these last days operated to keep young men of power and broad vision out of the ministry. Let us be very frank—these two forces are the narrow theological tests that bar the way to ordination, and the desperately stingy salaries that follow ordination. Given freedom to think and a decent remuneration, the ranks of the ministry would again be filled. Now I know as well as you do that the minister ought to be called of God. That he ought to feel the inner imperative, that he ought to cry out, "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel." (Although it may be woe if he does). We all know, without your wonderfully wise observation, that the minister should renounce this present wicked world and find his compensation in his noble calling. But the young man notices that the rotund business men, who make these brilliant remarks, go right on piling up the coin, storing up the life insurance, adding farm to farm and bank to bank while the good man of religion wears out his life trying to figure out just how he can pass rich on forty cents a year.

Does the Minister Get all He is Worth?

Last year in one of our conventions where this subject was up I said: "We get all we are worth, the man who gets only $500 would be cheap at half the price." That sounded very brilliant to me, then, but here comes Dr. Henry S. Pritchett, of Boston, and says some similarly caustic things about inefficient ministers and some way it doesn't set quite so well. Dr. Pritchett is a brainy man. I once heard him give a very learned address and his words have weight. This is what he says in part: "Much has been said in recent years of the decay of churches, and the weakening of church ties, particularly among Protestants. Many explanations have been given of this tendency. No doubt many factors have a part in the result which we see. Among these one of the most evident is the inefficiency of the ministry, due in the main to low standards of admission. In the Protestant churches, where the power of authority has largely passed by, the work of the church depends upon the quality of the religious leadership of its preachers. The efficiency of this leadership is low. In the small towns one finds the same conditions that exist among lawyers and physicians. Four or five ministers eke out a living where one or two, at most, could do the work effectively. Like the doctors of these villages these men concern themselves with the chronic cases and specific remedies, while the great problems of the moral health of their communities go untouched.

Roman Catholic Priests Severely Trained.

"The old Mother church has pursued a more far-sighted policy in this matter than the majority of her daughters. She requires of all her priests a long and severe training. However one may criticise the kind of education which they receive, or the large factor of the loyalty to the ecclesiastical organization which forms part of it, the wisdom of the requirement is unquestionable. To it is due in large measure the enormous moral power of the Roman Catholic church throughout the world, particularly among the great masses of working people in the cities, where Protestantism has been so markedly effective, partly, at least, because of defects that an adequate modern education would go far toward remedying.

"It is impossible to estimate how much the cause of religious progress is delayed by the fact that a great proportion of the men who assume, as representatives of the Christian denomination to take the place of religious leaders, are unprepared for such leadership, are untrained for the fundamentals of theology, in the elements of learning, in knowledge of mankind, in the interpretation of life from the religious rather than from the denominations to take the place of religious are the salaries paid, they are in many cases equal to the services rendered. In this situation the public is profoundly interested.

Leaders Must Be Educated.

"The public can form no sound conclusion whether a Methodist or a Baptist is likely to be the more efficient religious leader any more than it can determine whether a homeopath or an allopath is the more likely to be an efficient practitioner of medicine. Of one thing only can it be sure, and that is that whether a man undertakes to lead in one religious organization or another, he ought to have grounded himself in the fundamental studies which lie at the basis of all religious teaching, of all intellectual and spiritual leadership. Training counts for as much here as in any other human relation.

"The raising of the efficiency of the profession of the ministry rests largely in the hands of the preachers themselves, just as the raising of the profession of medicine rests with the physicians. That the effect presents for any particular Christian organization serious social, administrative, and economic difficulties can not be denied. That the advancement of religious influence in the lives of men rests in large measure on this effort seems equally clear."

Ministry Behind Other Professions in Progress.

Dr. Aked, of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York, was asked as a representative minister what he thought of this statement. He seemed to think that Dr. Prichett is right when he says that the ministry has not kept pace with the advancement of the other professions. Dr. Aked adds the other element mentioned above, viz., that many men are too big to go through the narrow wicket gate of theological tests. Man after man of real worth is thus deterred. He says: "These men have felt themselves called to maintain the orthodoxy, out of harmony with our modern thinking, denied by all that we know today under the continuous operations of the spirit of God. Men who respect themselves, real men, men who have it in them to do some good in the world, are not going to stultify themselves by submitting to the absurd little tests which these adsurd little men propose." Continuing he points to a single instance where a bright, brainy university trained man was kept from the ministry by these "little men." He says: "It made me sick to hear men asking questions about the doctrine of everlasting punishment, the verbal inspiration of the Bible and about things that a decent man ought to be ashamed to bring up for discussion in the twentieth century. The fact is that only little men with little minds in little positions can afford to give their time to this kind of folly—and they like it." He also denounces the waste of men, machinery and money in our denominational system. The good sense of Americans will soon modify this sectarian system toward unity.

Church's Self-respect Must Be Cultivated.

I have taken the above from the Literary Digest. It is a burning question. Men are not entering the ministry. Ministers are forsaking their calling for other positions. What is to be done? The highly trained minister has to compete with some fellow with no education, and if this fellow can make a big bluff and has an oily tongue and can be "hired" for a pittance, the average church is content, especially if he repeats, like a parrot, the shibboleths of orthodoxy. It is like an American workman competing with cheap Oriental labor. The churches must have self-respect enough to demand a trained ministry or else be content to see power and prestige fade away. Training will injure none. It will empower and equip all. Training is imperative. Here is a chance for our big laymen to assert themselves. The trouble is that the churches which favor these "scab" workmen, have only petty, narrow and hidebound laymen in them. It is not as though a man could not have a training if he wanted it. Any man who will not take a training today is not fit to aspire to religious leadership. Laziness is the only cause of modern unfitness so far as training is concerned.

Narrow Theological Tests Unendurable.

Again if we want big, broad men in our ministry we must heed the wise words of Dr. Aked and quit imposing narrow theological tests. You cannot do the thinking for a big man, he insists upon doing his own. The times demand trained men, theological freedom and adequate salaries. So long as laymen value a minister at $517.23 per annum there will be some big fellows who will not be impressed by the ministry. We pay for what we value. Some parsons would be expensive at $400, but the most of our men are honest and consecrated and the way they are treated by well-to-do laymen is an outrage. It is true that one should not enter the ministry unless he is called of God. But that call does not mean that God will fill his mind and mouth. He must study and the church must appreciate him. There are some strange things in this world. Thus we write with care our sermons—what we say to men; we make extemporaneous prayers—what we say to God. We will not allow a doctor to care for our child or friend unless he has studied for four years in some approved college and has passed a state board, but we will trust the culture of our child's spirit to some ignorant man whose only qualification is a lazy emotional desire to be religious. If the church expects the world to respect her, she must be worthy of it. The church will continue to lose power; the pulpit will continue to decline; the intelligent and powerful men of affairs will continue to despise our holy cause as long as it is interpreted to them by little men.

Once the church was imperilled by rascally monks, now it is endangered by cheap preachers and stingy laymen.

CENTENNIAL STUDIES

By Dr. Errett Gates

The Disciples and Democracy

The last quarter of the eighteenth century was an age seething with political revolution in Europe and America. Men were freeing themselves from ancient political tyranny under the spell of a new feeling of the worth of man and of his inalienable rights. They appealed to that trinity of natural rights and duties—Liberty, Equality and Fraternity. It seemed to constituted authorities like an age of libertinism and anarchy, and that is what it came to for a moment in France when the Goddess of Reason was set up as an object of worship in 1793.

Democratic Atmosphere.

The atmosphere of the time in America was charged with the feeling of freedom. The people had come at last to their ancient birth-right of self-government—the right to be governed by laws and persons the people themselves had sanctioned and set up. In place of the divine right of kings to rule had come the divine right of men to rule. They were impatient of all forms of illegal or unconstitutional authority. Men everywhere were asking of every public law, decree, or tax, By whose authority imposed. It was in asking and answering this question, in the light of the new principles of democracy, that the conscience of the American colonies was aroused against the arbitrary tea tax of England. An act of political tyranny led to the Declaration of Independence and the American Revolution.

Declaration of Independence.

An act of ecclesiastical tyranny led to the "Declaration and Address" and the Campbellian Reformation. A like act of ecclesiastical tyranny led to the "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery," and the Stone movement. Both historic documents of the beginnings of the Disciples were declarations of independence—they were manifestos of revolt against unscriptural, that is, unconstitutional authorities; and both were written in America, the one in Kentucky in 1804, the other in Pennsylvania in 1809. The identity of principle, purpose, and spirit of the Campbell and Stone movements brought them together in 1832. Both Campbell and Stone established pure religious democracies in the purest political democracy in the world at that time. It was not an accident that it happened so. Social conditions in America made it so. Nothing but a religious democracy could have succeeded.

Not only political influences but religious influences urged toward democracy. The most prosperous denominations of the time were more or less democratic—the Baptists, the Congregationalists, the Quakers, the Methodists, and the Presbyterians. The Campbells had grown up under Independent (Congregational) influences in Ireland, while the New Testament which they adopted as a guide in all matters of faith and practice, presented a democratic brotherhood as the model after which they should order the churches of God.

Origin of Their Ideas.

The question may be asked, Since the Campbells referred every item of faith and practice to the New Testament, why is it not sufficient to say that they drew their democratic ideas from the Scriptures? It might be correct to say that they drew their ideas from the New Testament, but they drew their courage and decision to practice those ideas from the temper and constitution of the social consciousness. Those particular New Testament ideas made their appeal to them, because they appealed to that age, and were beginning to work politically and socially. The world has to make an idea work before it is generally felt to be true. For the first time in the history of Western Society democracy was working at the opening of the nineteenth century. Nothing else could be trusted to work. That was the one political principle that was relied on to make all things new in heaven and on earth. Democracy was the prelude to the social millennium. Would such an atmosphere be a favorable one for an ecclesiastical monarchy? If the New Testament had presented the example of a monarchy in the organization of the early church, is it at all probable that the Campbells would have tried to work it, or if they had tried, would they have succeeded?

Truth Something That Works.

It was social and political conditions that gave them the working courage of their ideas which they professed to draw from the New Testament. If at the same time they had lived in Russia or Turkey, it is not at all likely that they would have found those democratic ideas in the New Testament, or if they had found them there, that they would have felt the working efficiency and truth of them. An idea is never held to be true until it gives promise of working well for the best interests of the greater number. An idea that constantly works ill, ceases to be true, and gradually drops out of the thought of men. When an idea has come to fill the common consciousness of society all past history and sacred literature are suddenly found to be filled with it. It might lie for ages unnoticed upon the page of sacred literature until the congenial conditions of the social mind quickened it into life and gave it recognition.

New Light From the Scriptures.

Why is it that new light and truth are breaking forth from the Scriptures in each new generation? Surely they are the same Scriptures, filled with the same light and truth in all generations. Whence the new truth? It comes from the new minds that read them in each succeeding generation. Truth is in the mind before it is seen in the Book. The world grows into the truth; experience is the essential condition for its understanding. It must be lived as experience before it can be apprehended as revelation.

Democratic Church Organization.

The world had lived itself into the truth of democracy when the Campbells came declaring it to be the teaching of the New Testament, and making application of it to religious conditions in a more thoroughgoing way than had been done in Congregational churches which were its bearers to the modern world.

1. They applied the principles of democracy, or of independency, first of all to church organization. They made the first church at Brush Run a little religious sovereignty under the constitution of the New Testament. All authority locally was vested in the members of the congregation. There was no authority over it or outside of it save Christ and his word as expressed in the New Testament.

Democratic Ministry.

2. They applied democratic principles to the ministry of the gospel and of the ordinances, as was not customary even in Independent churches.

The call to the ministry was of the free choice and determination of any person who thought himself qualified for it; while ordination by the congregation or its officers was never made a condition of ministerial activity. The distinction between clergyman and layman was completely blotted out in practice, and even the words were tabooed in speech. There was no service or office performed by the minister that could not be performed by any member. The preaching of the gospel, the administration of baptism on the Lord's supper, might fall to any member of the church in the absence of a minister appointed to the service. All were priests unto God, in the widest and freest application of the Lutheran principle of a "universal priesthood of believers."

Democratic Education.

So offensive had any class distinction in the church become to Alexander Campbell that he went the whole length of repudiating special training for the ministry in theological seminaries, which he stigmatized as "priest factories"; and when he organized a college for the training of ministers he made no distinction in the curriculum between sacred and secular, liberal and ministerial studies. Ministers were given the same studies as all other students; all other students the same studies as ministers. The distinction in the schools of the Disciples between the college and the Bible college is a recent development.

In keeping with this same democratic principle he repudiated all clerical titles, such as reverend, doctor of divinity, or bishop; though he used the latter title in the biblical sense of elder. He not only ridiculed the clerical garments of Catholic and Episcopal priests, but the black clothes which had become a kind of habit among all ministers of the time. He went so far as to deny the right of a minister to accept a stipulated salary, for it was one of the marks of the "salaried clergy."

Popular with the People.

This leveling process of his democratic principles he carried out with ruthless consistency, much to the consternation of the clergy, but much to the joy of the common people, who rallied to his support in proportion as the clergy rallied to his persecution. The issue drawn between the assumed authority and dignity of the clergy and the inherent sovereignity of the people was truly American. On which side popular sympathy would be arrayed is easy to guess. It was a winning appeal which the Campbells made for the constitutional rights and freedom of the individual and the people against the inherited prerogatives of the clergy. All the odious terms and titles which had been used in derision of the English and their cause in the late War of the Revolution, were now applied to the clerical and ecclesiastical establishment. "Spiritual aristocracy," "clerical nobility," "ecclesiastical lords," were some of the un-American and undemocratic epithets applied to the existing system. Political feeling and convictions were turned to account against an order of things in the churches which stood in the way of the reformation of religious society.

This frank and unreserved patronage of the rights of the people in the church of God, backed by an appeal to the written constitution of the Christian republic, the New Testament, met with instant success. It felt like a revolution in the church which was parallel in principle and purpose to the Revolution that had so recently taken place in the state.

Democratic Bible.

3. There was a democratic element infused into the use and interpretation of Scripture. The Bible which under Luther, had ostensibly become the people's book, had gradually come in Protestant society to be the minister's book. He was its official and sole interpreter to an extent which practically set aside the Lutheran principle of private interpretation. This democratic principle was now brought back with new force and given a new meaning. The individual who in Protestantism was given the right to interpret the Bible, was by Campbell given the capacity to interpret it, under the principle of the essential intelligibility of Scripture. It did not require profound learning and scholarship to be able to understand the plan of salvation, or to rightly divide the word of truth. In its vital parts it not only could be understood aright without note or comment, but ought to be read alone if one desired to arrive at its correct meaning. Every believer from the least to the greatest was encouraged to interpret the Bible for himself, and challenged to find more than one meaning or arrive at a doubtful conclusion.

The Bible for the People.

It became once more the book of the people. It was wrested out of the hands of the clergy and out of the keeping of the

The Gates of the West

By Burris A. Jenkins

Not long ago there was a dedication of a handsome new Baptist church a few blocks away from our Linwood Boulevard Church. It is the "First Baptist" church of this city. The Baptist pastor had been invited, last fall, to make the principal address at the laying of the corner stone of our church, which he did. In return for that courtesy, I suppose, I was asked to be one of four or five speakers, one night, during his dedication week, on the general theme "Interdenominational Fellowship." And thereby hangs this tale.

I made what I thought was a trite and harmless speech, the lines of which are very familiar to any "Disciple of Christ." But what a lot of smoke it raised! I went home feeling that, as so often happens with me, I had opened my mouth, and put my foot in it. That speech created surprise—more surprise in me than in anybody else, for the effect it had.

What Caused the Smoke.

This is about what I said: "There are five Protestant churches on this boulevard, in less than a mile, each one of them building, or about to build costly edifices. They would average, perhaps, six hundred in their audiences Sunday morning and Sunday evening. Their membership might average a thousand each—liberal estimates. Now suppose we built instead, one vast, imposing cathedral. I am sure that two men could preach to three thousand people, one in the morning and one at night, more acceptably than one man can to six hundred; and four or five pastors could look after a congregation of five or six thousand people, or more, better than the pastors can look after a thousand. The Catholics teach us that.

"So, for my part, I am ready to see every stone of our new structure razed to the ground; I am ready to see the identity of our congregation lost in one great united Linwood Boulevard Church of Christ; and I would be glad to hand in my resignation tomorrow, if necessary to bring it about.

"Disappearing Brotherhood" Again.

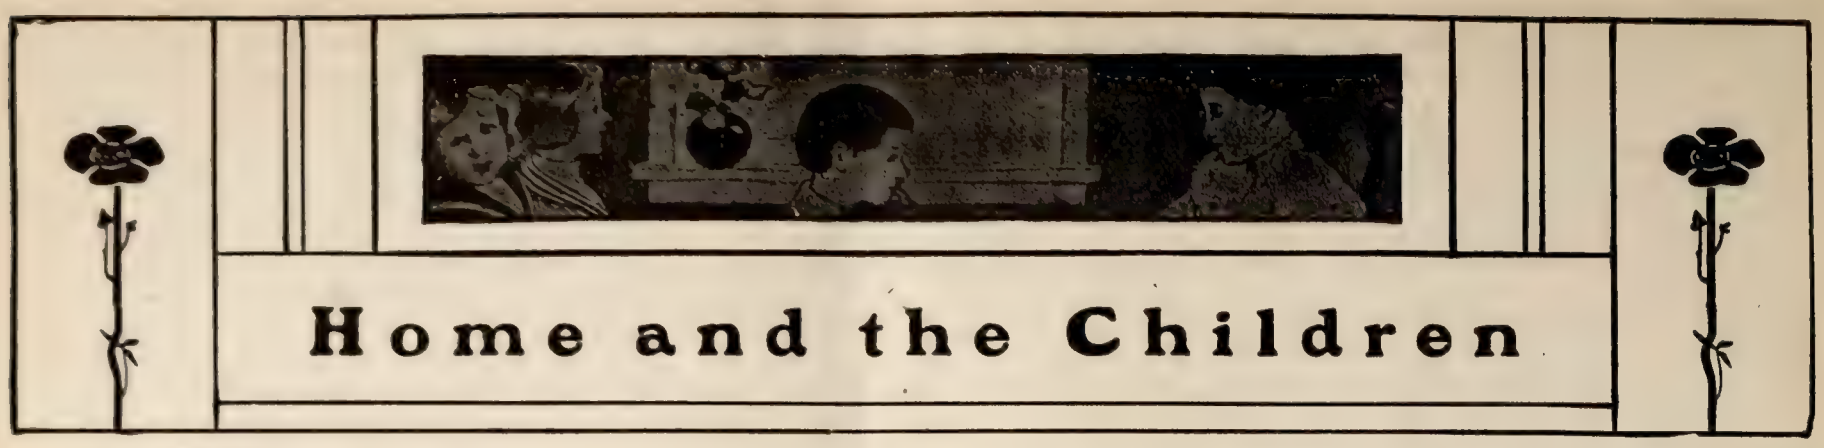
"Some time ago, one of our young men raised a great hue and cry by suggesting that it was the destiny, perhaps, of the church to which I belong, to become a 'disappearing brotherhood.' Certain of our denominational papers and denominational thinkers rose up and cried out that they didn't want to disappear. (Nota bene: Some of them have disappeared already, though this was not in the speech.)

"I want to declare that, for one, I am ready that we should decrease that He may increase. I would be glad to see our denominational press, denominational machinery, missionary societies, and the like, all lose their identity, merged into a greater whole, lost in the united church, our membership to percolate into the body of the great united Church of Christ in the world. It is a long way off, no doubt, but speed the day!"

Not a Candidate for New Pulpit.

Now there's the gist of the whole speech. The moderator, Bishop Hendryx, one of the broadest Methodists in the country, who presided over the Federal Council in Philadelphia, thought it necessary to assure the audience that this remarkable declaration to which they had just listened was, he believed, entirely sincere. Then it was jokingly suggested that the speaker might now be considered a candidate for the pulpit of the new Baptist Church. I was tempted to shout, "Not Baptist!" but forbore for obvious reasons.

Then each speaker that followed took a crack at the preacher and the church that was going out of business, declared they were to be at the same old stand, and that he was the best Christian who was most loyal to his denominational machinery, etc., etc. The good bishop was careful to emphasize—I don't know that this was at all due to my talk—that in organizing our local Federal Council, each denomination would maintain its entity.



What Do Disciples Stand For?

Now what I would like to know is what do we Disciples stand for if not for about what is in that speech? And is it so strange a doctrine, has our voice been so little heard outside our own ranks in declaring it, that it stings like the splendor of a sudden thought? Is it an assumption of superiority, is it a false humility to declare that we would like to fade away in the fulfilment of our Lord's command that they all may be one? Is there any want of tact in publicly declaring it?

Don't think I was sore at all. I knew I had a stronger congregation than any one there on that boulevard, that our completed church will bear comparison with any of them, that our growth will measure up with any of them, to say the least. O no. I was just simply surprised. I want to know if this is strange doctrine, brethren.

Meantime one good old Baptist layman took my hand at the close and said: "I say amen to every word, young man. I wish the name Baptist was sunk in the bottom of the sea." Maybe there are seven thousand such in Israel!

The Monday Voyage

By Grace Wood Castle.

On sunny wash-days, Nell and I
Underneath the clothes-lines lie
On the soft grass, and we play
That we're sailing far away.

Napkin, sheet and pillow-slip
Snowy sails are for our ship,
While for masts—the clothes-poles look
Like those in our picture-book.

Tommy's pigeons, white as snow,
Are our sea-gulls; breezes blow
And fill our sails; we say good-by
And go a-sailing, Nell and I.

"Little Sunshine"

BY D. C. KAUFMAN.

Little Annie Drew, everybody called her. Truly, she was small for a girl of fourteen, not much larger than a child of ten.

Annie's parents were very poor. Her father was a charcoal burner, and hardly made a living for them. In all her life she had had but a few pennies to spend, and those few times were events long to be remembered.

They lived in a little house on the edge of a great woods; the house really was not much more than a hut. But Mrs. Drew always kept it as clean as wax.

Annie had been a cripple since her birth, having trouble with her back, and being lame in one leg, which necessitated the use of a crutch. Although her home was about two miles from the church, she always managed to get there on time, if the weather was such as to permit her to walk.

There were a great many things going on at the church, such as entertainments, fairs, etc., but poor Annie was never able to take part in any of them. Her crippled form prevented her from appearing in the entertainments, and she had no money to give or to spend for the other affairs. Yet she was anxious to do her share, and finally, one Sunday, remained a while when service was over, and spoke to the minister about it.

The Rev. Mr. Harrison was a kindly man, and the question puzzled him a great deal, knowing, as he did, how the little girl was situated. But he promised to find something for her to do, and to let her hear from him during the week.

She watched anxiously every day for him, but not until Thursday was she rewarded by seeing him come along the grass grown road. He drew his horse up and tied him, passed the time of day, and sitting down on the doorstep beside her, said cheerfully, "Well, now, let me see. You want to do something to help the Lord?"

"Yes, sir."

"You can read pretty well, I believe?"

"Yes, I went to school until I was twelve and I've read lots since then."

"Good. Here, then, is something you can do. About a mile up the main road lives Mrs. Jones. The yellow house,—do, you know it?"

"I saw it once, sir."

"Well, she has always been a good member of the church, but cannot get up from her bed now. She has a servant who cannot read very well, but no relatives or friends. I cannot get there every day, and if you could manage to call there on fair days and read a little to her from the Bible, I am sure she will appreciate it, and so will I. It will be a splendid chance to do the Lord's work."

Annie eagerly accepted the commission. She was to start the next day if possible, but it rained, so she had to wait until Saturday.

It was a long, slow walk for the little cripple, but she kept steadily at it. Mr. Harrison had told Mrs. Jones, so Annie was expected, and received a pleasant welcome from the old lady. She read her several chapters from the Bible, and was able to give an outline of the last Sunday's sermon, which greatly pleased her aged friend.

They had a pleasant little luncheon together, and Annie left, feeling that, cripple though she was, she was some good in the world after all.

Regularly, on such days as she could take the walk, she made the trip, and was a source of great joy to old Mrs. Jones.

But Annie was not satisfied. She still had some time to spare, and begged Mr. Harrison to find her something more to do. So he called on different days, when out visiting, and took her along in his carriage, leaving her where she could read or chat in her old fashioned way to some sick or bed-ridden person.

Mrs. Jones had christened her "Little Sunshine," for despite her infirmities, Annie had a cheerful way with her. Mr. Harrison told this about, and soon she became known by that name better than her own.

Annie had discovered, among other things, how much flowers were appreciated by sick people, and begging a slip here or a plant there, she coaxed them and cared for them, and always had a few blossoms to take with her. Tired as he usually was, her father would help her to do the heavy work in the little garden she had made.

Winter came. Annie's sunshine work had grown, and every fair day was crowded with something to do. She could not now get out as frequently as formerly. But Mr. Harrison called on all his visiting days for flowers, and there was always a few for him. He had secured a lot of boxes for her, and as much of her garden as was possible had been moved inside till the little house was fairly crowded for room. Mrs. Jones missed Annie's regular visits, and arranged with a man to call and bring her every day.

Annie not only enjoyed the visits, but the sleigh rides as well, wrapped up well in the robes that were provided.

Mrs. Jones, although alone in the world, and bed-ridden as she was, was a fairly wealthy woman. Hearing from her pastor how much "Little Sunshine" was in demand, she arranged to have the sleigh call and take her out on certain days, and also allowed her the use of many windows in the house to grow more flowery plants, that she might have them to take with her.

And so, you see, while Annie grew hardly any herself, her good work grew faster and faster, until she was known far and wide.

Thus her work went on for two years. Then, on a rainy April morning, Mr. Harrison called and told her that her good friend had suddenly died during the night.

Poor "Little Sunshine" wept many bitter tears. She had learned to love Mrs. Jones, who had been so kind to her, and gave her many helpful suggestions.

Of course Annie thought some of her work

THE CHINK CHINK CHINAMAN.

Now, children, gather all around me here—yes, that's right, but don't push so. There is plenty of room for all of you. I am going to tell you a story, the story of the chink chink Chinaman. Yes, Mary, you're a perfect dream in those pink bows, but if you look in the glass all the time, dear, you will miss the story. Where was I?—yes, the chink chink Chinaman. Now, Bobby, there's plenty of room for you and Tommy both on that chair. No, you don't have to either. The chink chink Chinaman—well he had a little laundry all in a little shop—yes, yes, he had a little pig tail, too, but the story isn't about that. One day I went to see the little Chinaman in the little shop. I wanted the Chinaman to washee washee for me. But do you know, the little Chinaman could not speak English, not even a little English? So I was out of patience with the Chinaman and as I went to leave his shop I said, "The Chinaman is only a 'me.' He is a block-head. He is like the post." But what do you suppose happened? When the little bell tinkled to show that I was going out the door, the little Chinaman said—no, he didn't say a thing about rats, Susie—he said in the nicest, pleasantest, most friendly tone, "Goo'-bye." Then I was very much ashamed of myself and I said, "The Chinaman is not a 'me,' he is an 'i'; only you don't spell him with a capital. He wishes to do something, to be somebody, to be good, but he doesn't know how." Then I said to myself, "I will try to help the Chinaman make himself into a big 'I.'"

Now remember; you can't be even a little "i" unless you can be good.

And remember when you're tempted
To part with tear and cry,
That even the chink chink Chinaman
Knows how to say good bye.

would have to stop, as she would not have the carriage to call and take her around any more, but would have to walk again. The same man continued calling regularly, however, and when she asked him about it he only smiled. Mr. Harrison did the same thing. Then one day he came and took her to a lawyer's office, and there Annie learned that Mrs. Jones had done a great many charitable things during her life time, through the Rev. Mr. Harrison and others, and had left her house and most of the money to Annie, setting apart a certain sum for the girl, and the rest to be used to continue the work. Her father and mother could live comfortable, and she had plenty of room to grow her beloved flowers. Of course, for the present the money was in trust, but eventually it would be all her own.

Thus, a little cripple girl, was, by constant effort, able to accomplish wonderful things, and all because she wanted to do something for the Lord, in her own little way.

Annie lived for many years, and continued to carry on the good work. She was always better known as "Little Sunshine" than by her own name.

Cradle Song

Baby, baby wise,
Love's divine surmise
Lights your constant eyes.

Day and night and day
One mute word would they,
As the soul saith, say.

Trouble comes and goes;
Wonder ebbs and flows;
Love remains and glows.

As the fledgeling dove
Feels the breast above,
So your heart feels love.

At Whose Home

A beautiful little canary came flying by and settled down on a branch of the honeysuckle. "I'm so tired," he said. "I haven't found a really happy home yet. I'm quite sure, though, that no one would be unkind or unhappy in such a charming place as this. I think I'll make my home here."

But just then a dog came round the corner of the porch, limping and crying, for a boy was running after him, striking him cruelly with a big stick.

"Oh! Oh!" said the bird, and away he flew. "I couldnt stay there. That boy would surely be unkind to me." And he flew to a window sill of a fine stone house in a beautiful garden.

"What a lovely home! I'm sure I can stay here." But there were sounds of crying from the room within, and, peepi g in, he saw two little sisters quarreling over a doll.

"Let go! That's my doll! No, you shan't have it! I want to play with it," and in the struggle the poor little doll was torn to pieces.

"Dear! Oh, dear!" chirped the poor little bird. "They might try to do that to me. I don't want to live here."

On he flew, from home to home, finding unkindness so often that at last he sank down, worn out, on to a porch to die, his poor little heart almost broken with sadness. Suddenly he felt a warm hand close over him, and a soft, kind little voice said: "Why, you poor little thing! Oh, mother, see this dear little bird! Please let me keep him. I'll take good care of him, and not let a thing hurt him!"

"Very well, dear, you may. Now go and feed him."

And the little canary found happiness and kindness at last, and sang and made the little child happy for being so good to him.

Perhaps the most expert and intrepid of living lady motorists is Miss Dorothy Levitt, whose book, entitled "The Woman and the Car," is attracting considerable attention. She has driven a motor car at the amazing speed of ninety-two miles an hour.

—Mrs. Clarence Mackay has presented forty-six sets of six books each to Dr. John S. Billings of the New York Public Library. The books all advocate equal suffrage for women. It is intended that the sets shall be distributed among forty-two branches of the public library.

—Mme. Curie, who is to be one of the sectional presidents at the International Chemistry Congress, was really the discoverer of radium, although her late husband is generally credited with that achievement. It was entirely due to Mme. Curie's investigations that the new element was discovered in pitchblende.

—Old customs die very hard in China and in several parts of the celestial empire it is still considered a high act of virtue for a woman to publicly commit suicide after the death of her husband. According to the law the proceeding is actually legal in some provinces, and such is the state of public opinion that in districts where it is officially prohibited the authorities rarely interfere.

—Probably no other lady has such a record of exploration as Mrs. French-Sheldon, who, amongst other claims to distinction, possesses that of having been the first woman elected a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society. In addition to three journeys round the world, she has personally conducted more than one African expedition, and has traveled alone on the Congo.

—Miss Fanny Cochran, a graduate of Bryn Mawr, and Miss Florence Sanville, a graduate of Bowdern college, in Pennsylvania, have just returned to Philadelphia from a six weeks' tour of the silk factories, in which time they worked in sixteen different factories, says a writer. The work was done in the interest of the child-labor bill under the auspices of the Consumers' league. They found some of the factories very well taken care of and others in which the conditions were unsanitary and the tendencies immoral. They had no difficulty in getting work and in plain clothes performed the duties assigned them.

On one occasion, when he had called early, and no one was yet down-stairs, Harold was half-dozing in a Morris chair in the library, when suddenly a pair of soft little hands covered his eyes and a sweet little voice commanded.

"Guess who!"

Immediately Harold was up a tree. He couldn't for the life of him determine whose voice it was—Betty's? Babbie's? Ellen's? A wrong guess would mean complications too awful to contemplate. Finally, however, a happy solution of the difficulty offered itself, and Harold blandly announced:

schools and given to the plain man, to read and interpret for himself. WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XV.

Facing the Flame.

Courthorne rode away next morning, and some weeks had passed when Maud Barrington came upon Winston sitting beside his mower in a sloo. He did not at first see her, for the rattle of the machines in a neighboring hollow rowned the muffled beat of hoofs, and the girl, reining in her horse, looked down on him. The man was sitting very still, which was unusual for him, hammer in hand, gazing straight before him, as though he could see something beyond the shimmering heat that danced along the rim of the prairie.

Summer had come, and the grass, which grew scarcely ankle-deep on the great levels, was once more white and dry, but in the hollows that had held the melting snow it stood waist-high, scented with peppermint, harsh and wiry, and Winston had set out with every man he had to harvest it. Already a line of loaded wagons crawled slowly across the prairie, and men and horses moved half-seen amid the dust that whirled about another sloo. Out of it came the trampling of hoofs and the musical tinkle of steel.

Suddenly Winston looked up, and the care which was stamped upon it fled from his face when he saw the girl. The dust that lay thick upon his garments had spared her, and as she sat, patting the restless horse, with a little smile on her face which showed beneath the big white hat, something in her dainty freshness reacted upon the tired man's fancy. He had long borne the stress and the burden, and as he watched her a longing came upon him, as it had too often for his tranquillity since he had been at Silverdale, to taste, for a short space of time at least, a life of leisure and refinement. This woman who had been borne to it could, it seemed to him, lift the man she trusted beyond the sordid cares of the turmoil to her own high level, and as he waited for her to speak, a fit of passion shook him. It betrayed itself only by the sudden hardening of his face.

"It is the first time I have surprised you idle. You were dreaming," she said.

Winston smiled a trifle mirthlessly. "I was, but I am afraid the fulfillment of the dreams is not for me. One is apt to be pulled up suddenly when he ventures overfar."

"We are inquisitive, you know," said Maud Barrington; "can't you tell me what they were?"

Winston did not know what impulse swayed him, and afterwards blamed himself for complying, but the girl's interest compelled him, and he showed her a little of what was in his heart.

"I fancied I saw Silverdale gorging the elevators with the choicest wheat," he said. "A new bridge flung level across the ravine where the wagons go down half-loaded to the creek; a dam turning the hollow into a lake, and big turbines driving our own flouring mill. Then there were herds of cattle fattening on the strippings of the grain that wasteful people burn, our products clamored for, east in the old country and west in British Columbia—and for a back-ground, prosperity and power, even if it was paid for with half the traditions of Silverdale. Still, you see it may all be due to the effect of the fierce sunshine on an idle man's fancy."

Maud Barrington regarded him steadily, and the smile died out of her eyes. "But," she said slowly, "is all that quite beyond realization? Could you not bring it about?"

Winston saw her quiet confidence and something of her pride. There was no avarice in this woman, but the slight dilation of the nostrils and the glow in her eyes told of ambition, and for a moment his soul was not his own.

I could," he said, and Maud Barrington, who watched the swift straightening of his shoulders and lifting of his head, felt that he spoke no more than the truth. Then with a sudden access of bitterness, "But I never will."

"Why?" she asked. "Have you grown tired of Silverdale, or has what you pictured no charm for you?"

Winston leaned, as it were wearily, against the wheel of the mower. "I wonder if you could understand what my life has been. The crushing poverty that rendered every effort useless from the beginning, the wounds that come from using imperfect tools, and the numb hopelessness that follows repeated failure. They are tolerably hard to bear alone, but it is more difficult to make the best of them when the poorly-fed body is as worn out as the mind. To stay here would be—paradise—but a glimpse of it will probably have to suffice. Its gates are well guarded, and without are the dogs, you know."

Something in Maud Barrington thrilled in answer to the faint hoarseness in Winston's voice, and she did not resent it. She was a woman with all her sex's instinctive response to passion and emotion, though as yet the primitive impulses that stir the hearts of men had been covered if not wholly hidden from her by the thin veneer of civilization. Now, at least, she felt in touch with them, and for a moment she looked at the man with a daring that matched his own shining in her eyes.

"And you fear the angel with the sword?" she said. "There is nothing so terrible at Silverdale."

"No," said Winston. "I think it is the load I have to carry I fear the most."

For the moment Maud Barrington had flung off the bonds of conventionality. "Lance," she said, "you have proved your right to stay at Silverdale, and would not what you are doing now cover a great deal in the past?"

Winston smiled wryly. "It is the present that is difficult," he said. "Can a man be pardoned and retain the offense?"

He saw the faint bewilderment in the girl's face give way to the resentment of frankness unreturned, and with a little shake of his shoulders shrank into himself. Maud Barrington, who understood it, once more put on the becoming reticence of Silverdale.

"We are getting beyond our depth, and it is very hot," she said. "You have all this hay to cut!"

Winston laughed as he bent over the mower's knife. "Yes," he said, "it is really more in my line, and I have kept you in the sun too long."

In another few moments Maud Barrington was riding across the prairie, but when the rattle of the machine rose from the sloo behind her, she laughed curiously.

"The man knew his place, but you came perilously near making a fool of yourself this morning, my dear," she said.

It was a week or two later, and very hot, when, with others of his neighbors, Winston sat in the big hall at Silverdale Grange. The windows were open wide and the smell of hot dust came in from the white waste which rolled away beneath the stars. There was also another odor in the little puffs of wind that flickered in, and far off where the arch of indigo dropped to the dusky earth, wavy lines of crimson moved along the horizon. It was then the season when fires that are lighted by means which no man knows creep up and down the waste of grass, until they put on speed and roll in a surf of flame before a sudden breeze. Still, nobody was anxious about them, for the guarding furrows that would oppose a space of dusty soil to the march of the flame had been plowed around every homestead at Silverdale.

Maud Barrington was at the piano and her voice was good, while Winston, who had known what it is to toil from red dawn to sunset without hope of more than daily food, found the simple song she had chosen chime with his mood. "All day long the reapers."

A faint staccato drumming that rose from the silent prairie throbbed through the final chords of it, and when the music ceased, swelled into the gallop of a horse. It seemed in some curious fashion portentous, and when there was a rattle and jingle outside other eyes than Winston's were turned towards the door. It swung open presently and Dane came in. There was quiet elation and some diffidence in his bronzed face as he turned to Colonel Barrington.

"I could not get away earlier from the settlement, sir, but I have great news," he said. "They have awoke to the fact that stocks are getting low in the old country. Wheat moved up at Winnipeg, and there was almost a rush to buy yesterday."

There was a sudden silence, for among those present were men who remembered the acres of good soil they had not plowed, but a little grim smile crept into their leader's face.

"It is," he said quietly, "too late for most of us. Still, we will not grudge you your good fortune, Dane. You and a few others owe it to Courthorne."

Every eye was on the speaker, for it had become known among his neighbors that he had sold for a fall; but Barrington could lose gracefully. Then both his niece and Dane looked at Winston with a question in their eyes.

"Yes," he said very quietly, "it is the turning of the tide."

He crossed over to Barrington, who smiled at him dryly as he said, "It is a trifle soon to admit that I was wrong."

Winston made a gesture of almost impatient deprecation. "I was wondering how far I might presume, sir. You have forward wheat to deliver?"

"I have," said Barrington, "unfortunately a good deal. You believe the advance will continue?"

"Yes," said Winston simply. "It is but the beginning, and there will be a reflux before the stream sets in. Wait a little sir, and then telegraph your broker to cover all your contracts when the price drops again."

"I fancy it would be wiser to cut my losses now," said Barrington dryly.

Then Winston did a somewhat daring thing, for he raised his voice a trifle, in a fashion that seemed to invite the attention of the rest of the company.

"The more certain the advance seems to be, the fiercer will be the bears' last attack," he said. "They have to get from under, and will take heavy chances to force prices back. As yet they may contrive to check or turn the stream, and then every wise man who has sold down will try to cover, but no one can tell how far it may carry us, once it sets strongly in!"

The men understood, as did Colonel Barrington, that they were being warned, as it were, above their leader's head, and his niece, while resenting the slight, admitted the courage of the man. Barrington's face was sardonic, and a less resolute man would have winced under the implication as he said:

"This is, no doubt, intuition. I fancy you told us you had no dealings on the markets at Winnipeg."

Winston looked steadily at the speaker, and the girl noticed with a curious approval that he smiled.

"Perhaps it is, but I believe events will prove me right. In any case, what I told you and Miss Barrington was the fact," he said.

Nobody spoke, and the girl was wondering by what means the strain could be relieved, which, though few heard what Barrington said, all seemed to feel, when out of the darkness came a second beat of hoofs, and by and by a man swaying on the driving seat of a jolting wagon swept into the light from the shadows. Then there were voices outside, and a breathless lad came in.

"A big grass fire coming right down on Courthorne's farm!" he said. "It was tolerably close when I got away."

In an instant there was commotion, and every man in Silverdale Grange was on his feet. For the most part, they took life lightly, and looked upon their farming as an attempt to combine the making of money with gentlemanly relaxation; but there were no laggards among them when there was perilous work to be done, and they went out to meet the fire joyously. Inside of five minutes scarcely a horse remained in the stables, and the men were flying at a gallop across the dusky prairie, laughing at the risk of a stumble in a deadly badger-hole. Yet, in the haste of saddling, they found time to arrange a twenty-dollar sweepstake and the allowance for weight.

Up the long rise, and down the back of it, they swept, stirrup by stirrup and neck by neck, while the roar of the hoofs reft the silence of the prairie like the roll of musketry. Behind came the wagons, lurching up the slope, and the blood surged to the brave young faces as the night wind smote them and fanned into brightness the crimson smear on the horizon. They were English lads of the stock that had furnished their nation's fighting line, and not infrequently counted no sacrifice too great that brought their colors home first on the racing turf. Still, careless to the verge of irresponsibility as they were in most affairs that did not touch their pride, the man who rode with red spurs, and Dane next behind him, a clear length before the first of them, asked no better allies in what was to be done.

Then the line drew out as the pace began to tell, though the rearmost rode grimly, knowing the risks the leaders ran, and that the chance of being first to meet the fire might yet fall to them. There was not one among them who would not have killed his best horse for that honor, and for further incentive the Colonel's niece, in streaming habit, flitted in front of them. She had come up from behind them, and passed them on a rise, for Barrington disdained to breed horses for money alone, and there was blood well known on the English turf in the beast she rode.

By and by, a straggling birch bluff rose blackly across their way, but nobody swung wide. Swaying low while the branches smote them, they went through, the twigs crackling under foot, and here and there the red drops trickling down a flushed, scarred face, for the slanting rent of a birch bough cuts like a knife. Dim trees whirled by them, undergrowth went down, and they were out on the dusty grass again, while, like field guns wanted at the front, the bouncing wagons went through behind. Then the fire rose higher in front of them, and when they topped the last rise the pace grew faster still. The slope they thundered down was undermined by gophers and seamed by badger-holes, but they took their chances gleefully, sparing no effort of hand and heel, for the sum of twenty dollars and the credit of being first man in. Then the smoke rolled up to them, and when eager hands drew bridle at last, a youthful voice rose breathlessly out of it:

"Stapleton a good first, but he'll go back on weight. It used to be black and orange when he was at home."

There was a ripple of hoarse laughter, a gasping cheer, and then silence, for now their play was over, and it was with grim quietness, which is not unusual with their kind, the men of Silverdale turned towards the fire. It rolled towards the homestead, a waving crimson wall, not fast, but with remorseless persistency, out of the dusky prairie, and already the horses were plunging in the smoke of it. That, however, did not greatly concern the men, for the bare fire furrows stretched between themselves and it; but there was also another blaze inside the defenses, and, unless it was checked, nothing could save house and barns and granaries, rows of costly binders, and stock of prairie hay. They looked for a leader, and found one ready, for Winston's voice came up through the crackle of the fire:

"Some of you lead the saddle-horses back to the willows and picket them. The rest to the stables and bring out the working beasts. The plows are by the corral, and the first team that comes up is to be harnessed to each in turn. Then start in, and turn over a full-depth furrow a furlong from the fire."

There was no confusion, and already the hired men were busy with two great machines until Winston displaced two of them.

"How that fire passed the guards I don't know, but there will be time to find out later," he said to Dane. "Follow with the big breaker—it wants a strong man to keep that share in—as close as you can."
